Sophia, as she had prophesied, was omnipotent: she contrived to dazzle and bewilder Morland so entirely, by her wit and flattering attentions, that he thought only of her. At times the sweetness and dignity of Laura would appear to him much more adapted to grace his establishment; and he viewed her noble and simple style of beauty with all his former admiration. Sophia, however, intoxicated his senses, and confused his judgment; she did not give him time to reflect, and he mistook flattered vanity for a serious attachment. One day Sophia sought her father, informed him Mr. Morland had transferred his preference of Laura to herself, and she would accept him, provided, her father consented to the union of Laura and Henry Courville; she positively declared she was determined not to marry before her elder sister; and the attachment of Henry and Laura was so well known, no person would propose for her sister, at least, very soon. Her arguments convinced her father, who, like most tyrants, was governed by a favourite. He acquiesced more willingly in her wishes as he well knew the family and connexions of Henry were superior to his own; and he was considered a young man of talents, who would probably rise in his profession. Laura was soon after united to Henry, and experienced all the happiness she had anticipated. By a persevering attention to his profession he obtained a decent competency, and they enjoyed all the comforts of life. The marriage of the more ambitious Sophia was deferred on account of her youth. She never repented the step she had taken, but continued the same gay, rattling, mirthful being, enjoying the opulence she possessed which her kind heart often prompted her to use for the benefit of others. The only circumstance which marred her felicity, was the somewhat niggardly disposition of her husband; that, however, only gave her a field to exercise those talents for manœuvring with which she was so eminently endowed—she wielded him to her will, and he was not sensible of her control. He thought her only fault was extravagance, though he always congratulated himself on possessing one of the prettiest and best of wives.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

PRINTING PRESS IN EGYPT.—The enlightened Ali Pacha of Egypt has now at work in his capital an extensive printing press, for which an improved Arabic type has lately been cut. With this press all the details which tend to illustrate the system borrowed by Ali from Europeans are freely and widely disseminated through his army and navy. In aid of his military views, works have been printed for the instruction of the troops, their conduct in war, and for the regulation of the infantry. A work in praise of war has also appeared this year from the same press. The pacha has likewise ordered the publication of works on scientific and commercial subjects. Several books on geometry, astronomy, surgery, and grammar, have made their appearance at Cairo within the last few months. The great work of Makrizi, illustrative of the history and statistics of the country which he so ably governs, is the last book which his highness has ordered to be printed.

BRIDGES OF IRON WIRE.—The use of iron wire bridges is becoming general in France. They are at this moment constructing two on the Rhone, and many others are ordered for different rivers. They are very light, of comparatively small expense, and yet it is said that in durability they will equal more weighty constructions.

STEAM VESSELS OF WAR.—The French minister of marine having instituted a scientific examination of certain steam-engines, invented by a French engineer named Frimot, has given orders for them to be applied to two frigates, which will be constructed at Brest for the purpose.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Book of the Boudoir.—This somewhat curious title is unworthy of the book to which it appertains; that is, if we are correct in our understanding of its import, when we suppose it to signify that the "Book of the Boudoir" is intended only to maintain a place in the exclusive rooms of the gentler sex, and puts forth no claims to the attention of the rougher part of creation. On the contrary, Lady Morgan's two volumes are worthy of so large a share of any body's time as is required for their perusal; not only for the sake of the amusing light they throw upon herself, her habits, character, and mode of thinking; but also for the really curious and entertaining quality of their contents, considered with reference to people and things in general. The "Book of the Boudoir," consists simply of reflections, illustrated by anecdotes, and of anecdotes leading to reflections; desultory indeed, but full of piquant touches of character and incident, and curious turns of thought. Perhaps there is no other woman living so well calculated by nature, education, and circumstances, to write a book of this description; her talents are by all admitted to be considerable; her style of thinking and of writing is, to say the least, original; and she has enjoyed for many years a most extensive and familiar intercourse with nearly all the prominent personages, not only of her own country, but of all Europe. Besides all this, she comes recommended to us Americans by a distinguishing characteristic not possessed to the same extent by any other European writer of her sex; namely, the tone of liberality which marks her writings. In fact, Lady Morgan may truly be called the champion of liberality in every thing; religion, government, law, manners, fashions, and even physic. The evidences of this spirit may be found in almost every page of the work before us, together with much information that is amusing, some that is valuable, and ideas which are likely to bring profit in their acquisition. In short, there is more good sense in these volumes than in half a dozen novels, and therefore we recommend them to our readers, cordially and with sincerity.

Masaniello.—Green-room report speaks highly of the forthcoming drama of Masaniello, which has been in preparation since the commencement of the season. The dresses are said to be of the most magnificent description, and the scenery to reflect additional credit on the already high reputation of the artists of the Park theatre. The story of Masaniello has been often dramatized, first by an anonymous author, who is said to have been an eye witness of the extraordinary revolution which happened at Naples in 1647, and secondly, by the celebrated D'Arfey. In the present day, in Europe, it has furnished the subject for tragedy, opera, melo-drama, and ballet. The romantic history of Masaniello was represented last spring in Paris at five different houses, and in London at three, at all of which, for many nights, it attracted crowded assemblies.

Hopkins Robertson.—The late Mr. Robertson was a tragedian of no ordinary talents, while his private virtues and modest deportment endeared him to all who knew him. With respect to personal and intellectual gifts, whether we speak of him as a player or a man, he stood deservedly high. At the awful conflagration of the Richmond theatre, his courage, coolness, and presence of mind, preserved a number of valuable lives; and, on a more recent occasion, the same qualities rendered him the most efficient, if not the sole instrument, in rescuing the Park theatre from impending destruction.

Mr. Robertson was not only a tragedian, but he also filled some characters in light comedy and farce, with commendable humour and effect. His country boys, in particular, were always witnessed with approbation. As a buffo singer, likewise, his attempts were generally successful. A short time before he took his final leave of the boards, an evening was fixed for his benefit, and he expressed a wish to introduce a new comic song, in the character of a western rifleman. In compliance with his wishes, Mr. Woodworth wrote the "Hunters of Kentucky," a characteristic song, which has since obtained a popularity unequalled in this country. Mr. Robertson, however, did not live to take his benefit or sing the song, and the contemplated appeal to his friends was afterwards made in behalf of his widow and orphan children.

Mr. R. was an excellent reader, and possessed a fine literary taste, though but little known to the public as a writer. He sometimes, however, enjoyed a smile from the muses, and contributed occasionally to our miscellaneous periodicals. The following enigma, found among his papers after his demise, is now published for the first time, as a specimen of his talent in that species of composition. The solution is a goose-quill.

In infancy I used to brave
The dangers of the ocean wave;
And oft, in youth, with filial care,
My parent's weight have helped to bear.
To form me nature took delight,
And kindly dress'd me up in white;
On every side, with fringes graced
My slender, tall, and tapering waist.
But tyrant man my worth espied,
And plucked me from my parent's side!
What wonder then I look so thin?
The tyrant stripp'd me to the skin;
And then, with heart more hard than stone,
He drew the marrow from my bone.
To vex me more, he took a freak,
And slit my tongue to make me speak;
Yet what more wonderful appears,
I speak to eyes, and not to ears;
Man oft employs me in disguise,
And makes me tell a thousand lies.

Fanny.—The perusal of the following communication threw us into a most pitiable perplexity, which lasted exactly thirteen minutes and fifty-three seconds—bating some odd fractions—when we were relieved by the entrance of a very clever correspondent, who is an adept on all such subjects. We immediately handed it to him, with our earnest entreaty that he would peruse it with attention, and reply to it with candour. He has done so, as will be seen by his remarks below.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MY DEAR MR. EDITOR.—You are doubtless aware, that excessive sensibility and superlative refinement, are the prevailing fashions of the present day; and that, in the intercourse of polished society, a gentleman's attentions to a lady are so animated and tender, that were they estimated by the standard of our grandfathers, they might be mistaken for unequivocal proofs of something more solid than the gratification of a passing hour. Part of your paper, my dear sir, is devoted to my own sex, and it no doubt possesses considerable influence upon public feeling; we therefore may refer to you for the solution of some nice points of etiquette or enigmatical ceremony. If you will take our cause into consideration, and exert yourself in our behalf, I promise, in the name of your female readers, the most grateful thanks, and sweetest smiles of approbation. I am generally called a fine girl, and considered handsome and accomplished; that is, my appearance is not particularly disagreeable, and I have all the fashionable chit-chat of the day at my tongue's end; I read all the new novels as they appear, walk, dance, and sing with as much animation as the laws of society will allow. I have many admirers, (or friends in the modern acceptance of the word) and though I have reached twenty years and am still unmarried, I am neither heart-broken nor desponding. But, sir, the evil to which I am about to direct your attention, is one that is daily gaining ground with the most fearful rapidity, and if not suppressed, or rather, eradicated, will assuredly break the hearts of at least one half of "love's shining circle." Judge therefore for yourself, does it not require some prompt and efficient remedy? To explain my meaning more fully, I will give you my own story by way of example.

About a twelvemonth since, I became acquainted with a young gentleman, extremely handsome, refined, and, above all, sentimental. A certain indescribable something mutually attracted us, and I soon became the object of his undivided attention. He walked, danced, and talked with me, wrote poetry feelingly, was continually at my side, and, as my nature is candid, I openly expressed the pleasure his society afforded me, and the gratification I received thereby. An attachment was supposed by our friends to exist between us; and, though no engagement had been made, I was happy with anticipation. But, alas! time has unravelled the mystery. I passed the summer months at a short distance from the city; but I have been at home at least six weeks, during which time, my friend, lover, or admirer, has not made his appearance! That he is aware of my return is evident enough, as I met him carelessly passing down Broadway a few days after; but why I am so deserted, is altogether unaccountable, unless he be one of those persons whose fine and delicate feelings spurn the control of reason, and must therefore be eccentrically capricious. I cannot accuse myself of any omission or default, nor can I so far transgress the retiring delicacy of my sex as to inquire into the mystery: it must therefore remain a paradox. But this is not the worst—do not imagine my affections are blighted in their dawning, or my hopes so withered they cannot bloom again, oh, no! I am not in love, but it is my pride that suffers—I am obliged to sit at home in single blessedness, or enter into company where my appearance is no longer the signal for merriment; my chair is no longer surrounded; no one listens to my observations, and I am neglected or forgotten. It is all owing to the most vexatious errors and misconstructions; the gentlemen regard me as a finished coquette, who encouraged the attentions of a manly and feeling heart, merely to amuse myself, to wound and disappoint him; nothing was ever more opposite to my nature; I was willing enough to retain him.

Now, dear Mr. Editor, will you take the matter under your serious consideration, and draw out for us those rules of conduct which are proper to be observed. I am convinced, such a reverence is felt for your opinions, that if you would only comply with my desire, you would in a short time have the satisfaction of seeing them adopted. Do inform us of all those little minutiae of civilities, significant or insignificant, which may serve to denote to ourselves and our neighbours, who is, or who is not our lover, and how he may be distinguished from our friend. We will have them transcribed upon our fans, and carry them abroad in our reticules; and before we venture in future to accept the attendance of a friend, escort, or lover, con them over, and see how they rank upon the scale of merit. It will be the most essential benefit you can perform, and the happiness you will ensure for us astonishing, the mistakes thereby prevented incalculable: we will never smile, speak, or blush at an improper moment. And be particular upon the head of balls, it was there I unwittingly subjected myself to all this anxiety. Do not delay, dear sir. I will not make my appearance again in the polite circle of exquisite fashion, until I am armed on all sides by the infallible prescriptions of your ordeal.

FANNY.

REMARKS BY OUR CORRESPONDENT.—These men, dear Fanny, are sad fellows, and I sincerely sympathise with you on the mortifying dilemma to which you have been subjected by the cruel thoughtlessness of a male coquette; or what a fair minstrel, who occasionally enriches the columns of the Mirror, once called a vampyre. It is a subject of gratulation, however, that you have prudently preserved your heart, not permitting your affections to become engaged previous to a formal declaration. Would every fair candidate for hymeneal felicity but take the same precaution, there would be fewer disappointments recorded in the annals of Cupid. The heart once gone, without a quid pro quo, and the wreck of happiness is complete.

"For woman, dear woman, ne'er traffice by measure,
But risks her whole heart without counting the cost,
And if the loved youth whom she trusts with the treasure,
Be faithless or worthless, her capital's lost."

But even the precaution above recommended is not, it seems, always sufficient to prevent "vexatious errors and misconstructions," provokingly annoying to the tranquillity of the innocent fair one. What then is to be done in a case of such delicate difficulty, and difficult delicacy? Where marriage is to depend upon contingencies, social intercourse between the parties is indispensable in order to study each other's characters, dispositions, and intellectual endowments, previous to forming a contract which no bankrupt or insolvent law, or two-third act can ever annul, and which nothing but the chancery court of death can reverse or set aside. How, then, are the rest of the world to be persuaded and convinced that declarations and avowals are not the certain and necessary results of such preliminary intercourse? The intrinsic value of a hat, a shawl, or a pillarine, is not thought to be lessened, merely because it has been previously examined and priced by some other fair customer. How then can the worth of a lady's heart be reduced by the same process? But nil desperandum; Fanny has asked for advice, and, such as it is, she shall have it.

Let unmarried females, from the age of sixteen and upwards, in every city, town, and village, form societies called the "Female-anti-flirtation-society," with appropriate diplomas and certificates of membership. Let the constitution of such societies, under heavy penalties, prohibit its members from dancing, walking, riding, or visiting any place of public amusement with a gentleman who does not first produce the diploma or certificate of an "anti-make-the-girls-believe-we-love-them society," which will be the natural and necessary consequence of the female institution. After complying with this preliminary, if the parties should not happen to like each other's style of dancing, conversation, &c., let them "cast off, change partners," and try again. Their diplomas will be sufficient vouchers that such temporary intercourse has not committed either party. Fanny may depend upon it that these anti-societies can perform wonders, and if they continue to increase, the age of miracles will have come again.

MISCELLANY.

SILENCE BROKEN.

My harp in long repose has slumber'd,
And poppy wreaths are twining round it;
Hush'd are the tones which once it number'd,
And chill'd the hand which used to sound it.
I little thought again to crown
Its shatter'd frame with leaves of bay;
But, asked by thee, I take it down,
And dash the gather'd dust away.

With faltering hand the chords I try,
And to departed measures turn;—
Hark! to your wish the strings reply,
And with their former rapture burn.
Still those remember'd notes I hear,
The prelude of love's early vow,
When first my bosom held thee dear,—
Dear then, but, oh! far dearer now.

One call alone o'er me has power,
As Mammon's image heard but one;
Silent until its fated hour,
Then vocal only to the sun.
For when the god of glory woke,
Fresh inspiration from him flow'd;
Warm'd by his gleams the marble spoke,
And with its wonted music glow'd.

THE COURTIER AND THE EXECUTIONER.

COMMUNICATED TO THE LONDON COURT JOURNAL,
BY A FOREIGNER OF DISTINCTION.

The representation of a melo-dramatic piece, entitled "Polder, ou, le Bourreau d'Amsterdam," by the French players, the other evening, has revived in my recollection a singular traditional anecdote, the authenticity of which may be depended on.

One night in the spring of 1720, some young men of quality, returning from a supper in the Quartier du Marais, which was then a fashionable part of Paris, were surprised, on passing through a by-street, to hear the sound of music at so late an hour. Approaching the house whence it proceeded, they soon discovered that a numerous party were amusing themselves with a dance.

Flushed by wine, and prompted by the confidence naturally inspired by high rank, they thought it would be an amusing adventure to join the party. They accordingly knocked at the door, and without ceremony entered the house. The company was numerous, and the presence of the intruders excited no particular notice: it was supposed they were introduced by some friends of the bride or bride-groom; for it was the celebration of a marriage which had taken place in the morning.

Charmed with the beauty of the bride, one of the strangers approached her, and, after paying her many extravagant compliments, at length launched into a passionate declaration of love, which astonished no less than it offended the object to whom it was addressed. Attributing her blushes and embarrassment to a sentiment very different from indignation, the intruder followed her to her apartment, whither she fled to avoid his importunity. Here his protestations were renewed more earnestly than before. The terrified young lady, with tears and threats, endeavoured to prevail on him to withdraw; but, deaf to all her remonstrances, he seized her in his arms, and presumed to imprint a kiss on her lips. She shrieked violently, and her father and husband immediately flew to her assistance. Her bridal wreath strewn on the ground, her tears, her agitation and death-like paleness, bore sufficient evidence of the outrage. The offender was seized in spite of his resistance and the efforts which his companions made to defend him. They drew their swords, but were speedily disarmed; and the father of the bride interrogated them with those feelings of indignation which their disgraceful conduct naturally inspired, and which were increased when he learned that they had introduced themselves into his house without being known to any of the company.

The friends of the family were about to inflict summary chastisement on the offenders, who at length thought it advisable to acknowledge that they were men of rank, and that their families enjoyed high consideration at the French court. One was the young duke de Crillon, another the marquis de la Farre, and the most guilty of the three, the count de Lally-Tollendal.

"If your rank be as elevated as you describe," said the master of the house, addressing them with indignation, "you ought to respect yourselves, which is the surest way of gaining the respect of others. Your conduct is unpardonable, and would well justify me in suffering my friends to avenge the insult you have offered to my children;—which is the more atrocious as you were aware of the sacred bond by which they are united. But men who evince such evil dispositions at your early period of life, will sooner or later dishonour the names they bear. Unbridled passion will lead them from crime to crime, until at length they fall into the hands of him whose duty it is to inflict the severest penalty of the law. You are, you say, noblemen of the court; and I am Sanson, the executioner of Paris. Instantly quit this house, which you have profaned by your presence, and tremble lest, when we meet again, my prediction may be fulfilled!"

Few are ignorant of the final fate of count Arthur de Lally-Tollendal. He was born at Romans in Dauphiné, and was the son of Sir Gerard Lally, the descendant of a noble Irish family. At the age of eighteen he became a captain of grenadiers in Dillon's Irish regiment, and was shortly after sent by Cardinal de Fleury on a mission to the court of Russia, where his high talents and handsome person won the good graces of empress Anne, as well as of her favourite, the duke of Courland.

Having fulfilled this mission in a highly satisfactory manner, he was, on his return home, made colonel of an Irish regiment, which bore his name. The manoeuvres which he executed at Fontenoy, according to the report of Marshal de Saxe, contributed to the gaining of the victory, and he was raised to the rank of brigadier on the field of battle. He then joined the fortunes of Prince Edward, whom he followed to Scotland, and whom he served in the quality of aide-du-camp at the battle of Falkirk. He was made a field-marshal after the taking of Maestricht; afterwards created a lieutenant-general, with the grand cross of the order of St. Louis; and he was subsequently appointed, by the king, commander-in-chief of the French settlements in the East Indies. For a time fortune favoured him, and in thirty-eight days after he had landed to fulfil his new appointment, he made himself master of fort St. David, surnamed the Bergen-op-Zoom of India, and of all the southern coast of Coromandel.

But obstacles arose before him, which not even his courage could surmount; and he could not defeat the numerous enemies whom his violent temper and uncompromising nature stirred up against him. Instead of endeavouring to smooth away gently and gradually the evils which had crept into the administration of the French settlements in India, he obstinately persisted in striking at their very roots. Thus he was thwarted in his plans, and his hitherto glorious career was succeeded by an uninterrupted series of misfortunes.

He was made prisoner at Pondicherry, and was obliged to surrender the place to the English, after having defended it to the last extremity.

After he was conveyed to England, he learned that a plot was fomenting against him at the French court, and he obtained permission from the English ministry to proceed to France on his parole. He hastened to Versailles to clear himself of the accusations brought against him. He was, however, arrested and thrown into the bastille, on the charge of extortion and high treason; and, in spite of his long and brilliant services, the king's conviction of his innocence,* and the eloquent defence of the Avocat-General Sequin, his enemies triumphed, and he was condemned to the block.

When the count had received from his confessor the last consolations of religion, the door of his cell opened, and a man entered, holding in his hand a stone, which was to be put into the mouth of the prisoner to prevent him from uttering any complaints when drawn on a wretched hurdle to the scaffold. The man advanced to perform his cruel office. "One more act of submission to the will of the Almighty," said the confessor. The count turned, and raising his eyes towards the executioner, recognised Sanson, whose daughter he had insulted twenty years before!†

* Seven months after his execution, Louis IV. remarked in confidence to the Duke de Noailles, that he had been murdered; and four years afterwards he publicly said to the Chancellor Meaupou, "You have to answer for it before God, not I."

† The Marquis de Lally-Tollendal, son of the above, a peer of France, and member of the French Academy, in his earliest boyhood formed the determination of rendering justice to the memory of his father. He was powerfully aided by Voltaire, who entertained no less horror of judicial murders than of religious massacres. The French courts of law resounded with the complaints of filial piety, and justice and humanity finally triumphed.

Voltaire, who was on his death-bed when he heard of the decree of the council which abrogated the parliamentary decree, sat up and wrote the following note to M. de Lally:

"This great news raises up the dying man. He affectionately embraces Monsieur de Lally. He sees that the king is the defender of justice, and he will now die content."

Voltaire expired four days after.

LORD BYRON'S PORTRAY.—An article of great curiosity and interest, being the first known attempt at poetry by Lord Byron, will appear in the forthcoming volume of Ackerman's Forget-me-not. It is copied from the autograph of the poet, and certified by the lady to whom it was addressed—the "Mary," who was the object of his earliest, and perhaps, of his only real attachment, and whom he has celebrated in several of his poems—as having been written when he left Annesley, the residence of her family.

THE AMULET.—For one of the illustrations to adorn the London Amulet for 1829, Le Keux, the engraver, was paid one hundred and eighty guineas! It was from a drawing by Martin.

INGENIOUS.—Richard Ward, a very ingenious mechanic of Salem Bridge, Conn. has lately invented a clock which winds itself up. It keeps correct time, strikes the hour regularly, and will continue to run until worn out without the application of any power to it.

PREACHING.—A clergyman who officiates in the diocese of Winchester, was lately complained of by certain of his parishioners for that he, the said vicar, preached sermons not exceeding fifteen minutes in length. The bishop admonished him to preach sermons of a greater length. The obedient vicar, the next Sunday, preached a sermon two hours long, which set all his congregation a gaping. On the ensuing Sunday, after reading the lessons, he retired and placed the keys of the church in his pocket, and, ascending the pulpit, he informed his audience of the fact, and withal, that he should preach to them for three hours. This he did, and his hearers afterwards besought him to return to his pristine mode of preaching.

COUNT DIEBITSCH.—The Russian general Count Diebitsch is under fifty years of age, a German by birth, a soldier of fortune, and son-in-law of the famous Barclay de Tolly.

EFFECT OF FLATTERY.—In a certain burgh town in Scotland, there existed in the days of yore a member of the learned profession who was called to the command of a company of volunteers. This individual, though in every respect a most excellent character, piqued himself upon his appearance in his martial garb. One day on returning from parade, he thus accosted his sergeant: "Well, Sergeant Morrison, how did I look in the field to-day?" "Why," responded the sergeant, "your honour looked like Julius Cæsar at the head of the Roman army." "Jenny! bring Sergeant Morrison the remains of the goose and a bottle of porter."

TEMPERANCE.—"I feel quite unwell, and will take a little brandy and water," said a member of a temperance society, who had promised to use no ardent spirits unless he was sick. "I am very unwell, my dear; hand me a little more brandy."—"Here is the brandy," said the wife, "but I wish the society further, for you have not had a well day since you joined it."

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.—There were guillotined in France, between the 21st of September, 1792, and 25th of October, 1795, eighteen thousand six hundred and thirteen persons. A dictionary, containing the names, designations, and date of execution, has been published; it fills two octavo volumes, five hundred pages each, closely printed in double columns.

RINGWORMS.—A writer in the Boston Gazette, says that the disagreeable and unsightly affection of the skin, usually called ringworms, may be entirely cured by rubbing the part affected on retiring to bed, for several nights in succession, with unguentum citrinum, or yellow ointment. The writer was much troubled with ringworms, and after using this remedy one week, found the disease entirely eradicated, and his skin as smooth as that of any other person. We understand the same remedy has been prescribed by some physicians with the desired success.

A short time ago a gamekeeper in Worcester saw a snake and a magpie engaged "in mortal combat." He shot them both, and has had them stuffed in the attitude in which he first saw them.

To-morrow is a fine gentleman, who makes many promises—To-day is a plain man, who never breaks his word.

He who hopes for glory by new discoveries, must not be ignorant of old ones.

He pays dear for his bread who lives by another's bounty.

Why is the tongue like a race-horse? Because the less weight it carries the faster it goes.

LOVE.

Love knocked at the door of my heart one day,
When my pulse with youth beat high;
Saying, "Let me in, good sir, I pray,
"I have wandered far, and I've lost my way,
"O do not put me by!"

"That tale," said I, "I have heard before,
"And it made my poor heart yearn,
"So I let you in at its widest door,
"And pined your case till my eyes ran o'er;
"But what was the kind return?"

"While I nestled you there with a fond desire
"To lighten your spirit's load,
"You set the combustible dwelling on fire,
"Then laughed till you cried, with a joyance higher
"Than your mother at Ida showed.

"And when Reason came with her stores of snow
"To proffer her wintry aid,
"You wickedly bent a trusty bow
"And laid her dead on the spot. I throw
"Ye're an archer, rogue, by trade.

"Grief came with her tears like a friend well tried,
"Kindly though sad of soul,
"But you stealthily stole to her gentle side,
"And dashed down her urn with its precious tide;
"So the fabric was burnt to a coal.

"And now that poor Hope, whom your wanton guile
"Left houseless and homeless then,
"Has returned and rebuilt the ruinous pile,
"And lit it up with her radiant smile,
"Do you think to deceive me again?"

"What! Hope returned—and now your guest?
"O do, sir, let me in!
"She's a sister of mine, and I cannot rest
"Till I fold her again to my brotherly breast—
"And her gentle pardon win."

So I lifted the latch of my heart once more;
For how could I be unkind?
But Hope, who had known of his guile before,
Flew tremblingly out at the other door,
And Love—he lingered behind!

PROTEUS.

SLEEP.

Oh, gentle sleep—nature's soft nurse!
How have I frightened thee—that thou no more Wilt weigh my eyelids down, and Steep my senses in forgetfulness?—Shakespeare.

Close, weary eyes, and seek in sleep
Release from sorrow and from pain,
From withering feelings, buried deep,
And thoughts that rack the brain.

Close, weary orbs—the tears that rise
Soothe not my pain nor heal my grief;
Cease, tears, to dim these saddened eyes,
Ye bring me no relief.

Close, weary eyes, oh, close in sleep!
The only joy that now can bless,
Is when in slumber, still and deep,
I lose all consciousness.

Vainly I speak, the burning lids
Close o'er my aching balls in vain,
The power of racking thought forbids
Sleep's soft and silent reign.

Oh sleep! how many a treasure lies
Within thy broad and vast domain,
How many airy phantasies
Come thronging o'er the brain!

Visions of things too beautiful
To be beheld by mortal eye,
And dreams of happiness too full,
Come softly gliding by.

Then come! and bring the joys that yet
Thy power can on this heart bestow,
That blest in thee I may forget
Awhile all waking woe.

Ah! so few beams of happiness
Upon my darkened pathway gleam.
That I their influence can bless
Though felt but in a dream.

THYRA.

STANZAS.

I turn and turn, but find no ray!—Young.
No cloud displays its fairy sail
Along the beamy air,
Beauty is in the sleeping vale,
And joy comes laughing on the gale,
That softly whispers there.

But wherefore falls the frequent tear
From this once mirthful eye?
Is it that thoughts of friendship's bier,
Where sleep the lovely and the dear,
Throng fast and solemn by?

Ah, no; for they again shall rise
At the appointed hour;
And seraph-wafted to the skies,
With guiltless heart and tearless eyes,
Their blissful peans pour.

Alas, it is that memory's wing
Breaks conscience-troubled rest,
Who deeper strikes each poisoned sting.
That lies all still and cankering,
Within my youthful breast.

I had a high and glorious dream
Of hope and heaven combined;
'Tis vanished like the meteor beam,
That flashes from the midnight stream,
And leaves all dark behind.

Fled are the joys of joyous prime,
Despair's dread scourge before;
The visions of that glorious clime,
So bright, so holy, so sublime,
Will never glad me more.

The cup of bliss that mercy gave,
I reckless dash'd from her;
And now, alas, no power can save
My spirit from that darkest grave—
Hope's living sepulchre.

Ashamed to live, afraid to die,
The trembling child of scorn,
I mark the hast'ning hours sweep by,
With many a sad and sickening sigh,
Bewildered and forlorn.

'Twere gain to die, if death were all
The penance and the pain;
But lo, the resurrection's call
Shall pierce the charnel's silent hall,
And I must grieve again.

There's not a ray of hope for me,
Nor peaceful hour below.
Terrific thought—that I must be,
Through life the sport of misery,
In death—the heir of woe!

SKETCH.

"And dreams in their development have breath
And tears and tortures and the touch of joy."

CHANGES come over all things. But a little while, and it was summer. The skies were blue and beautiful, and the fleecy clouds did but dim for a moment the bright sunbeams, or rest a while to give the earth refreshing showers, and then passed away. But now it is autumn: the air late so soft and balmy is chilled, and the breeze comes whistling onward as though it would tell of winter. The leaves of the young trees have the yellow hue which precedes death. I too am changed, and the living world around me. Time was when the passing year scarce claimed a thought; while fancy pictured for the coming one many a sweet scene, and many a joyous hour. But now, such visions are no more. For me the future offers no joy. It is buried in the deep bosom of the past. And what are the joys of this life? Dreams—idle dreams—bubbles with which we amuse ourselves after we have given up in contempt the sports of childhood. Springing from a breath, rising into beauty, reflecting each ray of fancy in vivid and varying colours, and vanishing at the touch of reality for ever. So has my youth been spent. And why should I complain that its dreams have not been realized? They were as baseless as the visions of sleep, and with the dawn of time they have passed away.

Of what were those dreams? Were they of that boundless world in which we are to dwell when time shall be no more? Alas! they were limited to this little earth, to that point of future already become the past. I sometimes dwelt with rapture on joys which ambition alone can offer. I saw myself a warrior and a conqueror. The world bowed before me, for I was its master. The rich and the good loved me, for I was their friend. The poor and the unfortunate blessed me, for I was their benefactor. I awoke from this dream, for my country was free and happy, and warriors were no longer necessary. Again, I was a statesman. I mingled in the councils of older men, whose age lost its influence before the persuasive eloquence of my voice. Enemies I had not, for I was just and honourable. Flatterers there could not be where flattery was despised, and though private misfortunes might assail me, I was the instrument of good, and therefore happy. I walked forth into the world with this dream before me. To realize it was the object of my daily and nightly study. I was not idle. The sun as he rose found me at my desk, and the wiser for the deep studies I had pursued for many hours after he had last sunk to repose. I studied my fellow-men, in public and in private; but what did it avail me? I had neither riches nor powerful friends. I was averse to intrigue, and while I laboured to penetrate the feelings of others, I forgot I had yet to learn to disguise my own. I saw daily and hourly men of inferior attainments to my own, step before me into office, and laugh at the efforts of him who depended on himself alone in his path of ambition. I was disgusted with my disappointments, but reflected that even had I succeeded, I might not have been happy.

I next endeavoured to win the favours of fortune, but they invariably eluded my grasp. I then cast from my heart ambition and avarice and pride. But in its inmost depths there was a store of fond affection, and to that I looked for happiness. One by one did death snatch from me the loveliest and best beloved. I gaze upon the few that remain and dare not call them mine, lest his envious grasp should seize them also. Of that the world styles friendship I have never tasted, but in my dreams. Those with whom I have thought I could enjoy it, I have tested, and found insincere or insensible. Of love I have also dreamed, but never did I try to win the heart I would have prized; for of those gifts which should have been bestowed in return, I had none to offer. I had neither wealth nor laurels, and I could not have asked that being of purity and truth to share the fate of an unknown wanderer.

Such have been the dreams in which I have revelled while the hours of youth, which should have been spent in acquiring strength to resist and wisdom to despise the disappointments of life, were rapidly gliding away. How many are there who thus lay plans for their future course of life, the accomplishment of which they are doomed never to see? But there are instances in which men have attained the object of their ambition. Are such always happy? This reflection recalled to my memory the fate of two friends, whom I had loved when a boy at school, with ardour and sincerity. Memory vividly portrayed the long low-roofed building between whose narrow walls we would often sit for hours, poring over old books, or listening to some dry, tedious lecture, while every tongue was ready to utter exclamations of impatience, and every foot ready to bound forth as soon as the magic word was uttered which gave it freedom. How well do I recollect the little shaded walk, the favourite resort of my two friends and myself, to which we would daily repair, and converse upon the busy world without, and our future parts upon its great stage. How distinct is the image which fancy gives me of my friend Edgar Lewis. A bright and beautiful boy, with his free laugh and sportive jest, the gayest and merriest of us all.

"I am to be a merchant," he would say; "I will win the smiles of fortune, and while you are toiling in your lonely study to gain the plaudits of the world for your eloquence and wisdom, I will walk forth in the busy haunts of men and lavish around me the treasures I have made my own. I will seek out the needy artist, who languishes for opportunities to pursue his studies, and under my protecting care he will rise to fame and opulence. I will publish the works of the modest poet, whose poverty has made him humble, and when he receives the praises of the multitude, my reward shall be his grateful smile and the prayers of his happy heart. I will be the friend of the poor of every class, and I shall envy neither the powerful nor the wise, for I shall be called the good."

"It is a beautiful theory," was my answer; "and you, Sedley, what will you be?"

Alfred Sedley was a small delicately formed boy, with deep blue eyes and lips like a girl; and as I saw his blushing cheek and tearful eye, I almost knew what would be the purport of his answer.

"I would be virtuous," also said he, gently; "but I would have others, too, share with me its rewards. Who is happier," and his eyes would glisten as he spoke, "than he that sees around him beloved beings who live but in his smile, and depend upon him for support and happiness? I would be the husband of a tender and gentle wife, who would share with me my joys, console me in my misfortunes, and in every scene be my companion and my friend. Under our joint care would my children reach maturity, beloved and esteemed for their acquirements and solid worth."

When we had finished our studies at school, I separated from my friends to pursue my path in a different quarter of the world. Many years after, I had occasion to visit the place in which I had passed my youth. My first inquiry was for Lewis. I had little trouble in finding his residence, for he had reached the goal for which he had sighed, and was noted for his wealth and vast possessions. But I found him changed indeed. Though scarcely in the prime of life, he appeared old and almost infirm. His brow was thoughtful—his large dark eyes heavy and dim. The bright smile of his youth had passed away, and his mouth wore an expression of suffering and bitter cares. He was surrounded with splendour, but he was alone and dejected. He appeared pleased to see me, and invited me to make his house my home during my stay in the city. But after the novelty of my appearance had passed away, he evidently felt my presence a restraint upon him, regarded me with distrust, and fancied some hidden reproach in each casual word that escaped me. I discovered that he was a prey to remorse and suspicion. None were his friends, for his desire for wealth that he might bestow it upon others, had been changed before the magic influence of gold into rapacity and avarice, and he never felt the pleasure of relieving the unfortunate. He enjoyed not his wealth, for he was haunted by the conviction of a future punishment for the frauds of which he had been guilty to obtain it; and as I bade him farewell, I envied not his fate.

I next inquired for my friend Sedley. Surely, thought I, he must be happy, for his wishes were humble and their gratification easy. I learned from a common friend, that he had married an amiable and interesting woman, and been the father of two boys whom he had idolized. Alas! Who are happy whose idols are of this world! Never did that father gaze on his boys without a thrill of agony, lest some sorrow might assail them. Daily did he watch their growth and improvement, and as each day discovered to him some new charm of their infant minds, the ties of love twined themselves closer around his heart, soon to be lacerated by the rude tearing away of all its fondly nourished hopes. The eldest, a boy of brilliant talents, whose mind was rapidly expanding beneath the parent's eyes, and promised rich fruit in ripper years, died of an infectious fever, from which his brother escaped with life only to fall by the slower but as certain poison of consumption. Poor Sedley. As he turned away from the graves of the lovely boys with an almost broken heart, he first marked the change which grief had made in his beloved wife. Gradually did she fade under its secret influence; and though by forced smiles she would fain have cheered her husband, he could not be deceived. Day after day did he note her faltering step and weakened powers; and when at last she sunk under her disease, his hand alone smoothed her pillow and administered to her wants. While she lived, his fate scarce seemed to him worth a moment's thought; she alone occupied his mind. To every thing else he was indifferent, as though he had been chilled into stone. Even her death failed to rouse him from this apathy in which he had so long been plunged. He would watch by her inanimate body, and talk to it as if it were animated by a living soul. But when they tore it from his arms—when the first sound of the falling clay upon the coffin which enclosed the remains of all he loved reached his ears—then did his grief, so long concentrated deep in his heart, burst forth with cries of mortal agony, and Sedley—the pious Sedley—became a maniac!

"Is this thy justice, oh heaven!" would he exclaim. "Is this thy mercy, to rend the hearts of those that loved and trusted thee! To leave me in this dismal world, bereaved of all that made it to me a paradise!"

Long, long did his grief continue, with undiminished strength; but it yielded at last to time and the gentle soothing of kind friends. He felt that his treasures had not been "laid in heaven;" that his fancied humility had been the pride of a happy heart; and he bowed before the chastening hand of Him whose punishments are just; and ere he expired with the joyful hope of rejoining his beloved wife in a happier world, did he confess the folly of human wishes and the frailty of human virtue.

When I first learned his unhappy fate, I wept in the bitterness of regret; but now as I reflect on it, I appreciate its moral. May it teach me to be contented with my own.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

RULES FOR PRESERVING THE SIGHT.

THE preservation of the sight is an object of so much importance to every individual, whatever may be his profession or rank in society, that we have thought a few hints in relation to this subject might be productive of beneficial effects.

It is well known to the physician that nothing more certainly impairs the sense of vision than debauchery and excess of every kind. The individual, therefore, who would preserve his sight unimpaired, must avoid carefully every species of intemperance. This is an all-important rule, a neglect of which will render every other of but little avail.

A long continuance in absolute darkness, or frequent and protracted exposure to a blaze of light, equally injures the sense of vision.

Persons who live almost constantly in dark caverns or chambers, workers in mines, and prisoners who have been long confined in gloomy dungeons, become incapable of seeing objects distinctly excepting in a deep shade, or in the dusk of the evening. While on the other hand, in various parts of the world, in which the light is constantly reflected from a soil of dazzling whiteness, or from mountains and plains covered with almost perpetual snow, the sight of the inhabitants is perfect only in broad daylight, or at noon.

Those, also, who are much exposed to bright fires, as blacksmiths, glassmen, forgers, and others engaged in similar employments, are considered, by the best authorities, as most subject to loss of sight from cataract.

All brilliantly illuminated apartments have a similar prejudicial effect upon the eyes, though, undoubtedly, not to the same extent. As a general rule, therefore, the eye should never be permitted to dwell on brilliant or glaring objects for any length of time. Hence in our apartments only a moderate degree of light should be admitted; and it would be of considerable advantage, particularly to those whose eyes are already weak, if in place of a pure white or deep red colour for the walls, curtains, and other furniture of our rooms, some shade of green were to be adopted.

Reading or writing in the dusk of the evening, or by candle-light, is highly prejudicial. The frivolous attention to a quarter of an hour at the decline of day, has deprived numbers of the perfect and comfortable use of their eyes for many years: the mischief is effected imperceptibly, the consequences are often irreparable.

There is nothing which preserves the sight longer, than always using, in reading, writing, sewing, and every other occupation in which the eyes are constantly exercised, that moderate degree of light which is best suited to them; too little strains them, too great a quantity dazzles and confounds them. The eyes are less affected, however, by a deficiency of light than by the excess of it. The former seldom does much if any harm, unless the eyes are strained by efforts to view objects to which the degree of light is inadequate—but too great a quantity has, by its own power, destroyed the sight.

The long-sighted should accustom themselves to read with rather less light, and with the book somewhat nearer to the eye than they ordinarily desire; while those that are short-sighted should, on the contrary, use themselves to read with the book as far off as possible. By these means both may improve and strengthen their vision, whereas a contrary course will increase its natural imperfections.

Bathing the eyes daily in cold or tepid water tends to preserve the integrity of their functions; provided, however, the individual does not immediately after such bathing enter a warm room, or unnecessarily exert his sight. Journal of Health.

THE EXPERIENCE OF HOWARD.

With the name and character of the philanthropic Howard, all our readers must be intimately acquainted. The following extracts from a communication made by him to Mr. Pratt, exhibit the result of his experience as to the best means of preserving the health and vigour of the body:

"A more puny whipster than myself, in the days of my youth, was never seen. I could not walk out in the evening without being wrapped up: I was, politely speaking, enfeebled enough to have delicate nerves, and was, occasionally, troubled with a very gentle hectic. To be serious, I am convinced, that whatever enfeebles the body debilitates the mind, and renders both unfit for those exertions which are of such use to us all as social beings. I therefore entered upon a reform of my constitution, and have succeeded in such a degree, that I have neither had a cough, cold, the vapours, nor any more alarming disorder, since I surmounted the seasoning. Prior to this, I used to be a miserable dependant on wind and weather; a little too much of the one, or a slight inclemency of the other, would postpone, and frequently prevent, not only my amusements, but my duties: or, if pressed by my affections, or by the necessity of affairs, I did venture forth in despite of the elements, the consequences were equally absurd and inconvenient, not seldom afflictive. I muffled myself up even to my eyebrows; a crack in the glass of my chaise was sufficient to distress me; a sudden slope of the wheels to the right or left, set me a trembling; a jolt seemed like a dislocation, and the sight of a bank or a precipice, near which my horse or carriage was to pass, would disorder me so much, that I would order the driver to stop, that I might get out and walk by the difficult places. Mulled wines, spirituous cordials, and large fires, were to comfort me, and to keep out the cold, as it is called, at every stage, and if I felt the least damp in my feet, or other parts of my body, dry stockings, linen, &c. were to be instantly put on: the perils of the day were to be baffled by something taken hot on going to bed; and before I pursued my journey, the next morning a dram was to be swallowed, in order to fortify the stomach. In a word, I lived, moved, and had my being so much by rule, that the slightest deviation was a disease.

"Every man must, in these cases, be his own physician. He must prescribe for, and practise on, himself. I did this by a very simple, but as you will think, a very severe regimen, namely, by denying myself almost every thing in which I had long indulged. But as it is always harder to get rid of a bad habit, than to contract it, I entered on my reform gradually; that is to say, I began to diminish my usual indulgences by degrees. I found that a heavy meal, or a hearty one, as it is termed, and a cheerful glass, that is, one more than does you good, made me incapable, or at least, disinclined to any useful exertions for some time after dinner hours; and if the dilutive powers of tea assisted to restore my faculties, a luxurious supper came in so close upon it, that I was fit for nothing but dissipation, till I went to bed, where I finished the enervating practices, by sleeping eight, ten, and sometimes a dozen hours on the stretch. You will not wonder that I rose the next morning with the constitution weakened.

"To remedy all this, I ate a little less at every meal, and reduced my drink in proportion. It is really wonderful to consider, how imperceptibly a single morsel of animal food, and a tea-spoonful of liquor deducted from the usual quantity daily, will restore the mental functions, without any injury to the corporeal—nay, with increase of vigour to both. I brought myself, in the first instance, from dining on many dishes, to dining on a few, and then to being satisfied with one; in like manner, instead of drinking a variety of wines, I made my election of a single sort, and adhered to it alone.

"My next business was to eat and drink sparingly of that adopted dish and bottle. My ease, vivacity, health, and spirits augmented. My clothing, &c. underwent a similar reform; the effect of all which is, and has been for many years, that I am neither affected by seeing my carriage dragged up a mountain, or driven down a valley. If an accident happens, I am prepared for it, I mean so far as respects unnecessary terrors; and I am proof against all changes in the atmosphere, wet clothes, damp feet, night air, transitions from heat to cold, and the long train of hypochondria affections."

In his sixty-third year, Howard was in the full possession of his mental and physical powers. He, however, accidentally contracted a malignant fever whilst visiting the sick in an infected district, which terminated his life in a few days. Ibid

THE MESSENGERS OF PRINCE CHARLES.

A TRADITION.

It was early on a summer morning that two highland chieftains parted from Prince Charles Stuart (then wandering among the mountains), with some important communication from him to the few friends who still waited on his fortunes in the lowlands of Scotland. Their path lay through solitudes unvaried except by the gray cairn or the rushing stream. No dwelling met the eye throughout the widest prospect, and there, even at the present day, the sun goes by four months together unhailed by aught of human kind. The travellers, however, cared not for society, and thought not of solitude. They spoke of the scene of their coming labours, and having soon exhausted the common expressions of hope and fear, each, as if by instinct, sought the privacy of his own meditations. In two days they reached the sea-shore, near the village of Helensburgh, and embarked in the boat of an old fisherman, with the intention of crossing to the opposite coast. There is a long sand-bank, which becomes visible at low water, about midway between Port-Glasgow and the village just mentioned. Thither did the fisherman convey the messengers of the prince, and telling them that by keeping to the right they would soon reach the main land, he rowed away, and treacherously left them to their fate. They proceeded first in the direction pointed out, and then in the contrary one, where finding no boundary except the waves, they knew that they were betrayed, and shrieked aloud for assistance, though in vain. The tide rose higher and higher. Neither of them could swim, and the water had reached their faces. Some sailors attracted by their cries put off to save them, but arrived too late. They reported on their return that one of the drowning men raised his hand, which grasped a white substance, and exclaimed ere he sunk for ever, "Here perishes the last hope of my country." Tradition says that this was the written message entrusted to his keeping by the prince, whose success depended on its delivery. Be that as it may, the deep sea has kept the secret to itself, though the mariner still regales his fancy with a shadowy representation of the tragic scene as he passes the fatal bank when the moon is on the waters. The old fisherman's loyalty was so little relished by his fellow-villagers, that he thought proper, it is said, to leave his country for America, which, however, he did not reach, having shared, without the same honour, the watery grave of the chieftains he had so basely betrayed.

NIGHT SONGS OF VENETIAN BOATMEN.

I have this evening heard the celebrated melody to which the Venetian boatmen sing the verses of Tasso and Ariosto. Their night music must be bespoke, as the practice is now of rare occurrence and nearly obsolete. I entered a gondola by moonlight, accompanied by two singers, one at the head, the other at the stern of the boat, where they began to sing alternate verses. The melody, with which Rousseau has made us acquainted, is monotonous and declamatory modulation, somewhat resembling recitative; the tone and measure occasionally varying with the subject of the verse. I was informed, that when these night songs were in general practice, an unemployed boatman, while sitting on the quay, or in his gondola, would sing some well-known verse of Tasso, to the popular melody, and in tones so loud and thrilling, as to reach far over the still surface of the waters. A distant boatman catching the air and words, would then respond with the following verse; the first singer rejoined with the succeeding lines, and the far-off voices fell like echoes on the ears of listeners. These songs were often continued all night, without any fatigue to the performer; and the farther they stood from each other, at any practicable distance, the more enchanting was the effect to the hearers who placed themselves in the middle of the distance to listen with advantage. To demonstrate this effect, the singers landed with me on the shore of the Giudecca, and took their positions at the proper distance from each other, while I paced backwards and forwards between them, so timing my walk as to leave the one when he began to sing, and approach the other, whose commencement was again the signal for my return to the first singer. By this process, the sense and object of these melodies became at once intelligible. The effect of the answering voices from the distance, was singularly impressive; they sounded, not mournfully, but complainingly, and yet they affected me almost to tears. I attributed this sympathy to the saddened tone of my feelings at the moment. The old boatman wished, he said, that I could hear the women of Malamocco and Palestrina sing the verses of Tasso to this and similar melodies, and farther told me, that it was their wont to sit at evening on the sea-shore, when their husbands were fishing in the distance, and sing these songs in tones loud enough to reach the fishermen, who answered them in the intermediate verses. There is something at once beautiful and touching in this intercourse of affection across the waters of the Adriatic; and the simple notes of these melodies, which, in the works of Rousseau, are so meagre and unsatisfactory, acquire life and character when thus employed by two distant and solitary beings for purposes of sympathy.

PROPORTION OF MALES TO FEMALES.

In all our great cities, the females are more numerous than the males. The average of our six largest cities, Boston, New-York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, and New-Orleans, gives one hundred and nine females to one hundred males, while the average of the whole United States gives but ninety-seven females to every hundred males, making the females in our cities about twelve per cent. more numerous than in the country at large. This great excess of female population in our large cities is to be attributed in part to the fact that many of the males are engaged in occupations in which there is unusual risk of life. Our seamen, for example, are taken principally from the towns on the coast.

This, however, does not account for the whole difference, for it is a singular fact, that in every one of the above mentioned cities, among the children under sixteen years of age, where of course the cause referred to does not operate, the females are more numerous than the males, while in every state in the Union the fact is the reverse; and in new states especially, the excess of males among the children is very great. In the states of Alabama, Mississippi, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, for example, all of which have been recently settled, there are among the children under ten years of age, seventy-six thousand and sixty-seven boys, and seventy thousand and thirty-three girls; that is, for every one hundred boys there are only ninety-two girls; in the old states of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and the District of Columbia, there are one hundred and fifty-eight thousand one hundred and thirteen boys, and one hundred and fifty-three thousand three hundred and eighty-four girls; that is, for every one hundred boys there are ninety-seven girls; while in our six largest cities there are, under ten years of age, thirty-eight thousand three hundred and nineteen boys, and thirty-eight thousand two hundred and twenty-three girls; that is, for one hundred boys there are nearly one hundred girls.

LITERARY.

FOREIGN LITERARY CHIT-CHAT.—Walter Scott is now, and has been for some months, preparing a history of Scotland from the earliest periods of authentic record to the union of the crowns. This work is the first volume of "Dr. Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopaedia." In conjunction with Sir Walter are engaged Sir Thomas Mackintosh and Thomas Moore—the one for the history of England and the other for that of Ireland.

A "History of China," by P. P. Thoma, who was many years a resident at Macao in China, is announced for early publication. A new annual, to be entitled the "Landscape Annual, or the Tourist in Italy and Switzerland," is in preparation. It will appear in the course of the present month, and will comprise a succession of the most attractive views that meet the eye of the traveller on his route from Geneva to Rome.

The next "Literary Souvenir" will contain twelve exquisitely finished line engravings. The literary contents of the volume will include contributions from a variety of distinguished writers.

"Herbert Milton" has been translated into German by Mr. A. Richards; and the same gentleman is now employed on Devereux, having already given Pelham and the Disowned a German dress. These translations are exceedingly popular in Germany.

The "Poems" lately published by the king of Bavaria have excited considerable sensation amongst the literati of Germany, and an eminent literary character is preparing a translation of them, with which the public will be shortly favoured.

A second series of the "Romance of History," which has long been announced, is in the press.

THE DRAMA.

MASANIELLO.—This splendid historical drama, on which the several artists connected with the theatre have been employed since the commencement of the present season, was produced on Monday evening. The "note of preparation" which had been sounded, led the public to expect something superior to the ordinary run of new dramas, and we dare say they were not disappointed. It is one of the best of the class to which it belongs; there being no absolute nonsense in it, and the strange event which forms the groundwork of the plot, is one of the most curious and interesting which history records. Many incidents have been omitted and some few added, in order to adapt it to the stage. The dramatist has used his materials skilfully; and as far as a tolerably interesting plot, filled with bustle and incident, gorgeous dresses, splendid scenery, pretty music, and excellent acting, are capable of rendering a piece worth seeing, so far is Masaniello deserving the attention of play-goers. The scenery, by Messrs. Walker and Evers, is particularly worthy of notice. The first scene representing the terrace of the castle of St. Elmo projecting into the waters of the celebrated bay of Naples, with a view of the city of Naples in the distance, is admirably painted. The way in which the perspective is managed equals any thing we have witnessed in theatrical scenic display; and the eruption of Mount Vesuvius at the conclusion, and the partial conflagration of the city, is effected in a bolder style and upon a larger scale than has been heretofore attempted. The adjuncts to the real plot are simply a most improbable love affair between the Spanish ruler of Naples and Masaniello's dumb sister, and the tricks and contrivances of Barnes in a rather meagre comic part. Mrs. Barnes, whose worst fault is an unmusical voice, was very happy in the personation of the dumb girl; her action was graceful, expressive, and poetical; while that of her worthy husband was strange, ludicrous, and resembling that of no other human being in the world. Mrs. Sharpe's dress, diamonds, and sentiments, were splendid and imposing, though she had but little opportunity of displaying the talents she possesses as an actress. Mr. Richings played a silly milk-and-water rascal, and was in tribulation from beginning to end; but Mr. Barry's Masaniello was undoubtedly the best performance of the evening; his acting throughout was marked with much ability, particularly the scene where the Spanish authorities come to beg their lives of him, and he answers them with describing the fate to which they would have condemned him had he failed in his enterprise: there was great expression, point, and dignity thrown into the concluding sentence—"Princes, lords, knights, nobles, the fisherman pardons you!" The piece ends, as all such pieces ought to end, with a strange concatenation of wonderful events; Masaniello is murdered by his ungrateful followers—Mrs. Barnes commits suicide—Vesuvius explodes, and the curtain falls, precisely at the same nick of time. The drama was well received, and will doubtless have a successful run. C.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES—NUMBER IV.

I have had a most rare vision. I will get Peter Quince to write a ballad of this dream. It shall be called Bottom's dream, because it has no bottom.—Midsummer Night's dream.

THE freedom of the press, the right of trial by jury, and of electing the officers of government, are the treasures of the American people. Insinuate anything against their value, and you will be told of the palladium of liberty, of the natural privileges of man, and how our forefathers fought, bled, and died in order to establish them upon an eternal foundation, and to transmit them as an invaluable legacy to us their worthy descendants. The patriotic heroes have gone with the wind, and these stupendous monuments of their courage, industry, and genius, remain; but I have sometimes thought we were neither wiser, better, nor happier than before. This sounds almost sacrilegious to a true, thorough-going American; but one cannot control the workings of his reason, and opinions will occasionally spring up, we know not when, how, nor why. Newspapers are the growth of this improved society. It is astonishing how they shoot up in the luxuriant soil and warm climate of public opinion. A man of education will commence life by studying a profession; but accidents, like waves of the sea, dash him from his position, and you may trace him through the various stages of life, lawyer, doctor, schoolmaster, or play-actor, till at length the current bears him gently into the elbow chair, and he settles fairly down into an editor.

But after all, what are newspapers? It would be the labour of a day to peruse half that proceeds from the daily press; custom renders us negligent of its contents. The paper is flung into the entry, and perhaps lies kicking about among the children; we spread it open upon the andirons till it is dry, and then flinging ourselves down upon a seat, travel through all sorts of horrible scenes with the most careless indifference. Fire, murder, shocking accidents, shipwrecks, five hundred dollar rewards, or the last dying speech of some wretched malefactor, if we have curiosity to run them over, take nothing from the zest of appetite; and marriages, deaths, theatres, auction sales, blasted reputations, and lottery office advertisements, pass in blended and unregarded fragments through our mind.

The sacred right possessed by every man, of voting upon questions interesting to the nation, is another of which much has been said. If any one should attempt to deprive us of them, he would be immortalized as the most daring and atrocious of traitors; he would be harangued in blank verse and rhyme, in the corner of every journal between New-York and Oregon territory. But now we possess the right, how many are there who never avail themselves of it?

"Bravo," said the voice of the Genius, as he appeared before me. "Bravo, master philosopher; how well you reason."

A little abashed at being thus caught undervaluing the institutions of my own country, I hesitated to reply; but encouraged by the enchanting smile which lighted the countenance of my sudden visitor, and feeling that the best way to arrive at truth was by advancing for examination all arguments against it, I ventured to answer.

"Perhaps I am wrong; but if so, my reason has betrayed me."

"Nothing more possible," said the Genius. "Reason resembles the jury trials and free press which have been the subjects of your meditation. However beneficial they generally are, they will occasionally lead you astray."

"But," asked I, "is there not truth in what I have thought?"

"There may be, and yet conclusions derived from it may be incorrect. Even truth should be received only with reference to surrounding circumstances. It has often been just sufficiently an ingredient of a theory to give it currency, and therefore to bestow upon it the power to do evil."

"Would you then," asked I, "have us reject truth because it has been abused?"

"No," said the Genius; "but in reaching a final conclusion, each subordinate fact must be received in connection with others, till you have obtained all which have a bearing upon the subject. Cast your eyes upon the mirror, and observe attentively what you behold."

The glass presented one of the polls during an election. It was held in a low tavern, in a narrow, crooked street. A great flag flaunted from the window, huge handbills, with letters almost as large as cart-wheels, glared upon the passenger from every side; and a great crowd of what Shakespeare would call "greasy citizens," thronged around the door. Just such a set of worthy gentlemen must have shouted at the explanation of Brutus, and the address of Anthony. As my eye penetrated through the multitude that moved about like a cluster of bees around the hive, I could see in a low dark room, beer, cheese, and a variety of accommodations, which argued a considerable appetite in those who partook. Many were led to these tables, and having undergone the operation of being "treated," took the first ticket offered, and put it into the box.

"Here, gentlemen," exclaimed a personage who occupied the honourable elevation of a cider barrel, "here, gentlemen, here are the real republican tickets. Nobody don't know nothing against these here;" and he proceeded to distribute the names of those whose cause he espoused; but the cracked voice of a little crooked patriot, rose in opposition, and implied a tolerable difference of opinion.

"Them 'ere tickets, gentlemen, are all split tickets," he exclaimed. "Don't vote 'em. They aint none of 'em people of edication; they aint regular nomination men; they attend caucus meetings."

"Here's the people's ticket," said one.

"And here's the workmen's ticket," said another.

"Here's the regularly nominated republican ticket," said a third.

"And here's Russel Comstock's ticket," said a fourth.

"This," said I, "confirms my own opinion. They who vote here are unacquainted with the candidates. Each one votes at random, or in obedience to the wish of some friend. They have no correct sources of information; every newspaper is pledged to a party; nearly all leading men are in some way linked with the competitors by interest, or opposed to them through malice. Many votes are rendered through private feeling, independent of character and capacity, and they who are in no way related, are ignorant of the distinction between political right and wrong, and depend upon the paper to which they subscribe, or the vote which is placed in their hands. There is a great probability that the wishes of the most intelligent classes of the people will be defeated, or that they themselves may be misled by designing and influential individuals. Amid these vortexes of conflicting interests, where can the unlettered, but honest man, find the right path?"

"You reason," said the Genius, "from a partial view of the subject, and, like all partial reasoners, you are in the wrong. The privileges which the Americans possess over many other nations of electing their own officers, making their own laws, demanding a trial by jury, and discussing all questions political and religious through the public press, are invaluable, more for what they would accomplish in the hour of danger than for the visible advantages they produce in these times of peace and security. When you gaze upon the scene which the glass has just displayed, your first impulse is naturally disgust; there is a consciousness that the questions involved in elections are not fairly presented to the people. The enemies of your institutions have with justice observed, that there is much deception in their operations. The influence of wealth, the power of eloquence and talent, the facility with which some pledge themselves to the support of certain men or measures, control the wishes of the people, and sway their decisions with irresistible force. There is also among your most respectable citizens, who are not connected with either party, an opinion that the national affairs do not demand their active interference; they therefore abandon the field to those whose personal prospects are more intimately interwoven with the cause for which they struggle, and who consequently have but slight check upon their career."

"You teach me then," exclaimed I, "the correctness of my former views, and force me to acknowledge that the high sounding names of national rights and liberties, are but unmeaning terms; that the freedom which painters, poets, and orators have celebrated in their highest works, for which so many glorious spirits have poured forth their heart's blood like water, and which we have been taught breathes an atmosphere so balmy and ethereal that in it the human mind develops its strongest faculties, and the heart stirs with its most inspiring emotion, you teach me that all this is a dream."

"No," answered the Genius, "then man were indeed a base creature. It is not for me to explain to you the destiny of your race on earth. Whether he is ever as now to be involved in discord and danger, or in what degree increasing knowledge will counteract the consequences of vice, and multiply the sources of innocent happiness. The profoundest minds have vainly endeavoured to penetrate the shadows which wrap his future years, and fantastic reasoners and zealous philanthropists have shaped out for him paths as various as the images of fancy. But whatever may be his future fate, a glance over the past will compel you to the conviction, that his situation has much improved, and although the right of universal suffrage, trial by jury, and the freedom of the press, may now rather clog than facilitate the operation of truth upon the people, the time may come when these institutions will be in reality the salvation of the country. You are a growing people. All causes combine to promote the increase of your population, which has already scarcely a parallel. Mighty cities, are springing up; commerce is creating and strengthening links of connexion for you with the most distant portions of the globe; agriculture will occupy the attention of a large part of the people, and manufactures will take root and flourish.—Millions yet unborn shall swarm over the land from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and North America will become the theatre of the most stupendous events. What mighty occurrences will surely mark the progress of the next thousand years! What clashing interests—what conflicting passions will then come in play? How many daring and ambitious individuals will here aim at dominion, and how many cunning statesmen will commence the treacherous revolution, by subverting the power of the people. Elections will not then be flung into the hands of the interested and ignorant. Trials by jury will be firm and manly appeals to the body of the people from the decisions of venal judges and legislators; and the press, the licentiousness of which is now an evil, will be transformed into an engine of liberty whose force no art can overcome."

I gazed upon the glass as the Genius spoke, and it seemed as if his thought had conjured up some half formed images. A shadow passed across it, through which sometimes gleamed magnificent palaces, crowded cities, and splendid scenes, appertaining to years yet to come; masses of soldiers, ships of war, with their white sails spread, rose up with a dream-like dimness, and I leaned forward with intense anxiety; but my companion shook his head, and as he spoke the dark mist gathered over the mingling forms and obscured them from my sight.

"No," said he—"observe the present, ponder over the past; but let the future be shrouded yet from human gaze. The truths which time has already revealed will at least teach you to value the blessings you have obtained, although they come not without alloy." F.

MOZART.

Who has not heard and been delighted with this sweetest and greatest of all composers? Who has not been carried along by his soaring spirit into higher spheres, forgetting the world with all its woes and pangs, its miseries and insipid joys—glowing into fire in spite of the chill of a soi-disant enlightened age, where genius is weighed by pounds and dollars, and respectability by those who are most subtle in getting them? Poor Mozart. He lived on the very verge of our sadly enlightened times, and his soul, delighting only in higher attainments, was often perplexed by the conflict of reality with his ideal world.

Mozart, our readers will remember, had been in the service of the emperor of Germany, whose orchestras he directed with more honour than profit to himself. Indeed, so very indifferent was his salary, that the master of tunes found himself frequently unable to defray his current expenses. Artists then had not yet discovered the secret of raising contributions from half a world, in the most agreeable manner possible. They rather staid at home, living to themselves and their darling muse. And thus perhaps only, and alone, those master-pieces of poetry and melody could rise into existence, which our modern imitators admire, but endeavour in vain to equal. Genius is born; talents are acquired. Tours to Paris, London, and Italy, may add to its universality, but not to its originality; and its noble effusions will rise and soar infinitely higher when protected by the homely Lares and Penates, than by foreign gods.

Mozart enjoyed, besides this somewhat unprofitable advantage, another: he was indeed born a musical genius. Both his form and countenance were pleasing and interesting; but his health was delicate. Perhaps there never was a living being, more sensitive than he. So harmonious, so tender were the sensations of this extraordinary man, that the least discord that reached his ear, thrilled through his whole frame, producing an irritation which frequently endangered his health. When carried away by his muse, his feelings grew so intense, that he literally lost the consciousness of every thing around him.

It happened that Mozart was sitting one fine morning in his bed, his writing-desk before him, when his young wife entered to inform him that a very unmusical being, the butcher, was down stairs with his bill. Mozart, who had been for some time composing one of his greatest operas, the immortal Clemenza di Tito, was just arranging in his phantasie, one of its most beautiful airs. He neither heard nor saw his wife. She, a lovely kind soul of rather practical views, who had been but shortly before married to the young artist, stood waiting for awhile, repeating her information; but no answer followed her words. Seizing the young artist by the elbow, she began to repeat the butcher's account. Mozart was writing without intermission: feeling however his arm touched, and hearing sounds whose tenor seemed not to correspond to the harmonious notes of his soul, he shut his ears with his left hand; writing with the right as quickly as the notes could be scribbled. A second shake of his wife followed. Mozart, growing impetuous, seized his walking stick, and his wife, alarmed at so strange an intimation, hastened to the door. The whole had passed without Mozart's being in the least conscious of it. She ran down stairs with tears in her eyes, telling the butcher that her husband could not be spoken to, and that he must come another time. But the man of blood was not easily to be daunted—he must have his bill settled and speak with Mozart himself—and he would not send him another ounce of meat. He ascended the stairs. Mozart, indistinctly conscious that something had passed in his presence, had continued pouring the effusions of his phantasie on paper, when the heavy footsteps resounded in the hall. His stick was still in his hand. Without turning his eye from the scrap, he held the stick against the door, to keep out the intruders.

But the steps were approaching. Mozart, more anxious, hurried as fast as he could, when a rap at the door demanded permission to enter. The beautiful effusion was in danger of being lost. The affrighted composer cast a fugitive glance at his stick. It was too short. With an anxiety bordering on phrenzy he looked round his room, and a pole, standing behind the curtain, caught his eye; this he seized, holding it with all his might against the door—writing like fury all the while. The knob was turned, but the pole withstood the first effort. A pause succeeded; words were heard on the staircase, and the intruders renewed their efforts a second time. But the strength of the composer seemed to increase with his anxiety. Large drops of perspiration stood on his forehead. Stemming the pole against his left breast, with the force of despair he still kept out his visitors—he succeeded but for a moment; yet it was a precious moment—the delightful air was poured upon the paper—it was saved!

Such had been the anxiety, fear, and despair of the composer, so intense his feelings, that his bodily strength was not equal to stand the powerful effort of his soul. Scarcely were his effusions arranged, when his strength left him—the pole dropped from his hand, and he fell back on the pillow exhausted. The door opened, and his wife with the formidable butcher entered. Pale, unconscious of every thing, the son of Euterpe lay on the bed, his forehead bathed in cold sweat. The wife, terror-struck at the sight, rushed to her beloved husband; she raised his forehead—embraced him—when Mozart's eyes opened, and looking round with surprise, they fell upon the invaluable scrap lying still before him.

"Mr. Mozart," said the butcher.

"Halt, halt," cried the composer, seizing the manuscript and leaping at the same time out of his bed and hurrying towards the pianoforte. Down he sat, and the most delightful air that was ever heard resounded from the instrument. The eyes of his wife and even of the butcher began to moisten. Mozart finished the tune, rose again, and, running for his writing-desk, he filled out what was still wanting.

"Well, Mr. Mozart," said the butcher, when the artist had finished, "you know I am to marry."

"No, I do not," said Mozart, who had somewhat recovered from his musical trance.

"Well then, you know it now, and you also know that you owe me money for meat?"

"I do," said Mozart, with a sigh.

"Never mind," said the man, under whose blood-stained coat beat a feeling heart; "just make me a fine waltz for my marriage ball, and I will cancel the debt, and let you have meat for a whole year to come."

"It is a bargain," cried the lively and gifted Mozart. And down he sat, and a waltz was elicited from the instrument; such a waltz as never before had set the dance-loving butcher's feet in motion.

"Meat for a year, did I say?" exclaimed the enraptured tradesman; "no, one hundred ducats you shall have for this waltz; but I want it with trumpets, and horn-pipes, and fiddles—you know best—and soon too."

"You shall have it so," said Mozart, who scarcely trusted his ears, "and in one hour you may send for it."

The liberal minded butcher retired. In an hour the waltz was set in full orchestra music. The butcher had returned, delighted with the music, and Mozart with his hundred ducats—a sum more splendid than he ever received from the emperor for the greatest of his operas.

It is to this incident that the lovers of harmony are indebted for one of the most charming trifles—the celebrated oxen-waltz—a piece of music still unrivalled.

CHARLES MARIA VON WEBER.

Mozart was a child even in his manhood: innocent and lovely, careless and ignorant of the world, of every thing save his musical sphere—there he was the sovereign. The same eye that strayed unmeaning and thoughtless over hundreds of faces, assumed a decided and expressive character as soon as a tone was heard. Quite another sort of being was Charles Maria Von Weber, the interesting phantast, as he was termed in his youth. I had fancied him to myself as a romantic Bursche, with long curling sandy hair, blue eyes, full rosy cheeks, and a teutonic dress. I felt somewhat disappointed when I beheld a thin middle sized figure, with an interesting, but extremely pale countenance, and a finely set dark eye. It was shortly after he had composed Der Freyschutz, that I saw him. He was then engaged to a Demoiselle Brand, an opera singer—a charming little creature, round but expressive, full of life and archness. He had composed for her his Sylvana, his first great work. There are few things more soul-stirring and enchanting than the dance of the feathered Sylvana; but her forte was the Cendrillon. She always drew a full house. And indeed it would be difficult to imagine more infantine sweetness and naiveté than this delightful little thing threw over her performance. The public knew and approved of their honourable liaison, and it seemed to wait with a sort of anxiety for one of the tender glances which she never failed to throw down into the orchestra, which Weber directed. The shouts of applause she elicited on such occasions were characteristically German. It was some years afterwards that we met again. His Freyschutz had made the great tour instead of him, who had kept quietly his place at Dresden, as director of the royal opera. but now he seemed anxiously bent upon following the bright track of his genial production. He had received letters of encouragement from London, where the words of his opera were translating. His friends waited only for him to bring it forth in its utmost splendour. Poor Charles! We spent one of the most delightful evenings, and the following morning he embarked in the Cologne steamboat for Rotterdam, to proceed thence to London. He had been seriously dissuaded by his friends from throwing himself on the mercy of British generosity; but his inexperience in the world, and a certain penchant for the adventurous, so common with Germans, prevailed. We soon had our misgivings confirmed. Weber's health, (he had been sickly for some time) declined rapidly amidst the coal smoke of London, to which he was not accustomed. Disappointments increased the evil. The bright hopes held out by his friends, proved to be calculating speculations of men who wanted him to push themselves into notoriety. The very popularity of his Freyschutz had contributed to hurt his cause. The proud aristocracy shrunk back from the royal theatres contaminated by the presence of the mob, and his sickly appearance was not a less efficient drawback to his success. His Argyle rooms were almost deserted, and poor Weber saw with infinite mortification, that he had become the dupe of his speculating friends, and of the most heartless public. There is not a single dramatic or musical work, which has done more to fill the pockets of managers and theatrical performers, than Der Freyschutz; and yet Weber alone grew so poor during his short stay, that without the remittances from his countrymen, his funeral expenses could not have been defrayed. In one of his letters—which we have seen—addressed to his friend R—, at B—n, he dwells with infinite sorrow on “the disappointment of all his hopes, blighted by the indifference of the public, and the avarice of his friends.” May his example serve as a warning to modest merit.

GOETHE.

When Goethe came before the world, German literature was little better than mere rubbish, jumbled together by the indefatigable hands of pedants, who had worked during centuries for other nations. Germany had no national literature, no drama, no poesy, and seemed not even to feel the want of them. Her literary men were of a plodding learned cast, who looked with contempt on every thing that did not savour of Greek or Roman folio volumes. These they knew by heart, as well as the English and French classics.

To rouse the nation from her state of mental torpor, was not an easy task; it required the vast knowledge and deep study of the Greeks and Latins, together with the power of surmounting all obstacles which were thrown in the way. Goethe was a man who united the requisite qualities in a manner never equalled by any of the poets. Like the acorn, which has been wafted to some mouldering tower, and taken firm root among the time-worn fissures, forcing its fibres deeper and deeper, and rending, after a long lapse of years, the moss-grown ruin into fragments, to spread its shadowing branches over the whole, young Goethe stepped forth, arousing in his countrymen a sense of their wants. He gave them his “Werther” and “Goetz von Berlichingen.” The nation began to awake, and the juvenile mind seized with avidity his offering; but the young poet had the literati against him.

Goethe, with his mild serene temper, proceeded gradually. He did not think it beneath his dignity to translate master-pieces from other languages. He travelled into Italy and enjoyed the world, and his powerful spirit daily expanded. He produced his “Iphigenie,” the noblest classic tragedy ever conceived since the days of Sophocles, and breathing the spirit of Grecian beauty in every word. The Germans were astonished. The spirit which had dived so deep into the mysteries of Grecian antiquity, had subdued even the learned pedants. His “Tasso” succeeded—the great picture of silent, fretful, indomitable passion; of the wildest storm in the midst of the serene atmosphere of courtly fashion. “Egmont” appeared—the struggle of republican stubbornness with sanguinary despotism; and finally “Faust,” his noblest production.

So variegated are his different works, so deeply conceived, so characteristically delineated, that it is with difficulty the reader persuades himself that one and the same person could give so perfect a likeness of the different nations and characters he represents. In the works of Voltaire we discover, without labour, the Frenchman. Not so in those of Goethe. The passionate, deep feeling, struggling Werther, is as opposite to the blunt iron-hearted and handed Goetz von Berlichingen, as Byron's muse is to that of Moore. Tasso, the most refined picture of an Italian court, has not the least resemblance to the classic and plastic beauty of Iphigenie in Tauris; but the immense creative powers of his mind appear most forcibly in Faust—this world in miniature and at large, the soul-stirring picture of its doings and sayings, of heaven and hell, raised before our eyes so fearfully true, that we shrink back while we are absorbed in admiration.

Goethe is acknowledged to be the greatest of German poets, and one of the greatest that has ever existed. He has penetrated deeper than almost any other man into the secrets of nature and of the human heart; has examined closer the relations of mankind, the varieties of social life, and caught the spirit of all times and nations with an acuteness only equalled by his power of bringing them to light.

He deserves truly the splendid title of a universal genius. The literary treasures of antiquity, of the orient, of southern and western Europe, have been rather ennobled by him, than transplanted to his native soil. His works will only be duly appreciated by posterity. His spirit has advanced like that of Aristotle and Bacon, centuries before his age; and it is but by degrees that it will be fully understood. SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN MAGAZINES.

DYING A-LA-MODE.

“One would not, sure be frightful when one's dead—
And, Betty! give this cheek a little red.”—Pope.

THE round of fashionable life is one of great and unintermitted delight. “Coming out” is delightful—and being out is delightful—dress is delightful—the opera is delightful—delightful is the secret pressure of the white hand in leading out—delightful are the compliments of the gay—and still more delightful the scarcely audible sighs of the grave—delightful is courtship—marriage is delightful—all, all in life is delightful; and surely no one will deny that after all, and amid all this, dying must be very, very delightful. He was a wise man, and spoke truly, the French philosopher, who, on being asked what station in life (with the experience he then possessed) he would choose for himself, if about to recommence his course, replied, that of a fine girl from the age of fifteen to twenty; that being the period after which the star ceases to shine, or (which is the same in effect,) the worshipper begins to find that its beams are cold and that its brilliancy endureth not.

Lady P. T. concerning whose history it is necessary I should say two words, before I proceed to the principal matter of my paper, was a brilliant of the very finest water. She came out when there was something like a dearth of stars in the fashionable circles—and broke more hearts during her reign, than any belle blonde of the court of the good Charlotte. On her presentation, his most gracious majesty had actually made three questions at her, ere she was pushed forward uti mos est—a circumstance on which she was wont to dwell in her latter days with as much complacency, as the good old lady of Tillietudlem, or the far-famed “disjeune” of the “Merry monarch.” But time will wag. Flesh is grass. Beauty is a tenant at will—against whom no binding cause will avail. Lady T. was beautiful, fashionable, but neither fashion nor beauty could secure her against the assault of years—and left his crow-foot mark on the fair and rich relief of a cheek, whose delicacy once made its possessor the theme of a thousand toasts, and the burthen of a thousand songs. She grew old. Hideous word! She got wrinkles—horrible! The last time I had seen her was in her own box at the opera. She had drawn a light silk cloak over her shoulders, and sat in the most shaded corner of the box, as if conscious (a thing by no means general,) that the time no longer was, when the glare of the front seat became her. On some movement of her company, however, she was obliged to change place, and I then had an opportunity of remarking how necessary habit had rendered those little practices which vanity and the mode had once suggested. Her cheek, wrinkled and furrowed as it was, glowed as if it had been jannaped with ruby bloom, and the paint laid in profusion over the withered and shrivelled countenance, forming a striking contrast to the sickly paleness of the brow, and the dead, dull heaviness of the eye, which even the smiles of habitual courtesy could not illumine. She seemed to look with utter and perfect indifference on the gay scene around her, and her glass was only now and then elevated, when any movement in the opposite boxes called her attention that way. Rossini's music seemed to find no answering sympathy within her; Albert capered, and Pasta sung tears, but neither the lip of the one nor the foot of the other seemed to exercise the same influence as in younger days. Her emotions appeared to have been paralysed by time; she had lost all the delights of youth, and had laid up no store of those comfortable domestic duties which smooth the path of life to the aged foot, and enable the world-weary to glide gently and unknowingly to the consummation of her earthly trials. Lady T. was never married, and why it is hard to say; for she might have chosen well through every species of title and distinction, from duchess down to Mrs. Captain. But marry she did not. And I remember she used to look grave when the subject was mentioned, and angry when it was persisted in, and sad when it was glanced at. I suspected, knowing her to have been something of a coquette, that she had trifled with the man of her heart and lost him—from whence take warning all ye, &c. &c.

Did claw her in his clutch,”

The morning after the opera, I had heard she was taken ill, so that I was not at all surprised, now on reaching the house, to find Doctor A.'s carriage before me: I overtook him on the stairs, and inquired after the health of his patient—at the same time fixing my eye steadily upon him, to ascertain, if possible, from some glance or gesture, that which gentlemen of his profession are particularly expert in concealing—the truth. His gravity, however, baffled all my penetration.

“She is in the balance,” was his reply.

“Do you think she will get over this, doctor?”

“The result depends very much upon circumstances.”

Perceiving another gentleman of the faculty just coming from the sick lady's chamber, I put the same question to him as I had in the first instance to Dr. A. Imagining, perhaps, from my black dress and my company, that I was one of the initiated, he was about to answer rapidly, when looking hard in my face, he suddenly checked himself, and putting on a diplomatic countenance, said,

“She is getting on.”

I had learned enough, however, from his action in the first instance, to be convinced that all was over with poor Lady T.

After the doctors had consulted for a few minutes, I (as an old acquaintance) was admitted to the sick chamber. It was dimly lighted, and the window curtains, formed of some light blue muslin, gave an air of ghastliness to all the faces in the apartment, and almost paled the cheek-roses of a young and beautiful girl, who sat by the sufferer's bed side; a book resting on her lap, and her eyes turned towards the bed. The patient appeared to sleep—her lovely young nurse put back the ringlets from her forehead as we appeared, and observing the eye of one of the physicians glance at the book—

“I have been reading her asleep,” she whispered—

“Those gloomy readings are apt to do your aunt a great deal of mischief, Miss T.—some sermon book I presume?”

The young lady smiled, and shook her head, and I recognised by the binding and size of the volume, one of the “Sayings and Doings.”

“I found her reading,” she continued, “and not being able to prevail on her to relinquish the book altogether, I offered to read aloud to her.”

“Bona nutrix—a good reputation for a young lady,” said one of the gentlemen, winking apart to the other—“one of the principal ingredients in the placens uxor. The young baronet must hear of this.”

“It is our business,” said the other.

“I'll make it interesting,” said Dr. A. still apart: “the picture was not intended to be thrown away upon us, depend on't.”

A movement of the sick lady interrupted the conversation. Miss T. drew back the curtain quickly, and found her half waking—and muttering in that state—

“I am sick—sick of them—no more—no airs—marry the man—you foolish girl—marry him—men are not dogs—marry him—they will not fawn upon you if you torture them—lock the chain while you hold it—he may grow weary if you continue shaking it too long—and then what a miserable life you will lead;—sad youth—sad old age—marry him—you silly girl—Ha! who told you that! A beast without a heart?—a bad omen!—He told me so—and he took it—and broke it—and I dared not complain of him—for they would all laugh—and I was proud.—Oh!—vain and giddy girl—dally not with true love—marry him—and avoid a blank life—marry him—and—[here her eyes opened and fixed themselves with an indistinct expression upon the face of her niece, who was hanging over her]—is it you, my love?”

“You are better, dear aunt?”

Lady T. made no reply, but attempted to raise herself and sit upright:—unable to accomplish the effort, she sunk back on her pillow, and glanced towards a table, which, as well as the toilette and chimney-piece was covered with medicine, empty phials, saline mixtures, &c. Her niece was about to reach something, when with a gesture of nausea, Lady T. motioned her back, and pointed to the chair near her.—The doctors interchanged a look of alarm.

"Shall I read to you?" asked Miss T.

The lady shook her head—and again asked to be raised in the bed.

"This place is so close," said she faintly—"I want air—a mouthful!"

One of the doctors stepped forward to prevent her from quitting the horizontal posture—but she already sat erect—and Doctor A. tossed his head in a manner which did not escape the eye of the niece: she grew deadly pale, and her lip quivered—

"I'll go no more to the opera," said the invalid—"It was that brought this fit upon me—and, my love, you must send an apology to the duchess—for I know I shall not be able to go out this week. Send once more to Triad for your things, my love—and tell her that——— and———"

The young lady let fall the bed curtain and closed it gently—then covered her face with her hands, and sunk into the chair—the doctors turned to the window and were silent for a moment—or conversed only in whispered monosyllables.

And so died Lady T. whom many considered a happy, and all regarded as a worthy woman. News of Lit.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Union Hotel.—This antiquated and venerable mansion is no more! The extension of Cedar-street has prostrated all its honours in the dust! We passed it, some weeks ago, and predicted its speedy dissolution; for the officious hand of improvement had torn away its principal prop, and left it naked, in its old age, exposed to the rude assaults of the ruthless elements, and the still more destructive cupidity of mercenary man! We passed it again, and our prediction was fulfilled! A shapeless heap of rubbish was all that remained of the once celebrated Union Hotel! We paused to muse over its ruins, to moralise on the fleetness of time, and to mourn the unceasing desolation which follows in his footsteps!

The history of the deceased, for the last twenty years of its existence, was associated with many interesting recollections, which now crowded in strange confusion on our mind.

"Ah, here's the scene of frequent mirth, we said,"

Then breathed a sigh that all its joys had fled.

In our juvenile days, the Union Hotel was often the scene of political broils, that made its wooden walls tremble to their very foundation, while we youngsters in the street almost cracked our throats with loud huzzas for Tompkins or Clinton, as the case might be. And then the ebullitions of wit and nonsense which these meetings elicited from party scribblers, appearing the next morning in the shape of squibs, crackers, and two-penny ballads! O it was delightful! On one occasion every boy in the streets was chanting, to the animating tune of "derry down," the following delectable lines:

"You've heard of O'Teague at the 'lection, last spring,
'Tis myself that I mean, and I now come to sing
Of wondrous disasters that lately befell,
At a meeting last week, at the Union Hotel."

When these little storms of party violence had subsided into a calm, the Union Hotel exhibited scenes of a very different character. Its spacious hall was then lighted by the smile of beauty, and vocalized by the voice of music and gladness. The ever gay Terpsichore reigned mistress of the enchanting revels, in which the sweetest little feet in the world tripped about in the most puzzling and bewitching mazes! It was here that a highly gifted and esteemed friend of ours received the ray of inspiration which produced the following rondeau:

When eyes are bright with pleasure,
And brows with wreaths are crown'd,
To music's sweetest measure
The heart shall gaily bound.
While palid care forgets to call,
And smiling beauty lights the hall,
Devote to bliss the passing hour,
Perhaps the next may darkly lower.
When eyes are bright, &c.

This life were but a dreary scene,
Without such little spots of green;
But every joy like this we taste
Imparts new strength to tread the waste.
When eyes are bright, &c.

Such pleasures leave no sting behind,
But sweetly elevate the mind,
Till every heart, with generous glow,
Is blest in seeing others so.
When eyes are bright, &c.

But where, alas! are now the beautiful beings who gave life and animation to the scene of enchantment here described? Where is the bewitching smile—the graceful movement—the light fantastic feet? Many of the latter have long since mingled with their kindred, or rather primitive element. Others still move, but not to the joy-awakening viol's lively note—not in the graceful windings of the mazy dance. Those once sunny brows have been touched with the frosty finger of time, and their former brightness is shaded by the sombre clouds of care. The sparkling fascinations of youthful beauty have given place to the graver qualities attendant on matronly duties: and another crop of roses are budding, which will breathe their odours to another race of admirers! Well, be it so. "For every thing there is a season," says the wise man, "and a time for every purpose under the heavens, a time to dance and a time to mourn." We have had our time among the rest, and why the deuce should we fret about it? We can dance yet, and will do it too, if Hackett converts the American opera house into a ball-room, as he contemplates; and though our wise legislators prohibit masks, it shall go hard with us, but we wear smiles with the best of them. But what has all this to do with the Union Hotel?

We like oysters; and the keeper of this establishment used to serve them up in most admirable style; and his turtle soup, whether mock or real, was no "unreal mockery." By the way, there has been a dispute about the true reading of this exclamation of Macbeth; but as we have never taken any part in the controversy, we shall decline giving our opinion. The beef-steaks and coffee, too, had a peculiar relish which we shall never forget. Niblo was not the fashion at that period.

But it is all over now! the fabric has fallen, and even the "sure and firm-set earth" on which it rested, has been dug up and removed, while the adamant foundations of a dozen new edifices are rapidly rising on the spot so recently vacated by our departed friend. We mourn not, however, as those who have no hope, for its fame survives, and will long outlive its mouldering remains.

Bridge across the East-River.—This project, which some years since excited much interest and discussion, is again in agitation, in order to amuse, if not to deceive and gull the public. At the former period, the scheme seemed connected with some semblance of propriety, inasmuch as there was very frequent delay and difficulty, and sometimes serious danger, in crossing the river. Since the establishment of steam-boats, this objection is completely removed. A passage is now effected in much less time than it could be on foot over a bridge. Let us give a few moments' attention to this notable scheme.

The mischief that would ensue, according to our view of the subject, from the erection of a bridge, would be little less than infinite. To allow a merchant-ship to pass under it without striking her topmasts, it would be necessary to elevate it not less than one hundred feet above the water, besides the risk and difficulty there would be of passing between piers. Who would mount over such a structure, when a passage could be effected in a much shorter time, and that too without exertion or trouble, in a safe and well-sheltered steamboat? But these are minor considerations. The first great point that calls for serious and deep deliberation, is the effect that would be produced on the harbour: and we should hardly suppose that any one would be so wanting in foresight as not to perceive, that it would be both blighting and ruinous to the mercantile interests. How distressing it would be to witness the shocking deformity, nay, the almost wanton destruction, of so fine a haven,—one on which nature has been as prodigal of her bounties as she has been lavish of her beauties. It must be borne in mind too, that by the time that another generation shall be upon the stage of action, every part of the East-river, until it approaches Hurl-gate, will be required for the accommodation of shipping and smaller water-craft; and to interpose any artificial impediment to the easy and unrestricted communication of vessels, especially those of the larger class, would evince a degree of folly, not to say madness, that would deserve to be denounced in the strongest terms of reprehension and severity.

An evil of the greatest magnitude, and one we apprehend little thought of, now comes up, demanding much thought and reflection. Can any one for a moment believe that the execution of this stupid project would not be an insurmountable objection with the government to continue the navy-yard in its present eligible position? Would it not be a signal for its immediate removal? No man in his rational senses could doubt it—nor would they, nor ought they, to occupy the spot for that purpose another day after such an unmeaning and formidable barrier was thrown in their way, and one too not having a single attendant benefit.

Let the citizens look to these things in season, and be prepared to express their marked disapprobation of a proposition fraught with incalculable mischief—unless, indeed, it be their wish still to adhere to the relics of that enlightened policy which is so conspicuous in all the old parts of the city, in which there abounds so many conveniences, and which are so much the admiration of strangers—a policy which, in defiance of the plain indications and liberal provisions of nature, creates and entails utter deformity and nameless incurable evils.

Liberality.—Perhaps a better heart than Forrest's never warmed a human bosom, and, notwithstanding the exalted opinion we entertain of him as one of the brightest ornaments of his profession, he stands much higher in our estimation as a man. We know him well, and, were we at liberty to do so, could record several acts of his private munificence which would endear him to all who delight in noble actions and native grandeur of soul. The following extract from the United States Gazette, furnishes sufficient evidence of the correctness of our remarks:

While Mr. Forrest was in New-Orleans last spring, the Orphan Asylum of that city notified the public of an exhaustion of its funds; and while the ordinary means seemed wholly short of its necessities, Mr. Forrest offered his services at the theatre for one night, gratuitously. The result of this charitable exercise of his talents and acquirements, may be gathered from the following letter, which we publish without the consent or knowledge of the receiver:

"New-Orleans, May 9, 1839.

"SIR—At a special meeting of the 'Board of directors of the society for the relief of destitute orphan boys,' held this day, I was instructed to address you in the name of the board, and to pray you to accept of their most grateful acknowledgments for the generous and gratuitous display of your fine faculties and powers last evening, at the American theatre, in behalf of the institution under their control.

"I am persuaded, sir, that it will long be a subject of grateful reflection to you, that no individual in Louisiana has, either by donation or otherwise, so substantially subverted the interests of this institution as yourself. The efficient aid thus kindly and opportunely extended, has but increased the regard of the citizens of New-Orleans for you personally, and called forth their warmest wishes for your health and future prosperity.

"You are now hailed as the presiding genius of the drama in America; nor can it be doubted that future study, observation, and experience, together with the influence of that just and honourable pride which, as an American, you feel in sustaining your own reputation, will enable you yet to add fresher laurels to the wreath with which your youthful brows have been encircled.

"I add, for your information, that the receipts of the house, on the occasion of the benefit given by you last evening, were upwards of thirteen hundred dollars. Very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, L. C. DUNCAN, Secretary.

"EDWIN FORREST, Esq. New-Orleans."

Buried alive.—Our readers—say the editors of the Albany Daily Advertiser—have observed an advertisement stating that a vault has been erected for the deposit of the dead, for a certain period, to guard against resurrection men. On Sunday afternoon, the first body was deposited in that vault. A few hours afterwards, the person having the care of it returned for the purpose of getting something which he had forgotten. While he was opening the outer door he heard a noise inside, and he supposed it was caused by the person who had just been interred. Though his hair stood erect with affright, his humanity prompted him to save the unfortunate imprisoned being, and he unlocked the inner door, which is of iron. He then ensconced himself behind the outer door, and called to the supposed ghost within to push open the door and thus liberate himself. The confined person did so; and on making his appearance, he proved to be, not the dead man who had been buried, but a real living being, who from some cause had remained in the vault when it was closed, and who, had it not been for the fortunate circumstance of the sexton returning to get what he had forgot, would very likely have perished in his gloomy prison house.

Another premium.—Mr. John Augustus Stone, to whom was lately awarded the premium of five hundred dollars for an Indian tragedy, has also obtained the prize of fifty dollars offered by Mr. Dixon, for the best comic song. Really this same Stone is a jewel in literature, and bids fair to be set in gold.

Clara Fisher.—This fascinating and unrivalled actress commences a short engagement at the Park theatre on Monday next. The simple announcement of this fact is sufficient to insure full and fashionable houses.

BRUCE'S CALL.

AS SUNG BY MISS CLARA FISHER, AT THE PARK THEATRE.

ALLO. MAESTOSO.

Clansmen up! and march a-wa! March a-wa! march a-wa! Gather to the pibroch ca! For the Bruce and Scotland's glo-ry

Clansmen up, and march a-wa! March a-wa! march a-wa! Gather to the pibroch ca! For the Bruce and Scotland's glo-ry. Before the sun gangs down the glen, At Bannockburn our highland men, On bright green fields with bloody pen, Shall write a Scot-tish sto-ry.

Clans-men up, and march a-wa! March a-wa, march a-wa! Ga-ther to the pibroch ca! For the Bruce and Scot-land's glo-ry.

Mind thee this, my gallant bands!
Gallant bands! gallant bands!
Scotland's honour's in your hands,
See her banners waving o'er ye.

So just take off your bonnets noo,
And say farewell to those ye loo;
Then on, my lads, to meet the foe
For the Bruce and Scotland's glory. Clansmen, &c.

England's banners waving high!
Waving high! waving high!
Darkness o'er your ain blue sky,
And her spears flash fire before ye.

But like the winds we soon shall bla
Those Sasnoy silken clouds awa,
And their glistening spears we'll crack in twa
For the Bruce and Scotland's glory. Clansmen, &c.

TO TAKE HONEY WITHOUT DESTROYING THE BEES.—The following easy method of taking honey without destroying the bees is generally practised in France. In the dusk of the evening, when the bees are quietly lodged, approach the hive and turn it gently over. Having steadily placed it in a small pit previously prepared to receive it, with its bottom upwards, cover it with a clean new hive which has been properly prepared with a few sticks across the inside of it, and rubbed with aromatic herbs, and having carefully adjusted the mouth of each hive to the other so that no aperture remains between them, take a small stick and beat gently the outside of the lower hive for about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour, in which time the bees will leave their cells in the lower hive and ascend to the higher one. Then gently lift the new hive with all its little tenants, and place it on the stand from which the other hive was taken. This should be done some time in the week before midsummer-day, that the bees may have time before the summer flowers are faded to lay in a new stock of honey, which they will not fail to do for their subsistence through the winter.

CHOOSING A WIFE.—It shows the want of a lofty spirit to choose a wife chiefly from considerations of property. But this is frequently done by those who hold their heads high in society, and look above their less opulent neighbours, who have too much spirit and too much honour to marry from such mercenary motives. The connexion must necessarily be a state of dependence, and can confer no real merit on the man who stoops to it. But the dishonour would be much greater, and render one liable to the charge of a positive immorality, who should make shipwreck of the plighted affections of a virtuous woman, to become affianced to one of wealth, even if possessed of many amiable attributes.

When a woman bestows on you her best affections, and leans on you for support, you must be destitute alike of principle and feeling to desert her for wealth or fame. You have her love and confidence, and can you betray or forsake her; especially when it is recollected that your assiduities and your vows have produced her attachment? You may meet another of equal elegance, and of more beauty and wealth; but this is no excuse for violating the most sacred engagement. And it would be no greater crime in the sight of heaven to thrust a poniard into her bosom, than to wound her spirit by desertion.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE AUTUMN NIGHT GALE.

Written among the western mountains of Massachusetts.

WHETHER wend'st thou, mystic power,
At this lone and fearful hour?
Know'st thou not the moon is sleeping,
And the stars no watch are keeping?
Midnight clouds have veiled the sky
From the ken of mortal eye,
And no meteor's transient ray
Flashes on thy darkling way.
E'en the glow-worm's tiny gleam,
And the fire-fly's fitful beam,
(Lamps that wont at summer's hour
To light the fairies' evening bower,
Dimm'd by autumn's wasting blight,
Gild not now the gloom of night.
Lo, the mastiff's howl is still,
Mute the lonely whip-poor-will,
Hushed the song of pensive maid,
Hushed her lover's serenade;
Nought but wild wolf's wilder yell
Echoing through yon caverned dell,
And the owl's startling scream,
Perched above its gloomy stream,
Blent in dread discordancy,
Power of darkness, welcome thee!
Com'st thou from the sounding shore
Of the ice-cliffed Labrador;
Where the zephyr-breathing spring
Never rests her rosy wing,
But like passing bird sweeps by,
Ere her beauties catch the eye?
Or in chainless flight sublime
Hast thou winged the polar clime,
Mark'd the giant winter's form
Mantled in his robes of storm,
Decked with frost-gemmed coronal,
Frowning in his meteor hall,
Where no season dare intrude
On his awful solitude?

Lo, on yonder beetling steep
Thou hast broke the eagle's sleep,
Shook him from his whistling perch
On the lightning-scathed birch,
Forth amid the glooms of night,
Screaming in his wilder flight,
Far in mountain glen to rest
Till the sunbeam gild its crest.
Hush! I hear thy fearful tone
In the rocking cedar's moan,
While the pine tree's funeral sigh
Deepens as thou passest by.
Whither, spirit of the gloom,
Shapest thou thy raven plume,
Rending with terrific power,
Clouds that o'er the welkin lower,
And like glorious conqueror,
Urging them thy frown before?
Thou art gone—high speed to thee
Over mountain, lake, and lea!
Gone, yet still the echo brings
Catches of thy rushing wings:
Where on yonder frowning peak
Fitful is the night-bird's shriek,
Where around the hidden lake,
Heaving billows wilder break,
Where in autumn's woodland hall
Leafy honours fastest fall,
And the groaning forests bow—
Viewless spirit, there art thou!

Fare thee well, thou wandering one!
Seek the bright climes of the sun,
Where no winter chills the air,
And the skies are ever fair,
And the streams are ever flowing,
And the rose is ever blowing,
And her favourite nightingale
Never flies his native vale;
Where the bird of paradise
Gleams in iris-stolen dyes,
While the maids of softest eye
Drink the gales of Araby.
There mid nature's deathless blooms,
Spirit, fold thy jaded plumes;
Hush thy stormy voice of pride,
Lay thy wizard harp aside,
And on some fair lakelet's breast,
Rock thine airy form to rest.

TO BELINDA.

"Oh, those eyes!—but that right eye in particular!"—Billy Lackaday.

Those auburn tresses sweetly play
Around that pearly neck so fair,
And sweetly does that brow display
The clustering ringlets slumbering there.
Not sea-born Venus, famed of old,
With streaming locks, like threads of gold,
Sparkling with ocean's liquid brightness,
Could boast of graces so divine,
As those bewitching locks of thine,
Which shade thy forehead's sunny whiteness.

The softest shade of Tyrian dye
Can never with that cheek compare,
Nor will the bright carnation vie
In colour, with thy lip, my fair.
What though Cashmere's delightful vale,
With balmy odour freights the gale
At every fragrant feast of roses,
Its charms are here—why further seek?
Its tints are blooming on thy cheek,
Its fragrance on thy lip reposes.

That lip, so like the bow of love,
In graceful curvature and hue!
And there's a dimple just above,
A quiver for his arrows too.
That sacred shrine of nameless charms,
That faultless shape, those graceful arms,
That peerless elegance of motion,
With richer beauties of the mind,
All, all in one dear form combined,
May well inspire this heart's devotion.

But oh, that eye, that beaming eye,
Mild as the softest star of even,
Clear as the azure of the sky,
Bright as the vespers lamp of heaven!
Whence was that orb of beauty stole,
Whose matchless lustre, in my soul
Has lit a flame no power can smother?
"Which?" asked the fair—"I'm clear of theft—
"These sixteen years I've owned the left,
"And pa paid Scudder for the other." REUBEN.

POPULAR MORAL TALES.

THE SENSITIVE MAN.

ANTHONY DUMPS, the father of my hero, (the subject matter of a story being always called the hero, however little heroic he may personally have been) married Dora Coffin on St. Swithin's-day, in the first year of the last reign.

Their child Simon was registered in the parish book with the first syllable spelt 's-i-g-n';—the infant Dumps was registered Sighmon.

Sighmon sighed away his infancy like other babes, and when he grew to be a hobedy-hoy, there was a seriousness in his visage, and a much-ado-about-nothing-ness in his eye, which were proclaimed by good-natured people to be indications of deep thought and profundity; while others, less "flattering sweet," declared they indicated nought but want of comprehension, and the dullness of stupidity.

As he grew older he grew graver; sad was his look, sombre the tone of his voice, and half an hour's conversation with him was a very serious affair indeed.

Burying-ground-buildings, Paddington-road, was the scene of his infant sports. His father earned his livelihood, by letting himself out as a mute, or mourner, to a furnisher of funerals. "Mute" and "voluntary woe" were his stock in trade.

Often did Mrs. Dumps ink the seams of his pantaloons, and darken his elbows with a blacking brush, ere he sallied forth to follow borrowed plumes; and when he returned from his public performance (oft rehearsed,) Master Sighmon did innocently crumple his crapes, and sport with his weepers.

His melancholy outgoings at length were rewarded by some pecuniary incomings. The demise of others secured a living for him, and after a few unusually propitious sickly seasons, he grimly smiled as he counted his gains; the mourner exulted, and, in praise of his profession, the mute became eloquent.

Another event occurred: after burying so many people professionally, he at length buried Mrs. Dumps; that, of course, was by no means a matter of business. I have before remarked that she was descended from the Coffins; she was now gathered to her ancestors.

Dumps had long been proud of gentility of appearance, a suit of black had been his working day costume, nothing therefore could be more easy than for Dumps to turn gentleman. He did so; took a villa at Gravesend, chose for his own sitting-room a chamber that looked against a dead wall, and whilst he was lying in state upon the squabs of his sofa, he thought seriously of the education of his son, and resolved that he should be instantly taught the dead languages.

Sighmon Dumps was decidedly a young man of a serious turn of mind. The metropolis had few attractions for him; he loved to linger near the monument; and if ever he thought of a continental excursion, the catacombs and Père la Chaise were his attractions.

His father died—his old employer furnished him with a funeral; the mute was silenced, and the mourner was mourned.

Sighmon Dumps became more serious than ever; he had a decided nervous malady, an abhorrence of society, and a sensitive shrinking when he felt that any body was looking at him. He had heard of the invisible girl; he would have given worlds to have been an invisible young gentleman, and to have glided in and out of rooms, unheeded and unseen, like a draft through a key-hole. This, however, was not to be his lot: like a man cursed with creaking shoes, stepping lightly and tiptoeing availed not—a creak always betrayed him when he was most anxious to creep into a corner.

At his father's death he found himself possessed of a competency and a villa; but he was unhappy, he was known in the neighbourhood, people called on him, and he was expected to call on them, and these calls and re-calls disturbed him. He never in his life, could abide looking any one straight in the face; a pair of human eyes meeting his own was actually painful to him. It was not to be endured. He sold his villa, and determined to go to some place where, being a total stranger, he might pass unnoticed and unknown, attracting no attention, no remarks.

He went to Cheltenham and consulted a friend about his nerves; was recommended a course of the waters, and horse exercise.

The son of the weeper very naturally thought he had already too much of water; he, however, hired a nag, took a small suburban lodging, and as nobody spoke to him, nor seemed to care about him, he grew better, and felt sedately happy. This blest seclusion, "the world forgetting, by the world forgot," was not the predestinated fate of Sighmon: odd circumstances always brought him into notice. The horse he had hired was a piebald, a sweet, quiet animal, warranted a safe support for a timid invalid. On this piebald did Dumps jog through the green lanes in brown studies.

One day as he passed a cottage, a face peered at him through an open window; he heard an exclamation of delight, the door opened, and an elderly female ran after him, entreating him to stop; much against his will he complied.

"'Twas heaven sent you, sir," said his pursuer, out of breath; "give me, for the love of mercy, the cure for the rheumatiz."

"The what?" said Dumps.

"The rheumatiz, sir. I've the pains and the aches in my back and my bones—give me the dose that will cure me."

In vain Dumps declared his ignorance of the virtues of "medicinal gums." The more he protested the more the old woman sued; when, to his horror, a reinforcement joined her from the cottage, and men, women, and children, implored him to cure the good dame's malady. At length, watching a favourable opportunity, he insinuated his heel into the side of the piebald and trotted off, while entreaties mingled with words of anger were borne to him on the wind.

He determined to avoid that green lane in future, and rode out the next day in an opposite direction. As he trotted through a village, a girl ran after him, shouting for a cure for the whooping-cough; a dame, with a low courtesy, solicited for a remedy for the toothache; and an old man asked him what was good for the palsy. These unforeseen, these unaccountable attacks, were fearful annoyances to so retiring a personage as Dumps. Day after day, go where he would, the same things happened. He was solicited to cure "all the ills that flesh is heir to." He was not aware (any more than the reader very possibly may be) that in some parts of England the country people have an idea that a quack doctor rides a piebald horse: why, I cannot explain, but so it is, and that poor Dumps felt to his cost—life became a burthen to him; he was a marked man; he, whose only wish was to pass unnoticed, unheard, unseen; he, who, of all the creeping things on the earth, pitied the glow worm the most, because its spark attracted observation. He gave up his lodgings and his piebald, and went "in his angry mood to Tewkesbury."

I ought ere this to have described my hero. He was rather embonpoint. He wore a wig, and carried in his countenance an expression indicative of the seriousness of his turn of mind.

He alighted from the coach at the principal inn at Tewkesbury; the landlady met him in the hall, started, smiled, and escorted him into a room with much civility. He took her aside, and briefly explained that retirement, quiet, and a back room to himself, were the accommodations he sought.

"I understand you, sir," replied that landlady, with a knowing wink—"a little quiet will be agreeable by way of change; I hope you'll find every thing here to your liking." She then curtsied and withdrew.

"Frank," said the hostess to the head waiter, "who do you think we've got here in the blue parlour? You'll never guess! I knew him the minute I clapped eyes on him, dressed just as I saw him at the Haymarket theatre, the only night I ever was at a London stage play. The gray coat, and the striped trousers, and the Hessian boots over them, and the straw hat out of all shape, and the gingham umbrella."

"Who is he, ma'am?" said Frank.

"Why, the great comedy actor, Mr. Liston," replied the landlady, "come down for a holiday; he wants to be quiet, so we must not blab, or the whole town will be after him."

This brief dialogue will account for much disquietude which subsequently befell our ill-fated Dumps. People met him, he could not imagine why, with a broad grin on their features. As they passed they whispered to each other, and the words "inimitable," "clever creature," "irresistibly comic," evidently applied to himself, reached his ears.

Dumps looked more serious than ever; but the greater his gravity, the more the people smiled, and one young lady actually laughed in his face as she said aloud, "Oh that mock heroic tragedy-look is so like him."

Sighmon sighed for the seclusion of number three, Burying-ground buildings, Paddington-road.

One morning his landlady announced, with a broader grin than usual, that a gentleman desired to speak with him; he grumbled, but submitted, and the gentleman was announced.

"My name, sir, is Opie," said the stranger; "I am quite delighted to see you here. You intend gratifying the good people of Tewkesbury of course?"

"Gratifying! what can you mean?"

"If your name is announced, there'll not be a box to be had."

"I always look after my own boxes, I can tell you," replied Dumps.

"By all means, you will come out here of course?"

"Come out! to be sure, I shan't stay within doors always."

"What do you mean to come out in?"

"Why, what I've got on will do very well."

"Oh, that's so like you," said Opie, shaking his sides with laughter. "You really are inimitable!—What character do you select here?"

"Character!" said Dumps; "the stranger."

"The Stranger! You?"

"Yes, I."

"And you really mean to come out as the Stranger?" said Opie.

"Why, yes to be sure—I'm but just come."

"Then I shall put your name in large letters immediately; we will open this evening, and as to terms, you shall have half the receipts of the house."

Off ran Mr. Opie, who was no less a personage than the manager of the theatre, leaving Dumps fully persuaded that he had been closeted with a lunatic.

Shortly afterwards he saw a man very busy pasting bills against a wall opposite his window, and so large were the letters, that he easily deciphered "the celebrated Mr. Liston in tragedy. This evening the Stranger; the part of the Stranger by Mr. Liston."

Dumps had never seen the inimitable Liston; indeed, comedy was quite out of his way. But now that the star was to shine forth in tragedy, the announcement was congenial to the serious turn of his mind, and he resolved to go.

He ate an early dinner, went by times to the theatre, and established himself in a snug corner of the stage-box. The house filled, the hour of commencement arrived, the fiddlers paused and looked at the curtain, but hearing no signal, they fiddled another strain. The audience became impatient; they hissed, they hooted, and they called for the manager; another pause, another yell of disapprobation, and the manager appeared, and walked, hat in hand, to the front of the stage. To Dumps's great surprise, it was the very man who visited him in the morning. Mr. Opie cleared his throat, bowed repeatedly, moved his lips, but was inaudible amid the shouts of "hear, hear." At length silence was obtained, and he spoke as follows:

"Ladies and gentlemen—I appear before you to entreat your kind and considerate forbearance: I lament as much, nay more than you, the absence of Mr. Liston, but, in the anguish of the moment, one thought supports me, the consciousness of having done my duty. (Applause.) I had an interview with your deservedly favourite performer this morning, and every necessary arrangement was made between us. I have sent to his hotel, and he is not to be found. (Disapprobation.) I have been informed that he dined early, and left the house, saying that he was going to the theatre; what accident can have prevented his arrival I am utterly unable to —"

Mr. Opie now happened to glance towards the stage-box; surprise! doubt! anger! certainty! were the alternate expressions of his pale face and widely opened eyes; and at length pointing to Dumps he exclaimed—

"Ladies and gentlemen—It is my painful duty to inform you that Mr. Liston is now before you; there he sits at the back of the stage-box, and I trust I may be permitted to call upon him for an explanation of his very singular conduct."

Every eye turned towards Dumps, every voice was uplifted against him; the man who could not endure the scrutiny of one pair of eyes, now beheld a house full of them glaring at him with angry indignation. His head became confused, he had a slight consciousness of being elbowed through the lobby, of a riot in the crowded street, and of being protected by the civil authorities against the uncivil attacks of the populace. He was conveyed to bed, and awoke the next morning with a very considerable accession of nervous malady.

He soon heard that the whole town vowed vengeance against his infamous and unprincipled imposture, who had so impudently played off a practical joke on the public, and at dead of night did escape from the town of Tewkesbury, in a return morning coach.

Our persecuted hero next occupied private apartments at a boarding-house at Malvern. Privacy was refreshing; but, alas! its duration was doomed to be short. A young officer who had witnessed the embarrassment of "the stranger" at Tewkesbury, recognised the sufferer at Malvern, and knowing his nervous antipathy to being noticed, he wickedly resolved to make him the lion of the place.

He dined at the public table, spoke of the gentleman who occupied the private apartments, wondered that no one appeared to be aware who he was, and then in confidence informed the assembled party that the recluse was the celebrated author of the "Pleasures of Memory," now engaged in illustrating "his Italy."

Dumps again found himself an object of universal curiosity; every body became officiously attentive to him; he was waylaid in his walks, and intentionally intruded upon by accident in his private apartments; a travelling artist requested to be permitted to take his portrait for the exhibition; a lady requested him to peruse her manuscript romance and to give his unbiased opinion; and the master of the boarding-house waited upon him, by desire of his guests, to request that he would honour the public table with his company. Several ladies solicited his autograph for their albums, and several gentlemen called a meeting of the inhabitants, and resolved to give him a public dinner; a craniologist requested permission to take a cast of his head, and as a climax to his misery, when he was sitting in his bed-chamber, thinking himself at least secure for the present, the door being bolted, he looked towards the Malvern hills, which rise abruptly immediately at the back of the boarding-house, and there he discovered a party of ladies eagerly gazing at him with long telescopes through the open windows.

He left Malvern the next morning, and went to a secluded village on the Welch coast, not far from Swansea.

The events of the last few weeks had rendered poor Sighmon Dumps more sensitively nervous than ever. His seclusion became perpetual, his blind always down, and he took his solitary walks in the dusk of the evening. He had been told that seasickness was sometimes beneficial in cases resembling his own; he therefore bargained with some boatmen, who engaged to take him out into the channel, on a little experimental medicinal trip. At a very early hour in the morning he went down to the beach, and prepared to embark. He had observed two persons who appeared to be watching him, he felt certain they were dogging him, and just as they were stepping into the boat they seized him, saying, "Sir, we know you to be the great defaulter who has been so long concealed on this coast; we know you are trying to escape to America; but you must come with us."

Sighmon's heart was broken. He felt it would be useless to endeavour to explain or to expostulate; he spoke not, but was passively hurried to a carriage in which he was borne to a magistrate as fast as four horses could carry him, without rest or refreshment.

Of course, after a minute examination, he was declared innocent, and was released; but justice smiled too late, the bloom of Sighmon's happiness had been prematurely nipped.

He called in the aid of the first medical advice; grew a little better; and when the doctor left him he prescribed a medicine which he said he had no doubt would restore the patient to health. The medicine came, the bottle was shaken, the contents taken.—Sighmon died.

It was afterwards discovered that a mistake had occasioned his premature departure; a healing liquid had been prescribed for him, but the careless dispenser of the medicine had dispensed with caution on the occasion, and Dumps died of a severe oxalic acidity of the stomach! By his own desire he was interred in the churchyard opposite to Burying-ground Buildings, Paddington-road. His funeral was conducted with almost as much decorum as if his late father the mute had been present, and he was left with—

"At his head a green grass turf,
And at his heels a stone."

But even there he could not rest! The next morning it was discovered that the body of Sighmon Dumps had been stolen by resurrection men. Sharpe's Magazine.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

VISIT TO A GIPSEY TRIBE.

THE following picturesque description is from a late number of the Inverness Courier:

The southern declivity of the Gallow-hill of Cromarty is steep and precipitous, overhung by a thick dark wood, and skirted by a rough and almost inaccessible shore. Perforating the base of one of the steepest precipices, there is a huge cavern, which, from time immemorial, has been the haunt of rock pigeons, and which, according to tradition, once served as a garner for the corn of an eccentric speculative man, who, with much labour, dug up several little patches at the foot of the cliffs, and raised upon them crops of barley. About three years ago, the original tenants of this cavern were dispossessed by a tribe of gipsies, about fourteen in number, who, evincing a taste on the occasion which would have done honour to an anchorite, fixed upon it as a proper place of residence. From the sequestered site of the cavern, which is nearly inaccessible from the sea, and only to be approached from above by a rough narrow path which winds along the edge of a lofty over-hanging precipice, sometime elapsed before this accession to the population of the country was known to the other inhabitants; and the boatmen who passed the cave during the night, startled by strange sounds and sudden lights, concluded it was the haunt of evil spirits. Some time since it was suspected to contain spirits of a different kind. A crew of coast guardsmen who were stationed on the opposite side of the Firth, when engaged in some night expedition which led them abreast of the cave, were surprised to see a large fire blazing at its farthest extremity. Their boat's head was immediately turned towards it; but, after some hard rowing, their hopes of a seizure were frustrated for the time by two legions of angry combatants, who were engaged in a fierce and noisy strife within a few yards of the cavern's mouth. Rough pointed rocks and foaming waves are headstrong ungovernable things; so, without any mention being made of the authority of the king, the boatman rowed to the town of Cromarty, a distance of nearly four miles, where they were informed that the poor inhabitants of the cavern, so far from being defaulters of the revenue, were, on the contrary, better supporters of at least that part of it which is derived from the duties on ardent spirits, than men who value themselves much more on their loyalty.

A few days since, there was a report current in the neighbouring town, that a wedding was to take place in this cave; and it was visited on a Friday by two men, who went thither in the expectation of seeing the ceremony performed. Some years since, a couple of a similar tribe were married in the vicinity of Avoch by an old gipsy, who read over to them the marriage service from the book of common prayer—a feat which he achieved without much spelling—and when he had concluded, the knot was considered as indissolubly tied. The new visitors were in the hopes of witnessing something similar; but the gipsies of the cave, from their entertaining higher ideas of the sanctity of the marriage vow, considered that it could only be properly taken in the presence of a priest; and in not procuring one they were as much disappointed as the Cromarty men were in not witnessing the ceremony. The latter, however, did not entirely lose their labour, as it gave them an opportunity of taking a minute observation of the household economy of the tribe.

The cave, which they had formerly seen covered with gray lichens, and overhung with bunches of fern, now reminded them of Virgil's description of the workshop of Vulcan. A cloud of smoke issued from it as from the crater of a volcano; and through the haze, two huge fires were dimly discernible. At one of these an old woman was employed in baking, and directly behind her a savage-looking young fellow was busied in the manufacture of spoons. On one side of the cave, and coiled up in a heap of dried grass and withered fern, which served the double purpose of bed and couch, there was a young and rather good looking woman (probably the bride) engaged in sewing. On the other side, and at the other fire, two women were watching the progress of a large pot. Near them a middle-aged man was hammering a piece of tin; and a whole horde of children, miserably deficient in the article of clothing, were basking at the fires, which, from their occupying the middle of the cavern, were centres of large circumference. In the mouth of the cave, and apparently regarding the whole scene with a quiet interest, there stood an excellent study for Yorick, a young mule, the common property of the tribe; and at the foot of a cliff a little distant, there were three stout young fellows engaged in gathering fuel. The visitors seated themselves in the middle of the horde on two blocks of granite which had been rolled from the neighbouring beach; and as a large snuff-horn, which one of them carried, served as a common friend to introduce them to the gipsies, they were soon engaged with them in conversation.

"And were you really in this wild cave," said one of the visitors, after a number of topics had been discussed in a manner by no means common-place, "were you really in this wild cave during the late dreadful storm? I wonder to find you all alive."

"Alive!" exclaimed the aged matron; "alive, d'ye say? what had make us dee? The iver buss aboon, up there, made an unco sough a' night lang, an' the sea yonder routed like a wheen o' mad kye, but ne'er a bit o' the storm came near us. Honest man, this is a canny bield; there were many gentles waur lodged yon night. Dee, forsooth, my mither had a gay rough life o't; a dikeside aftener for a bed than a snug hauld like this, an' it's only last year she dee'd. Her years were aboon a hunder, an' for the last wheen I had to carry her on my back."

This was the first of a long and animated dialogue in the same style; and when the visitors took their departure, it was under an impression that human happiness depends much less on external circumstances, than the great bulk of mankind seem to imagine.

OUR CHILDREN.

Parents! I exhort you to love your children. Make them as happy as is consistent with innocence. Remember that the periods of childhood and youth soon pass away, and they ought not to be deprived of any satisfaction which of right belongs to them. Let your government be mild and equitable. Provoke not your children to anger lest they be discouraged.

Irritate not their tempers with severity, torture not their hearts with cruelty. The love of power is so natural to man, that even parents are in danger of displaying too much in the management of their children, and of exacting from them too selfish a submission. The wills of children should be regulated, not broken. Be careful, therefore, while you aim to make them honest and obedient, that you do not render them diffident and servile. But in avoiding this extreme, guard at the same time against an excessive indulgence, an error which is equally pernicious. Do not for the sake of gratifying them in the present moment, lay up for them many future years of bitter repentance.

Though the minds of children may be innocent, yet they are not, previous to instruction, positively virtuous. They are a soil, where every kind of seed will vegetate. Now the air is filled with the seeds of vice; pluck up therefore the weeds of evil as soon as they appear; be constantly employed in cultivating the manners, the understandings, and the hearts of your offspring. Let the hours which are not spent in the school of judicious and enlightened preceptors, be passed under your own eye. Let not your children be educated in the street, where they will be in constant danger of learning impure and profane language, and of being rude, mischievous, and quarrelsome.

A QUANDARY.

MESSIEURS EDITORS—I am a poor Frenchman, and it is now six months that I am arrived in this country. I have a grand difficulty of which I will make you to be informed. Some time since I embarked in the vapor-ship, and made voyage from my native soil to England. I wished to learn the little idioms of the English language, and I study the conversations that I hear seriously. But against the will of all my endeavours the Englishman makes himself sport of my little follies of language, even after I had made myself perfect as you see.

Well, Messieurs, I took a resolution to come to this country, and made sail from Liverpool. After some days of navigation, I feel myself better, and go upon deck, and again put myself to watch the conversations that I hear. Presently the captain, who make me many civilities, call to the little boy for his glass. I take guard to that which he bring, and I observe with myself that it was a telescope. Very well, I think to myself, glass is a telescope.

Well, the ship makes route many days, and presently I hear two of our company speak by themselves of one very pretty little lady, who was our companion of the voyage; and one say to the other, "She is very handsome, but she consults her glass too much." Aha, I thought to myself, I comprehend what you express; she is a philosopher, and regards much with her telescope. Ah, poor unfortunate, I was all wrong; her glass meant her miroir. And I plunged myself into grand contemplation, that so many things express themselves by one word.

Very well, we are arrived at Boston, and I am lodged in the hotel, near to the hour of dinner; and I take to myself much chagrin, that I was not shaved that day. Well, we dined at the table d'hôte, and presently a gentleman very polite say to me, "Sir, will you take a glass?" Then I was very enraged, for I understand that he offer to me a mirror to make himself sport of my dishabille. And I say to him, "Thousand thunders, sir, what you mean?" then he present to me some champagne, and I find that glass mean verre. Ah, Messieurs, I was plunged into the profound abyss of despair, for I find, all the days, the same word means things very different. And I resolve myself the next time to take guard what I do.

Well, never mind, I go to the theatre to see the tragedy; and near to me, there stop themselves two little masters, who talk very much, and again I put myself to watch their conversations, and learn their little idioms. Presently the one says to the other, "Jaques, lend me your glasses." I astonish myself, and I say to myself, "Hold, we will see which it will be;" and I have to myself much pleasure, that the little master carry a mirror in his pocket. But, my conscience, I find that the glasses mean the lunettes, what I since hear the old peoples call spectacles. Well, this is very droll.

The next day, I walk at the most quick, to see all the city, and presently I see a poor little infant crying in the street, and I say to him very sweetly, "What have you, little boy, are you sick?" but the rogue answered me in a tone very melancholy, "I've broke the glass." Patience, I think to myself, patience, we shall see if the little infant carries spectacles; but it was all another thing. And presently I find that glass means what we call vitre, such as we put in the windows.

Soon, I put into the hands of many merchants, the letters of introduction, which I have with me in my book of pocket. Ah! I have in my heart the honest reception, which they regaled me. Presently one invites me to a grand supper. Well, I go; and while all the peoples eat very much, I watch the conversations again, as accustomed. By-and-by, presently, I see on the table, what I now find you call ice-cream; but my memory betray me; and in fine, I speak, very polite to a gentleman and say to him, "Sir, will you make pass to me a glass if you please?" Ah, I was wrong another time. For the gentleman extended to me a wine-glass. It was, in truth, very ridiculous, and as all the peoples mock themselves at me, I felt very shamefaced. So I resolve to impose silence on myself, and I eat my little piece of hen without saying a word.

Presently it must that I talk. So I speak softly and say to another gentleman, "This hen is not well roasted." "Ah," said he, "you have not studied Glass." It was too much, Messieurs Editors, I was enraged again, and I say, "Sir, what you mean? Sir, my dress imports you nothing, and, sir, I am not a little master or a young lady that I should all the day study my glass!" Ah, what laughter!—I was very, very wrong, for Glass is the name of one grand cook, who has immortalized herself, by a treatise on the kitchenery.

Ah, Messieurs, tell to me, what shall I do, in so much difficulty? I fear myself that I shall make some great false-step, for all this words mean so many things. Galaxy and Mercury.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES—NUMBER V.

It has been said by those most deeply imbued with the truth of religion, that doubts of the darkest nature may assail the most cultivated mind. It is very certain that he who believes from his infancy with unchangeable confidence, must be ignorant of the joy with which the bewildered mortal beholds the shadows of distrust clear away from his path, and enjoys hope after having endured despair. I have been myself sometimes the victim of fear and suspicion. The principles of youth, having only the convictions of others for their foundations, do not always increase with our strength, but like plants lightly rooted in a sandy soil, which the first wind wafts away, they are easily carried off by the countless influences which crowd around the opening path of manhood. Science and experience seem at first to confirm the incredulity which accidental misfortunes suggest. We study out the properties of matter. We find certain agents continually in operation, producing, destroying, and reproducing. Heat engenders living creatures apparently without object. The elements go on with their combinations according to laws inherent in themselves, and the vast globe is formed by means of attraction and repulsion. Science, too, detects wonders in all around. Sometimes a star disappears, or, in a different part of the heavens another seems created, rising and falling like islands in the sea, at the sport of volcanic power. The earth itself bears evident marks of fire. Its temperature increasing as you descend beneath the surface; the long chain of burning or extinguished volcanoes extending around the globe; its vast earthquakes, in consequence of which three fourths of it have at once been known to tremble; the universal and visible agency of water in connection with fire; stupendous cliffs rent asunder, whose pieces are discovered in different countries, and the very form of the earth, which could only have been acquired by a fluid body in rapid motion—all these thoughts press upon the notice and bewilder the reason, amid a multiplicity of vague doubts, and vast but wild conjectures. Has our planet been once in a state of fusion, and will the period arrive when the heat, now emanating from its central regions, will be at length exhausted, and this orb, at present teeming with life and verdant beauty, shrink up into a desolate and frozen ball too bleak for human habitation?

While the mind of the young reasoner is in this vacillating mood, he casts his eyes upon his own race; he pursues the histories of past ages, and here is new material for horror, shame, and doubt. He beholds a confusion inextricable as that which appears to one ignorant of the great truths of astronomy, when he looks up in the night upon the broad heavens. A glance upon the influence of evil passions in past events, staggers reason and disgusts the heart. The treachery, cruelty, and superstition visible, mark the human mind with traces as awful as the rent rock; the scathed mountain, and the various tracks of some stupendous convulsion, which every where impress physical nature.

In the indulgence of these interesting speculations, I had fallen into a fear lest, after all the whispers of hope and the dictates of religion, man was but a base creature, holding life in common with the various shapes by which the air, the earth, and the water are peopled; to be at the termination of his existence resolved into the elements of which he was originally composed!

During these meditations I walked forth to pursue them without interruption. The wind, which had previously sighed in mournful aspirations along the deserted streets, now blew with increased violence. Black clouds rolled over my head. There seemed to be a sympathy between them and the gloomy and desperate imaginations drifting through my own mind. When I looked around upon the objects of nature and art, darkly visible amid the gleams of struggling light that sometimes fell from the tempestuous sky, and thought upon them but as the palpable images of a brief and useless dream, my heart recoiled within me, and all the dearest feelings of my nature shrunk up and withered like flowers blighted by the poisonous desert wind. Involuntary tears followed each other down my cheeks. I did not dash them away, as man is wont to do, when, in daylight and before the world, his moist eyes betray the secret he would bury in his bosom; but in the lonely wood, and beneath that midnight heaven, I covered my face and wept. I had forgotten hope; and despair, an awful monster, the offspring of darkness and horror, who skulks from the light in damp and gloomy caverns, had seized me with a grasp from which I was unable to extricate myself. It was very dark, and my fancy dressed the surrounding scene with exaggerated horror. A shuddering, not of fear, but of reckless and desperate anguish ran through my frame, and, at that very moment, as the wind heaved a sigh through the branches of the trees that swept along the forest like the voice of a demon, I felt a hand upon my shoulder. With a calmness more horrid than terror, I turned to gaze, and instead of the countenance of some hideous being, which, in the inconsistency and confusion of my mind I had almost expected to behold, I saw only the radiant face of the Genius—not frowning with anger, nor cold with astonishment, but beaming with pity for my sufferings, and a desire to relieve them. If I had encountered at that instant the wildest image of hideousness and danger, I should not have moved a nerve, nor altered a feeling. The appalling creed which I had adopted I conceived to be the truth, and I should have hugged it to my bosom if its influence had spread disease over my body as it had shot anguish through my soul. But in the pure eyes of this superior being, my recklessness was abashed. The arguments upon which I had enthroned myself had melted away into nothing, and I felt his rebuking glance enter more keenly into my bosom than a sword. May the phantoms which oppress the weak and impetuous, ever fly before the beautiful look of truth, and experience and reason be to all my fellow-creatures the same protecting and faithful instructor that the Genius is to me.

He was wrapped in a mantle; but as its drapery dropped from around him, a soft brilliancy painted the ambient air, and the circle within which he stood seemed enchanted. The wind died away among the branches, the chilly atmosphere assumed a balmy freshness, and as he spoke, his voice sounded silver sweet in the silence that preceded his address.

"It has ever been the custom with men in power to treat difference of opinion as crime. The stake—the dagger—subterranean dungeons, or the blight of public scorn, have been the penalties of opinions which have frequently arisen from stronger feelings, deeper science, or more profound investigation. It is not my wish to pursue this course with you. So far from inflicting the slightest pang, or expressing any feeling of astonishment, I do not even pain you with a word of disapprobation. I would not oppress you with a look of contempt. The fatal dilemma in which you stand, is not peculiar to the bad. The chances of life may plunge in a similar situation the brightest, the most virtuous, or the simplest of human beings. No good can be accomplished by hating and punishing you. A proceeding so unreasonable would create no advantage, either to you or the world. Fear, bodily pain, the infliction of violent tortures, may indeed bend down the physical frame, quench the lustre of the eye, or steal hope and happiness from the heart, but they cannot convince the reason. They elucidate no principle, they dissipate no doubt; they strip the veil from the lustrous image of no mighty truth, but, on the contrary, they awaken violent passions, they contract the circle of liberal observation, they chain the energies of the mind, and freeze the warm and delicious affections of the heart. Listen then, thou melancholy student, while I speak in the voice of love, with the words of reason, and strive to rescue thee from the dark abyss into which thou hast been betrayed, even as a ship drifts towards the centre of a whirlpool, with a force accelerated as it approaches the consummation of its fate. Why hast thou left thy warm pillow, around which, for thy years are yet few, only sweet and gentle dreams should float, to wander through these paths, wasting, as thy ethereal Shakspeare has it,

"thy creeping hours
Beneath the shade of melancholy boughs?"

"I am gloomy," I exclaimed, "because I am in doubt. I tell thee, gentle spirit, the blackness of yonder shrouded sky and these half-seen branches, is nothing to the gloom and tempest which have reigned in my own mind. I have sought in vain for certainty of truths, without the establishment of which I am but a mockery. Perchance I may live in suspense—but contented, never. I will wander forth over the dreamy and valueless world like a rudderless vessel upon a 'shoreless and sleepless sea.' A tree blasted with lightning, a cliff rent asunder by an earthquake, will be objects of cheerfulness compared with my blighted and broken spirit. I shall for ever fear, yet long for death; and life I must cling to, although I loathe and despise it."

"But whither dost thou fly for knowledge? To the darkness of midnight forests? Does it brood in solitary shades, and wilt thou rightly discern it through the exaggerating medium of wild and heated passions? No. Study the broad volume of nature at all times and seasons; but especially in thy moods of happiness and reason. Thy tumultuous passions must be lulled to sleep; the mists of prejudice must pass away; thy spirit must be released from the galling and often prostrating influences of the world, ere thou canst pursue the subject properly. Thy mind has been tossed, and reflects but the fragments of reason, as a stream in agitation gleams only with broken pieces of landscape. Wait till these excitements have subsided, and thy mental mirror will give back the perfect image of truth."

"Now," said I, "that feeling is upon me. Thy voice has calmed my passions; thine eyes have sent light and peace into the recesses of my bosom. If I can ever listen to reason, or detect the truth amid the vague and shifting phantoms of sophistry and speculation, this is the hour."

"I am here," said the Genius, "to teach thee lessons of wisdom. As thy friend I have selected this method of serving thee. I could have heaped thy floor with wealth. I could have encircled thy head with honours. I could have moulded thy form to beauty, or gifted thy mind with wild and dazzling genius; but, without wisdom and virtue, these are more deceitful than the painted air that reddens in seeming splendour at the going down of the sun. No, rather as I love thee, I would snatch thee from the vain pomp of pernicious pleasures. I would plunge thee in the struggling world, divested of every adventitious assistance. Thou shouldst feel the blight of poverty, and languish with the imbecility of disease. Friends should betray, and strangers misconceive thee. Thou shouldst witness splendour, but enjoy it not. Thou shouldst pant for repose, while inexorable necessity goaded thee on to labour, and I would not turn the current of human affairs for thee, but let thee extract from them that which will guide thee through the future. I have watched thy progress to this very point of reflection. I have accompanied thee to the brink of the precipice. Now look down into the unfathomable depth, and then let me lead thee back to hope and truth."

"Do but that," I said, "and I am armed for all other struggles. Adversity will be without its sting, and happiness will cease to be a delusion. The immortality of the soul is a subject of paramount importance to human happiness. I have often wondered that men could become so entangled among the little engagements of business, as to forget a question of such deep and awful interest. Of my thoughts it has occupied an ample share. Until my doubts are utterly dispelled, the wide world is but a mockery. I reject with disdain its tinsel splendours—its passing dreams—its vain ambitions—its unsatisfied affections. If they end for ever as they end here, the terms of human life are base and grovelling, and existence is wild, capricious, wanton, and idle as the wind."

I listened to the reply of the Genius with a powerful anxiety.

"Although," said he, "the sacred writings are a sufficient authority, to all who have opportunity to peruse them, for a conviction of the immortality of the soul, I will not confine myself to them. They are known only to a portion of human beings. But the arguments to which I solicit your attention for the establishment of the fact that the soul dies not with the flesh, are written in the infinite book of nature. Every created being bears their impress; they are visible to the eyes, and adapted to the comprehension of him who is ignorant of the scriptures, or who rejects them, as well as of the most devout and faithful of christians."

"Thou hast spoken," I answered, "of thy power over my fortunes; that thou couldst bless me with wealth, fame, or the advantages of a noble bearing; but these are so insignificant when compared with the mystery of a future life, that I have no language to unfold their worthlessness. I would consent to be hideous in shape, and repulsive in manner; to be plunged in the worst miseries of life; to be in the world's eyes obscure and degraded; a prisoner in a dungeon where no ray of light can enter; or a slave to some cruel and overbearing tyrant; to endure any privation, suffer any pain, if I have the triumphant conviction of life beyond the turmoil and pressure of this poor world, for my consolation. The innate dignity of nature prompts me to put away as paltry and vile even the highest intellectual and moral endowments if they terminate in the grave. The grandeur of thought, the beauty and sweetness of affection, the singular power of recalling past events and forming images of the future—these derive their principal value from their superiority over matter—from their independence of time and place—their connection with a hereafter, their expansive faculties, their career of soaring and never-ending improvement. Divest them of these, and they are no more than the commonest material production. They are accidents like the rainbow, depending upon the relative positions of certain subtle fluids, the invisible lights and vapours of the moral world."

"But," said the Genius, "what has led thee to a conclusion so inconsistent with thy own happiness?"

"My observations of physical nature," answered I, "and the similarity which exists between it and the moral world. Take, for example, yonder tree.* It involves wonders as mysterious as the mind of man. It must have been as surely the offspring of an Almighty skill. Its little seed was dropped in the ground, and, by combinations of earth, air, and water, or the juices and gases which they contain, this spreading image has arisen, with its rugged trunk, its deep embracing roots, its tapering branches, its delicate innumerable fibres, and the green and scented leaves, flowers, and fruit, sufficiently beautiful to form the crown of a creation so glorious and perfect; but the machinery by which it has been reared sustains it only to a certain point: its leaves at length wither, like the graces of youth; fruit no longer buds from its dry and exhausted branches; the tempest at length uproots it, and it dissolves again into air, earth, and water. The same principle of ruin pervades all nature. Every thing beneath the sun attains a certain maturity, and then loses its fleeting powers. Mountains are worn away by the operation of the elements; floods are evaporated; empires rise and fall; and our own bodies participate in the general wreck. What reason have we to deem the soul exempted from the law that binds every other of heaven's formation?"

"Listen," said the Genius, "and behold how simple would be the path of truth, if the weakness and mists of mortality did not impede your search. It is true that the tree which you have selected is destined to change its shape; but dost thou deem, when it is prostrated by the blast, or consumed with the fire, that it is overtaken with ruin? Not a particle of it is destroyed. Every atom continues to perform its functions in the wonderful plan of nature. It will float upon the air as perfume, or glisten in the silvery water, or return to the soil."

"We may say the same," said I, "of the human body. Neither can we annihilate the atoms of which that is composed; but because they enter into new combinations, we cannot say that each individual body never dies."

"That the body loses its individuality," said the Genius, "we are all aware; but that the soul is also lost as a conscious, existing, perpetual principle, is the conclusion from which I would guard your mind."

"Still," said I, "had the tree been eternal in its present shape, had it gone on improving and enlarging forever, it would have afforded some standard by which the mind could be compared; but as it is arrested by the creating hand when it arrives at a certain size, although it unites again with other atoms, and appears in new forms, have we not a right to believe that it is the intention of Providence to sustain the soul also only for a brief period, and then to resolve it into the general mass?"

"No," he answered. "For the tree to go on increasing would be against its own nature; it would interfere with the operations of the agents around it; it would reach the clouds; extend beyond the region of air and attraction; the universe would be overshadowed; the soil of the earth would be exhausted; the operations of nature would be choked up, and must eventually come to a termination. But these objections do not apply to the mind. In its outspreadings it overshadows no surrounding object; it exhausts not the fertility of the source from which it derives its powers; it interferes with the being of no other mind; but, instead of shadows, it emits light, heat, and beauty. It clothes every thing near it with dazzling lustre. Instead of destroying, it creates and multiplies into new forms and purer materials, all with which it comes in contact; and the necessary consequences of its enlargement and elevation are the accumulated joy and grace of its own character and being. When you look abroad you find nothing created in vain. The tree decays, but not until it has wrought the purpose for which it grew. It has gained every thing necessary to its perfection. Its buds are put forth, it is loaded with leaves; blossoms of every shape and hue cover it with loveliness, and surround it with fragrance; the fruit, to bear which it was evidently formed, is borne, and when its end is accomplished, it enters into other images, and attains other designs; but the mind, upon earth, accomplishes nothing. It merely opens to the wonder of its own being, and the circumstances in which it is placed; its faculties scarcely bud; its passions are developed to pursue objects which they never reach. Hope grasps at air; recollection mourns over the past; affections, newly commenced, are cut off. The first light of experience scarcely breaks upon the ignorance into which we are plunged, and we just spring upon a career of thought, feeling, and joy, when death summons us from the scene. The destruction of the tree becomes the cause of new beings. It enriches the soil; it affords the materials for more various fruits than in its everlasting increase it could do; and the delighted observation traces it through decay into images of reviving life and beauty. There is then here no destruction; there is only a change. But, if the soul be destroyed, its task is done. It can enter into no new combinations; it cannot be reunited to another soul, and return into the walks of life in a different character; but when hope, feeling, and affection are stricken out of existence, there is an utter, absolute, and awful ruin of the most exquisite of all creation. If this be the end, nature has shown, in reference to your race, a carelessness, and a wanton and cruel inconsistency, which the infinite variety of her productions in no other instance discovers; you stand alone among her perfect works, as a being made without object, gifted with attributes unfriendly to itself, possessed of powers never to be applied, and placed in an element for which it is not adapted."

"You prove," said I, "the possibility, but not the certainty of a future existence. I cannot imagine what there will be of this frame to live when my body and limbs moulder away in the dust. What place can hold me? of what will I consist?"

"I cannot explain to your understanding how this will be; but this is no reason why it should not be. How does the round earth sway the distant moon? What has given the planets their impulses and their orbits? By what inconceivable power do the rays of light stream across the heavens; sometimes knit together in snowy whiteness, and again broken into many coloured floods, and painting the barren clouds with surpassing splendour? None of these can be explained to you, yet their truth cannot be denied. To what subtle and new essence may your spirit be linked? You cannot measure the power of Omnipotence."

"Yet," said I, after a moment's pause, "once more hear me. I have looked abroad upon the ways of man, and back upon his history, till my heart has recoiled with horror from the deeds he has perpetrated, and the superstitions in which he has indulged. How often has he descended beneath the level of brutes? I cannot recapitulate the atrocious crimes he has committed; but you, who know his nature, can bear me witness that you can find in it little which wears the impress of a destiny so glorious."

"No," said he; "on the contrary, his very vices argue him a high immortal being. Without free will he could not sin. If he is possessed of free will, it must necessarily have been bestowed upon him for a purpose. His ambition leads him into crime. The passions which thus interrupt the tranquillity of the world, are called evil; the irregularities which astonish you, are the outbursts of a lofty and mighty principle not yet under control. Thou speakest of ignorance with disgust; watch then in thyself the panting after something better than the obscure and low treasures around thee. Thou hast yearned to unfold thy mind's wings and escape from the impurities which infect mortals. The chains of life pinion thee down; but thy heart has sickened, and thy strength failed among the silent graves and broken dreams of earth. Believe not that thy energies will for ever be idle, thy wishes wasted, thy virtues corrupted. Believe not thy intellect was bestowed upon thee to be soiled and dragged along through dusty mortality to complete ruin."

"But what," said I, "are we to conclude the same of the brute creation? They have life, will they also be immortal?"

"Brutes," replied he, "have no affection but instinct, and no conception of futurity. They possess no minds, and if they were immortal, they would for ever be the same; but there are no bounds to the improvements of the human intellect. By giving forth its treasures they are reproduced and perfected. In proportion to its duration are its increasing powers and joys. Wherefore then should the only creation of heaven, which demands eternal life, which is fitted for it, and which might possess it without waste or confusion, be struck down at its very birth into nothing? Wherefore shall the senseless dust, and the unconscious rock, keep their places through the succession of ages, and the particles of all other objects retain their existence in some shape for ever and for ever, yet the mind, the beauty and master of all things, the grand over-seeing principle to which others are subordinate, the most exquisite and god-like of all, be nothing—an echo—an effect—an accident—without design or accountability, gleaming up and expiring in brief and useless flashes, the only worthless offspring of the Almighty hand? I could pursue this subject much further; but, as a reasonable being, you cannot escape the conclusion to which I would lead you."

"But a truth so vast and mighty," said I, "overwhelms me. When I consider myself as one gifted with an existence never to end, the consciousness of insignificance and the shame of faults with which I have been oppressed, give place to high feelings of grandeur, and deep and thrilling hope! I am rapt in a firm and unearthly joy. I am inspired with an elevated and glorious ambition. Myriads of delightful images come thronging upon me, and the fears and miseries which have hitherto held dominion over me, and kept me down to the benumbing doubts and despair of a sensual and abandoned wretch, floating along the tide of time, towards the consummation of a doom from which nature recoils, lose their hold upon me, and I soar into realms where they can never rise!"

"Adopt the creed then," said the Genius, "which harmonizes equally with happiness and reason; cherish it in thy heart as the talisman to break the spell of sin, and dissipate the clouds of sorrow. In success it will temper thy pride, in adversity it will sustain thy dignity. It will lead thee away from unworthy pursuits, and encourage thee to cultivate thy heart and understanding; and, when thy brief human travel is over, when disease presses thee down upon thy frail couch, when the damps of death are gathering upon thy forehead, and its shadows about thine eyes, thou shalt feel thine expiring life ebb from thy bosom, and thy beloved friends fade into dim and misty darkness, with firm and relying hope. Recoil not from the seeming gulph. Let them shrink who deem the hand of fate hurls them into interminable night; but do thou commit thyself to the wisdom of thy Creator, peacefully as the infant sleeps upon its mother's bosom."

I knelt down in gratitude, but my guide was gone. F.

Familiar Lectures on Botany, including practical and elementary Botany, with generic and specific descriptions of the most common native and foreign plants, and a vocabulary of botanical terms, for the use of higher schools and academies. By Mrs. Almira H. Lincoln, vice-principal of Troy female seminary. Hartford, 1829. 12mo. pp. 340.

A TASTE for botany may be regarded as the evidence of a well-turned and refined intellect, and the prosecution of this delightful science never fails to exert the most happy influences over the heart. Opening up the avenues to a knowledge of the fairest and most varied portion of the three kingdoms of nature, it exercises the active faculties of the understanding, introduces the love of order and system in all its operations, sharpens the memory, and stores it with an immeasurable and entertaining fund of useful and elegant facts. Developing, too, the mysterious agencies of a beneficent Providence, alike in the exaltation of the lofty oak, which mounts in majestic and lordly pride, with his ample branches and countless foliage over his brethren of the forest, and of the drooping head of the modest daisy or primrose pale—in the transmission through each tiny stem of arteries and veins and fibres imbued with life—in the unstinted endowment to each spangled blossom, of odours the most fragrant, and colours the most rich and variegated—in the endless variation of the products of each soil, in admirable adaptation, to its local peculiarities, its climate, its changes of season, and the wants of its animal kingdom—it gradually and deeply impresses the heart of the student with devout admiration and unfeigned piety. The taste for flowers has ever been prevalent in refined countries and ages. And we cannot conceive a more delightful employment for the youth of both sexes, than to blend corporeal exercise in the open fields, so necessary for the preservation and due enjoyment of health, and a contemplation of the beauties of nature, so admirably calculated to mend the heart and improve the intellectual faculties, with the cultivation of a science so humanizing, so full of variety, order, and wonders as botany. To females more especially, does this attainment recommend itself. Deprived by the very constitution and delicacy of their sex, from cultivating the other departments of natural history, they are fitted by this very circumstance for the successful pursuit of this one. The beauty and variety of the vegetable kingdom seems peculiarly calculated to minister to the refinement of their taste, and the retired nature of their habits. On them do flowers make their loveliest and most lasting impressions,—they have, in most exquisite song, hymned their praises and analysed their secret but irresistible influences upon the heart of man. How pleasant then to possess a key which may unlock the mysteries of each particular plant,

"The pied wind-flowers, and the tulip tall,
And narcissi, the fairest among them all;"

or,

"The maid-like lily of the vale,
Whom youth makes so fair and passion so pale."

An objection presents itself to the female mind in attempting science, which seems, but only seems, to be insurmountable. It is the difficulty of acquiring a knowledge of the numerous technical terms by which every idea and object is designated. A very little patience and a real enthusiasm for the possession of that which will prove a valuable and never-failing resource to the mind, will easily remove this impediment. It is one of the peculiar merits of Mrs. Lincoln's manual, now before us, that she has aimed chiefly at removing this apparent hinderance. Indeed it was especially to be desired that a female mind should attempt the elucidation of scientific knowledge for the benefit of females, being best acquainted with the habitudes of their thoughts, and their aptitude to catch impressions. That Mrs. Lincoln has performed the arduous task she has assumed in a most satisfactory and complete manner, is uttering no praise—it stares every one at first sight. She has done more; she has furnished general beginners with a treatise in which they may find the elements of the science fully and comprehensively stated, without ambiguity of expression or studied severity of manner. Every fact important to be known, is expressed in the most simple style, and explained by the most appropriate and happy illustration. Another excellence of this valuable manual arises from the earnest conviction, which breathes throughout its pages, and cannot fail to be communicated to any but the most listless reader, of the dignity, the value, and the auspicious tendencies upon morals, of the science of botany. We will venture to say that even the general reader will peruse this volume without experiencing that tedium which so often accompanies the attention necessary to the proper understanding of works professedly on scientific subjects.

Forty-five lectures comprise the volume, and they are illustrated by thirteen elegant plates, exhibiting the various parts and anatomy of flowers; and the most striking specimens of each class in the most popular systems of the day. The first plate exhibits a view of the relative altitudes of the mountains of the earth, as they are distinguished by variety of vegetable feature and production.

The history of botany in four lectures offers a rich treat to those who delight to follow the track of human intelligence in the acquisition of knowledge, and discern its gradual attempts to arrive at method and system in its investigations. In this, as in every other part of the work, there runs a rich vein of elevated moral feelings, a fine sensibility to the beauties of nature, a just and sincere estimation of scientific knowledge, and a chaste and impressive style of expression.

In returning our thanks to the estimable and learned author for this volume, we have to regret that circumstances prevented an earlier notice of its merits. It reflects credit on our common country, and is well calculated to enhance its estimation among scientific men in Europe.

ADVENTURES OF A KING'S PAGE.

A new novel, under this title, in two volumes, by the author of "Almacks Revisited," has been published by the Messrs. Harper. We have not yet had leisure to read the work, and consequently can give no opinion of its merits.

HOMER AND HIS NATION.

THE songs of Homer aroused the Greeks in their late struggle for freedom. This we proceed to show.

The epopee is the fruit, is the poetry, of the heroic age, as much as the romantic poetry is the fruit of the chivalrous period. The most heroic of nations has given us the greatest epopee; the two most chivalrous, the true pictures of romantic life. The feasts of the heroes and the banquets of the knights, were enlivened with songs, accompanied by the harp, on which the bard played a prelude, to inspire his mind, and to claim the attention of his hearers. Many were the bards of the Greeks; the most powerful of them was Homer, the immensity of whose genius could alone perpetuate his own memory, and that of those he sung. His songs poured forth the enthusiasm of a soul sympathising with the deepest feelings of mankind; founded on the innate sensations of human nature, on the love of children, wife, and country; but above all, on the love of glory. He depicted a world of gods with all the frailties of man, an array of heroes with divine attributes, in colours so dazzling and yet so strong, so tender and yet so sublime, that they could not fail to awaken the deepest sympathy. These songs were not written; and in this very circumstance we shall find the secret of their immense power. The epopee is the highest effusion of poetry—it is the song of the soul. Writing may produce more artificial, more literary poems; but they will be found wanting in the musical, the youthful fraicheur. The epopee is inseparable from song, and the power of the Homeric stanzas is in the very manner of their composition. Only thus they could become the living property of the whole people, and only thus we are able to explain to ourselves the singular and unparalleled phenomenon of a nation's being formed by a poet. Homer has indeed the honour of having formed his country, of having given it the indelible stamp of his genius. When, centuries afterwards, Lycurgus and Solon appeared, the characteristic trait was already so vividly impressed, that they themselves had to pay homage to it. It is this which explains to us the still unrivalled classic beauty of the Greeks and their works, which has not been wholly effaced even in the time of its lowest degradation.

The history of Homer and of his fate, is involved in the dark obscurity of tradition. Of seven cities which claimed the honour of having given him birth, Smyrna and Chios seem to be the most probable. The age in which he lived is not less uncertain. According to some, it was nine hundred and seven years before Christ; while others have placed the period of his death two hundred and seventy-seven years after the destruction of Troy. We are in possession of two epic poems, of which the Iliad sings in twenty-four rhapsodies the satisfaction given by Zeus to his son Achilles, who had been offended by Agamemnon. The Odyssey paints the adventures of Ulysses. They were not written, as we have intimated, but were preserved by oracular tradition. They lived in the hearts of the people. Lycurgus was the first who brought them over to European Greece. Solon provided laws for their public recitation. Rhapsodists were appointed, who by turns were to declaim them before the assembled Athenians. Pisistratus arranged and committed them to writing. In the time of Socrates they formed the basis of Greek education. To us, living at a period of more than twenty-five centuries from these great lawgivers, their policy may seem strange, as Homer was absolutely opposed to popular power. "No good comes from the government of the many. Let one be ruler, and one be king." But the Greek lawgivers aimed at a higher point. They strove to implant into the bosoms of the people a love of glory and liberty, and the warlike spirit of their heroes. We shall scarcely meet any where with a deeper insight into the character of a country, than in the measures of these great men. It was founded on the conviction that a nation, whose culture had sprung from the Iliad and Odyssey could be subdued, but never reduced to slavery; and the experience of two thousand years has proved the depth of their opinion. Thousands of nations have disappeared; of the proudest and greatest of them all, only mouldering ruins are extant. The liberties of Greece have been extinguished: but, in the midst of degradation and abasement, the epopee of Homer has not died away. And it is the song of this poet which has awakened the sympathies of mankind in their behalf. S.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Fortune of war.—We recollect seeing, last year, the notice of a pamphlet, the aim and object of which was to prove the identity of Hussein Pacha, commander of the Ottoman forces, destined to resist the Russian invaders, with Napoleon! Hussein had so far been successful in baffling the attempts of the enemy; he had gained victory upon victory, and had completely checked the progress of the invasion of the territories of his master. His vast military genius, the theme of general praise and admiration; his superior knowledge of, and insight into, human character, forming so striking a contrast to the narrow and contracted acquirements of Turkish military men; his ready resources of policy, as well as of enterprise in the field; his undaunted valour and unbounded ambition; nay, his very personal features, piercing eye, and lofty bearing, all gave evidence that the supposed victim of St. Helena had not expired; but, trusting himself to the frail car of a balloon, had cleaved successfully the fields of ether, until, casting his eye downwards upon the towers of St. Sophia, he, with instinctive sagacity, alighted in Byzantium, and assuming a garb familiar to him at the Pyramids, awaited the coming of the fierce Russ that he might avenge the disgrace and defeat of Moscow and of Waterloo! Winter however approaches, and even Hussein Napoleon is benumbed by its influence, and retires to the walls of Choumka to protect himself from the antarctic blasts which had once before been so fatal to his hopes of glory. Winter passes away—spring re-opens the campaign—where is Hussein now? The Balkans are crossed—Varna falls—Bourghas, and even Adrianople surrenders! Who now gives the law to the hitherto invincible legions of the crescent? One Count Diebitch, a supposed Russian general—but in reality, Napoleon himself!—so the last German papers—those minute and enthusiastic interpreters of nature's mysteries and secret harmonies—announce to us! Of the identity there cannot be a doubt. The same short stature, piercing eye, restless activity, indomitable spirit of conquest, and thirst of renown; the same abominable habit and ready participation in the toils of the soldier—all, all prove that Diebitch is Napoleon Bonaparte! And Hussein—alas, where is poor Hussein? We hope he will not be huddled into a sack, nor experience the rather unpleasant contact of a bow for having been mistaken for the great leader of the French legions!

The Annuals.—A number of these works are at present lying on our table, and something must, we suppose, be said about them, albeit we feel a wonderful disinclination to the task. Perhaps the mental merit of this butterfly species of literature has been sufficiently over-rated, and we feel no desire to add our small quantum of "honed words" to the mass of sweet superlatives that have already been applied to them. It would be difficult, indeed, to say too much in favour of the engravings and the mechanical execution of these works, but the literary department seldom comes up to the hopes excited by the names of the celebrated authors blazoned forth in the table of contents; and this is not surprising, for it is scarcely to be expected that all good writers are to write well at all times. Besides, many of them are pressed into the service; their contributions are solicited as a matter of favour, and are therefore not to be rejected, even when they do not answer the editor's expectations. Too much reliance is placed upon mere names, and the "Keepsake" has gone so far as to exclude from its pages all writers who have not already a high reputation in the literary world. In the wide range of English and American annuals, we do not see one that, as a whole, equals the reading matter of any of the three volumes of the "Talisman." We do not say this in a spirit of national or local feeling, but merely as, right or wrong, our sincere opinion. In the engravings and general appearance, most of the English annuals are immensely superior to the American, and this will doubtless be the case for several years. The "Keepsake," in particular, is one of the most splendid books we have ever seen. Some of the plates look as if they had been executed by fairy fingers, and really appear too exquisitely delicate to have been the work of mortal hands.

But this branch of business, like every other, has already become overdone. New competitors start up in every direction, and considerable ingenuity is exercised in the selection of titles and temptations wherewith to allure the public. The "Golden Lyre" is printed entirely with gold leaf in the place of ink, and will probably win

"Golden opinions from all sorts of persons."

The "Landscape Annual" has taken the place of the "Anniversary," under the control of Allan Cunningham, deservedly celebrated for his spirited Scottish songs. But perhaps a list of these Christmas presents, which has been made out from those we have received, and such as we remember to have seen noticed elsewhere, may be not altogether uninteresting to our readers, as tending to show the rapid increase of these costly tokens of affection.

ENGLISH: The "Keepsake," "Landscape Annual," the "Gem," the "Amulet," "Friendship's Offering," the "Literary Souvenir," edited by the poet Alaric Watts, and enjoying a more than ordinary reputation for talent; the "Comic Annual," by the facetious Thomas Hood; the "Winter's Wreath," "Ackerman's Forget-me-not," the "Golden Lyre," the "Bijou," the "Religious Offering," the "Musical Bijou," the "Musical Souvenir," and the "Lithographic Album." Then there are for children of a smaller growth, the "Juvenile Forget-me-not," "Ackerman's Juvenile Forget-me-not," the "Juvenile Keepsake," the "New-Year's Gift," the "Christmas Box," and "Affection's Offering."

AMERICAN: The "Talisman," the "Token," and the "Atlantic Souvenir," together with the "Boston Juvenile Keepsake," and the "Pearl," adapted for like people, on this side of their teens.

Among these juvenile efforts we were particularly pleased with the "Pearl," got up by Ash, of Philadelphia: the binding and typography are extremely neat, the reading matter appropriate, and the plates superior to what could reasonably be expected from a work of its price and pretensions. Though we do not intend to inflict upon our readers a review of each full-grown annual as it comes to hand, we will occasionally transfer to the columns of our paper such articles as may appear to us to possess more than ordinary merit.

Polytechnic Institute.—We have perused the prospectus, constitution, and by-laws, of the "Polytechnic Institute, of Shrewsbury, Monmouth county, state of New-Jersey." It will not be deemed impertinent to add, for the benefit of the unlearned reader, that the term polytechnic is formed of two Greek words, signifying many arts; and, as applied in the present instance, means a school where many arts are taught. Some of our readers are aware that such institutions have succeeded in Europe. An attempt is now about to be made, to establish a similar seminary in the United States. For this purpose, we understand, several gentlemen have associated, and have vested sufficient funds to carry the design into execution. George W. Hall, principal of the Washington Institute, well known as a gentleman of learning, and for a singularly felicitous tact in imparting instruction, stands at the head of this institution. With him are connected Dr. Seth T. Barstow, a scientific and practical agriculturist from the state of Pennsylvania, and Solyman Brown, well known as a teacher of this city. A tract of land has been purchased, comprising nearly one thousand acres, in one of the most healthy and delightful situations in the United States. It is that peninsula formed by the confluence of the north and south Shrewsbury rivers. Here the necessary buildings are to be erected, and are already commenced; and here are to be taught, not only every branch of literature, science and the fine arts, but also agriculture, gardening, all the mechanic arts and trades, architecture, horsemanship, &c.

The peculiar beauties of this admirable location can be duly appreciated only by personal inspection. It is only thirty miles south of New-York, and can be visited in three hours by steam-boat or packet. It is washed on three sides by tide waters which abound with the most delicious fish, among which are the celebrated Shrewsbury oysters. A pure stream of fresh water traverses the land from west to east. The fields are enclosed with hedges, which give the whole a picturesque appearance. The hills of Navesink are in full view on the north, and on the east the ocean, beautified with vessels of all descriptions at almost every season of the year. The woodlands, of which there are more than one hundred acres, contribute much to the general landscape; and two extensive orchards, one of apples and one of peaches, fill up the outline. On the whole, it may be said with strict propriety, that no tract of land of equal extent, combines more advantages for such an institution.

The capital invested is to be divided into one thousand shares of stock, at one hundred dollars each, to be paid in semi-annual instalments of twenty-five dollars each, for which the scrips will be prepared as soon as an act of incorporation is obtained from the legislature of New-Jersey.

But the brightest feature in the picture remains to be noticed. The poor can enjoy all its advantages equally with the rich; for every boy that is willing to learn a trade, will have sufficient hours for study, and the amount of his labour at the particular calling he may choose, will, during his apprenticeship, more than pay for his tuition and genteel maintenance. Those who prefer paying money, are at liberty to do so, and the terms will be found very liberal. The pupils

Newspaper criticism.—"I am sick and tired unto the death," says a correspondent, "with the never-ceasing and indiscriminate praise bestowed by the newspapers upon every and any production of the press. And the praise is so uniform and monotonous as to be, on every occasion, a mere echo and repetition of itself." The reason we shrewdly suspect to be no more nor less than this, that the panegyrists scarcely ever read the books they eulogise, and deeming it indispensable that they should say something favourable, by way of grateful return for the gift of the volume, they are straitened to find words in which to utter their laudatory views. There are several inconveniences attending this uniform system of universal puffing, one of which, and a prominent one, is, that works of real merit are frequently destroyed with faint praise. Thus we lately saw a valuable production, the result of severe labour, and entitled to no ordinary commendation, passed off in the following words: "This work is, no doubt, very good, and contains matter which is probably interesting to all classes." Comment on such a notice is unnecessary.

Good advice.—We are happy to announce that the counsel given to the grand sultan, in an impromptu of four lines, in a late Mirror, has produced the desired effect. In the treaty of peace lately ratified between Russia and Turkey, one article stipulates for the unconditional emancipation of Greece! This is another evidence of the influence of a free press, of the irresistible power of poetry, and the unparalleled estimation in which the sublime porte holds the New-York Mirror! With the best feelings for his welfare, we beg leave to trouble him with the following:

No longer make slaves of your women,
Nor keep them like lambs in a pen;
But open their cages and free them,
And let them make slaves of the men.

Reuben.—The article, on our first page, addressed to Belinda, under this signature, was in type for last week's paper but crowded out by a press of other matter. By some means or other, it has since found its way into the Truth Teller, of which we were not aware until the outside form of this number had gone to press, or it should not have now appeared under the head of original, although it was written for the Mirror and sent to no other journal with the consent or knowledge of the author.

Miniature Flute Melodies.—Amateur flute players, who wish for tunes adapted to that instrument in the most convenient portable form, can be gratified at Bourne's, Broadway, who has recently published, in a new and elegant style on cards, a collection of flute music, containing nearly all the sweetest and most fashionable melodies of the present day. A separate card accompanies the music, containing the words of the song; and the whole is contained in a case suitable for the pocket.

American Sporting Magazine.—The third number of this elegantly printed publication, has appeared, and is embellished with a beautiful copperplate engraving of a pointer, from the burin of Cone.

Mr. Forrest.—We are happy to announce that Forrest commences a short engagement at the Park next week.

Madame Malibran.—This distinguished vocalist lately appeared at the king's theatre in the character of Susanna. The London editors speak in the highest terms of her success in English opera.

Covent Garden.—Miss Fanny Kemble, daughter of Charles Kemble, has made a successful debut in Juliet, at this house.

Albany Theatre.—This establishment, after having undergone a thorough repair, and received several new embellishments, was opened for the season on the ninth instant, under the management of Mr. W. Forrest. A neat and appropriate address, written by James Lawson, esq. of this city, was spoken on the occasion.

The Essayist.—A new semi-monthly paper with this title has been commenced at Boston.

Conundrum.—The late alteration of prices at the Park, (from seventy-five cents to a dollar) and it being the only theatrical establishment now open in this city, produced the following question and answer, at the pigeon-hole of the box-office, a few evenings since:

Citizen—giving a dollar bill.—Why is the Park theatre triumphant over all its opponents?

Blake—presenting a ticket.—Because it gives no quarter.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO IDA.

I HAD a dream—a sunny dream—and it was all of thee:
I saw an angel floating by—I heard a voice of glee:
And spirit-like thou glided on within a festive hall,
Where starry eyes flash'd bright, but thine the brightest of them all.
There was a glow upon thy brow, and music in thy tread,
As flying feet thy airy feet the mazy measure led.
And mirth laugh'd out with louder tone where thou wert passing by,
And sorrow as she met thy glance forgot to breathe her sigh;
And many a hand an offering brought and laid it at thy shrine,
But only one thou smiled upon—methought that one was mine:

I had a dream—a fever'd dream—and it was all of thee:
I saw an angel floating by—I heard a voice of glee!
But though thy image yet was with passion's wildest thrill,
I sadly turn'd my gaze away. And though thy voice was still
Such as a peri in her tower would hush her lute to hear,
Oh, miserably, oh, miserably, it linger'd on mine ear.
Methought that many a gem I saw upon thy shining hair,
But not the token and the gift which thou wert wont to wear;
That for a girdle rich thy waist had changed the slender zone,
The earnest of thy Clarence's love—my cherished and my own!

I had a dream—a waking dream—and it was all of thee:
I saw an angel floating by—I heard a voice of glee!
And thou wert there—all changeless still—and breath'd 'd upon my lip,
And dash'd the tear-cup from my hand which sorrow bade me sip.
And then methought thou murmur'd near as pitying hours speak,
'Till glow'd my burning forehead like the carbuncle of thy cheek:
And in thy liquid eyes I saw thy soul all lustre shine,
A halo sleeping in the light of 'diadems divine;
And hope nigh'd on her shell and lent thy voice its understrain:
Oh! for that dream—that waking dream—that dream of thee again!

THE WOODLAND VALE.

O know ye not, that in the scale of time
Are days which, in their might of interest,
Outweigh the rounded aggregate of years?
Brief hours, o'er which eternity shall throw
The sunshine of her mind? 'Tis even thus
With earth—it has sweet radiant spots retired,
Green vale, or hill, or grove, or mountain glen,
Which, hearts familiar with their loveliness,
High prize above an empire's dazzling throne.
Nor are they sole enshrined in tropic climes,
Where the clear sun his richest radiance dart:
On blooms that never die; on garniture
Of verdant fields that lasts the live-long year;
On fruits of every hue, whose ample store,
But half uncropped, embosoms o'er and o'er
Nature's rich velveting with fragrant gems
Of ruby, sapphire, amethyst, and pearl.
Wherever human heart hath found a home,
Whose hallow'd joys have strewn life's rugged path
With flowers of sinless memories, that shed
A sweet undying fragrance on the mind,
There is a sunny spot—an Eden there!
Such is the scene my boyhood days have known:
A vale serene, in the green hills it sleeps
Like blooming virgin in her sylvan bower,
Enclosed with mountain battlements, that fling
A shadowy freshness o'er it, and shut out
The din and discord of a jarring world.
Bright are its skies and waters, rich its clouds,
In all the tints of light superbly rich;
And oft in trance of thought, by fancy charm'd,
While gazing on their golden minarets,
I've dream'd that dimly through the blue sereno
Heaven's radiant palaces of glory shone;
Or that angelic architects, to please
The good with visions of their future home,
Those mansions emblematical had rear'd.
To all is nature kind; but here methinks
She partial is and lavish of her charms.
Its every scene with loveliness is clothed,
As with a robe by beauty's fingers wrought;
And soft its gales, which from the birchen woods
Their dewy odours waft on night's still wing,
To health's embosom'd bowers. More green its green,
More fresh its balmy freshness, and withal
More warm its sympathies, than now becomes
Affection's lyre to sing, lest fulsome deem'd.
Most graceful bends its curvature of hills,
And pleasantly they stoop in verdant slopes
To kiss the warbling brooks, that coyly hide
In fringing willow depths their gush of joy.
Its air is full of living melodies,

And further on his life's still haven-homes—
The quiet graves—where death hath garner'd up
High trophies of his might that yet shall mock
At the last trump, his mockery of power:
From their green stilly mounds through night's wan shade,
Comes the pale gleam of marbled tombs that stand
Like seraph sentinels to watch the rest
Of earth's deep sleepers there. A river near
Of crystal water flows; while more remote
Hath science rear'd her domes of classic pride,
Mid groves with arbours green, where deep retired
Genius may plume his eagle wing and soar.
But hence, sweet vale, adieu to all thy haunts!
I who have loved thee may not longer rove
With those I love amid thy happy scenes;
But on my heart they're graves, and in charge
Conception holds their imagery of charms.
Yet, fare thee well—I shall not all forget
The elysium of my prime, thy woodland walks,
When in temptation's list I'm thrown afar,
Shieldless to fight life's fight of sin alone.
I shall not all forget thee, vale of vales,
For round my heart affection hath entwined
Fresh wreaths of rich remembrances which death
Alone shall loose. Again I may not reap
Such joys as thou hast nourish'd and matured,
For well I woe that my best sands are told,
And henceforth toils and tears await my lot.

And I must mask my struggling heart,
Each aching throb repress,
Control the start, and check each sigh
Of rising tenderness.

But when the midnight moon is bright,
And no cold eye is near,
And I this mask of heartless smiles
No more am forced to wear—
That hour is thine—with throbbing heart
I seek our trysting spot,
And every tear bears witness there
That I forget thee not.

Though we may never meet again,
Though yield we to the fate
Which still for long and weary years
Dooms us to separate,
One hope is ours—a better world

Where none that cruel lesson teach,
Nor need we to forget!

On his head he wore a broad-brimmed hat, with an uncommonly low crown. His legs were cased in top-boots, to which were attached spurs of an extraordinary length; and in his hands he carried a whip, with a thong three yards long, and a handle which might have levelled Goliath himself.

On arriving at the inn, he calmly dismounted, and called upon the ostler by name.

"Frank," said he, "take my horse to the stable;
rub him down thoroughly; and, when he is well cooled, step in and let me know." And, taking hold of his portmanteau, he entered the kitchen, followed by the obsequious landlord, who had come out a minute before, on hearing of his arrival. There were several persons present, engaged in nearly the same occupation. At one side of the fire sat the village schoolmaster—a thin, pale, peak-nosed little man, with a powdered periwig, terminating behind in a long queue,
and an expression of self-conceit strongly depicted upon his countenance. He was amusing himself with a pipe, from which he threw clouds of smoke with an air of great satisfaction. To him sat the parson of the parish, a personage

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE DRAMA AS IT IS.

The drama is a poetry which, in its legitimate scope, must be addressed to all ranks of society—must wear the common garb and speak the common language of all. It is the forum where all ranks meet and are but equal; where the base of mankind unlearn their ferocity and divest themselves of their callousness; and where, likewise, the noble and gentle must dispense with artificial feelings, and know, whatever be the shell, the kernel is at best but a man.—Ænon.

There are few subjects, if any, that have elicited a greater flow of mere words, than what is termed the "decline of the legitimate drama." It is one of the most approved and enduring themes extant for small declamation, and has consequently become the almost exclusive property of "smart young men" and unfledged scribblers, who think it looks well to lament the non-enactment of Shakspeare, and so indulge in little frothy vituperations against the bad taste of the public, and the intellectual depravity of managers, actors, and modern authors. They discuss in the most flippant and self-satisfied manner a question that involves numberless vexing and perplexing difficulties, and pass their silly censures and give their witless advice upon a subject of which they are profoundly ignorant. When a satirist, like Lord Byron or Mr. Charles Sprague, or any man of talents, undertakes to lash the vices of the stage, the lack of practical knowledge is overlooked in the display of poetic power; they present us with a forcible picture of what is bad, but without pointing out the efficient means to make that bad better; they dwell much upon the faults and follies of the system, because faults and follies are the food of the satirist, and they will even, at times, give very fine advice, which has only the fault of not being practicable. They ought to bear in mind what Portia truly and sensibly says, "If to do were as easy as to know what were good to do, chapels had been churches and poor men's cottages princes' palaces." It is a good divine that follows his own instructions." Lord Byron, when he dipped his pen in gall, and wrote his "English bards and Scotch reviewers," denounced the stage along with other existing follies; but when he actually became concerned in the management of Drury-lane, he found it a great deal easier to censure than amend. And yet now the A. and B. newspaper critics prate about the offence given to their delicate tastes, when a profitable piece of nonsense happens to be enacted, instead of Shakspeare or the "sterling English comedies." But the best of the joke is, that most of this kind of persons whom we have had the misfortune to become acquainted with, in reality know no more of the sterling English comedies (except a few of the most popular) than they do of Homer in the original; and as for Shakspeare, their knowledge of him is confined to his Macbeth, Othello, Richard the Third, and a few more of his acting plays; while his more imaginative ones, his Tempest and Midsummer Night's Dream, or his Timon of Athens, and Love's Labour Lost, are so much heathen Greek to them; nay, one whom we knew, that pretended a most overweening admiration for the immortal bard, actually did not know that he had written either songs or sonnets; and upon being told that the popular song of "Bid me discourse," was one of his, resented the information as an impudent attempt to undervalue his understanding and impose upon his credulity! Yet these are, for the most part, the sort of people that affect a stately supremacy, and talk about managers "dazzling the eyes of the ignorant vulgar," and "catering for the vitiated taste of the public!"

Now we are by no means going so far as to contend that the "drama as it is," is any thing like the "drama as it ought to be;" but we do mean to say, that there is "an infinite deal of nothing," or, at least, nothing but unmingled cant, preached upon this very subject. Even at the present day, Shakspeare is played ten times to any other author's once, and would, if the public attended, be enacted still more frequently, and for this simple and satisfactory reason, that his dramas are not one-half the expense of modern pieces, for they have the beauty that consequently, the cost of "scenery, machinery, dresses, and decorations," is all saved; and to those who, for want of a genuine admiration of that truly immortal man, counterfeit an ardent longing for his more frequent presentation on the stage, we would say—or rather we will tell them an anecdote which, though old, is good and applicable, and may be more to the purpose than argument.

"Needs not the foreign aid of ornament;"

A certain king of France had a very pretty queen whom he loved "passing well," at least, considering that he was a Frenchman and she was his wife, but still not with such exclusive devotion as to prevent

"His spirit hunting after new fancies."

A worthy ecclesiastic about the court perceiving this, undertook to lecture his majesty upon the subject, and expressed his surprise that he could slight so beautiful a lady for others evidently her inferior. The king, instead of answering the question, asked the priest what dish he was most partial to. "Partridges," answered the friar, in an emphatic tone, while his eyes glistened and his lips moved involuntarily at the ideas which the mention of his favourite repast called forth—"partridges, your majesty." The next morning the worthy clergyman was lodged in prison, and for fourteen days, morning, noon, and night—breakfast, dinner, and supper—partridges and partridges only were set before him, until the gastric juices of the worthy ecclesiastic could no longer endure this horrible monotony, and he exclaimed, in an agony of feeling, that "they might imprison him as long as they liked, if they would only give him something else to eat!" Upon this the king sent for him. "How is this," said his majesty, "that you complain of your favourite fare?" "Partridges are excellent," quoth the friar, "but always partridges!" "The queen is excellent," retorted his majesty, "but always the queen!" and so the king had his joke and the priest a change of diet. Now we hope that no person whose imagination particularly qualifies him for finding out a bad moral, will infer from this, that we mean to applaud his majesty's very improper and naughty behaviour; all that is meant to be deduced from the story is, that Shakspeare, always Shakspeare, would be neither profitable to the managers, nor pleasing to the public.

The mind of man requires a variety of intellectual food, the same as his stomach requires a variety of animal nutriment; and that mind is perhaps the healthiest, and that stomach the strongest, that can enjoy themselves off whatever is set before them: what they lose in extreme delicacy, they make up in vigour. With some people, as the common saying is, "all is fish that comes to their net;" if they can get a good tragedy or comedy, so much the better; if not, an opera will do as well; if that is not to be had, why then a broad farce, or a broader melo-drama; or in default of these, even an extravaganza or a pantomime; always provided, that the thing be tolerably good of its kind; and the man who on one night laughs heartily at the extravagance of Hilcon, or the extravagant extravagance of Barnes, in some of their "broad-grin" parts, is more likely on the next to relish the passion and pathos, the exquisite poetry and divine philosophy of Shakspeare, than one of those squeamish and pedantic personages, whose and who dare not be caught enjoying themselves with any thing save what is of acknowledged excellence, and turn up their good-for-nothing noses at the efforts of every author or actor who has not as yet received the stamp of public approbation. "Marry, hang them!" It is really amusing at times to sit in a theatre and witness the behaviour of one of these gentry—to see the air of critical primness which he assumes on the entrance of a celebrated actor, or to observe the smile of supercilious pity which he casts upon some poor wretch beside him, who is thrown into ecstasies by a comic song, a bad joke, Barnes's wig coming off, or any other interesting incident which "Sir Oracle" esteems frivolous. And when two of them get together, the way in which they reflect each other's folly—the looks of deep significance that pass between them—and the air of conscious superiority with which they survey the ordinary mortals around them, is as instructing and amusing as the play, let it be what it may.

In theatrical matters we must confess that our own taste is by no means particularly fastidious, but is capable of embracing all the different species (not individuals) of the dramatic family; even the tribe most vilified of all, known by the appellation of melo-dramas, and though, certainly, this class owns many members too bad for human endurance, yet there are others capable of interesting and exciting the feelings in no common degree. Though there are bad melo-dramas without number, yet a good melo-drama is not so bad a thing. It is a sort of skeleton tragedy, without the stateliness and poetry, where the murders are committed in simple prose, and the villainies carried on without the aid of blank verse. It is the sketch and outline of a tragedy where actions are represented rather than characters delineated, and where every thing is broad and general, coarse and rough, but which when well enacted and kept within the moderate bounds of probability, sometimes excite the feelings to a pitch that prevents sleep during the more interesting scenes. Nay, so very unrefined is our taste that we cannot join in the prevailing hue and cry against gaudy spectacles and splendid scenery, thinking them very good in their place, and even feel an unbecoming interest in the "dresses and decorations," which is one reason why, independent of the easy and correct performances of the one, and the sprightly and spirited personations of the other, we always like to see Mrs. Wallack and Mrs. Sharpe on the boards; both dress so well, particularly Mrs. Sharpe, who in correct taste, variety, richness, and appropriateness of costume, excels any lady we have ever seen on the stage—and, this is no small merit, for a well-dressed woman is at any time pleasanter to look upon than a dull play. There are, however, some things occasionally exhibited which there is no getting over, to wit, dogs, horses, elephants, and the brute creation in general—real fire and real water, wonderful ascensions from the stage to the gallery, impressive ceremonies of shooting deserters, jugglers, rope-dancers, and little children—these are unalloyed, unmitigated evils.

But though gauds and show, and spectacles and melo-dramas are pleasant enough occasionally and in their place, it is the interest and duty of every one who values sound rational dramatic representations to raise his voice against them when they are too frequently introduced, and assume an undue importance in the evening's entertainment. They are well enough as a dessert after more solid and substantial aliment, but if furnished as the principal intellectual food for the theatre-going public, the inevitable consequence will be depravity of taste and attenuation of intellect. Let a good tragedy or comedy, which in itself contains enough poetry and passion, wit and sense for any reasonable man for one evening, be first enacted, and then let whatever popular nonsense most in vogue occasionally follow, by which arrangement all parties will be satisfied. Though the public cannot justly be charged with indifference in respect to Shakspeare, yet it is to be regretted that they certainly do display an apathy towards the genuine old comedies, (ah! they know not the treasures that they pass unheeded by) yet this, in a great measure, arises from their not being familiar with their merits. The Park theatre has now a stock company capable of, to say the least, acting respectably almost any comedy in the English language, and the managers ought to endeavour to create a taste for the more correct appreciation of the genuine excellencies of the old dramatic authors. Let them not be discouraged by a few indifferent houses, but persevere. If they were to set apart a particular night in each week for the production of a sterling comedy, this would amount to between forty and fifty pieces of real merit in the course of the season—an immense acquisition. And if the newspapers and literary journals were to make a point of especially noticing and commenting on that evening's performance, there is little doubt that in a short time it would not only be creditable and profitable to the managers, but creditable and profitable to the public.

VARIETIES.

MEMORY.

Fond memory, like a mocking bird,
Within the widowed heart is heard,
Repeating every touching tone
Of voices that from earth have gone.

THE FIRST GRAY HAIR.—A gray hair was espied among the raven locks of a fair friend of ours, a few days since. "O! pray, pull it out," she exclaimed. "If I pull it out, ten will come to the funeral," replied the lady who had made the unwelcome discovery. "Pluck it out, nevertheless," said the dark-haired damsel, "it is no sort of consequence how many come, if they only come in black."

AN INGENIOUS APOLOGY.—"Why," said a country clergyman to one of his flock, "do you always sleep in your pew when I am in the pulpit, while you are all attention to every stranger I invite?" "Because, sir, when you preach I am sure all's right; but I can't trust a stranger without keeping a good look out."

HYPERBOLE.—A Vermont horse jockey boasting the other day of the speed of his horse, gravely asserted that he could trot seventeen miles an hour. "Seventeen miles an hour!" says a bystander, "I guess as how that's a thumper." "My dear fellow," replied he of the Green Mountain, "seventeen miles is no great feat for the creature now; for when he was but two years old, the lightning killed the old mare, and chased the colt all around the pasture, without getting within ten rods of him."

TO IDA.

I HAD a dream—a sunny dream—and it was all of thee:
I saw an angel floating by—I heard a voice of glee!
And spirit-like thou glided on within a festive hall,
Where starry eyes flash'd bright, but thine the brightest of them all.
There was a glow upon thy brow, and music in thy tread,
As flying feet thy airy foot the mazy measure led.
And mirth laugh'd out with louder tone where thou wert passing by,
And sorrow as she met thy glance forgot to breathe her sigh;
And many a hand an offering brought and laid it at thy shrine,
But only one thou smiled upon—methought that one was mine!

I had a dream—a fever'd dream—and it was all of thee:
I saw an angel floating by—I heard a voice of glee!
But though thy image yet was rife with passion's wildest thrill,
I madly turn'd my gaze away. And though thy voice was still
Such as a peri in her bower would hush her lute to hear,
Oh, mournfully, oh, mournfully, it linger'd on mine ear.
Methought that many a gem I saw upon thy shining hair,
But not the token and the gift which thou wert wont to wear;
That for a girl rich thy waist had changed the slender zone,
The earnest of thy Clarence's love—my cherished and my own!

I had a dream—a waking dream—and it was all of thee:
I saw an angel floating by—I heard a voice of glee!
And thou wert there—all changeless still—and breath'd upon my lip,
And dash'd the tear-cup from my hand which sorrow bade me sip.
And then methought thou murmur'd near as pitying hours speak,
Till glow'd my burning forehead like the carmine of thy cheek:
And in thy liquid eyes I saw thy soul all lustrous shine,
A halo sleeping in the light of diadems divine;
And hope sigh'd on her shell and lent thy voice its understrain:
Oh! for that dream—that waking dream—that dream of thee again!

THE WOODLAND VALE.

O know ye not, that in the scale of time
Are days which, in their might of interest,
Outweigh the rounded aggregate of years?
Brief hours, o'er which eternity shall throw
The sunshine of her mind? 'Tis even thus
With earth—it has sweet radiant spots retired,
Green vale, or hill, or grove, or mountain glen,
Which, hearts familiar with their loveliness,
High prize above an empire's dazzling throne.
Nor are they sole enshrined in tropic climes,
Where the clear sun his richest radiance darts
On blooms that never die; on garniture
Of verdant fields that lasts the live-long year;
On fruits of every hue, whose ample store,
But half uncropped, embosses o'er and o'er
Nature's rich velveting with fragrant gems
Of ruby, sapphire, amethyst, and pearl.
Wherever human heart hath found a home,
Whose hallow'd joys have strewn life's rugged path
With flowers of sinless memories, that shed
A sweet undying fragrance on the mind,
There is a sunny spot—an Eden there!
Such is the scene my boyhood days have known:
A vale serene, in the green hills it sleeps
Like blooming virgin in her sylvan bower,
Enclosed with mountain battlements, that fling
A shadowy freshness o'er it, and shut out
The din and discord of a farring world.
Bright are its skies and waters, rich its clouds,
In all the tints of light superbly rich;
And oft in trance of thought, by fancy charm'd,
While gazing on their golden minarets,
I've dream'd that dimly through the blue serene
Heaven's radiant palaces of glory shone;
Or that angelic architects, to please
The good with visions of their future home,
Those mansions emblematical had rear'd.
To all is nature kind; but here methinks
She partial is and lavish of her charms.
Its every scene with loveliness is clothed,
As with a robe by beauty's fingers wrought;
And soft its gales, which from the birchen woods
Their dewy odours waft on night's still wing,
To hush the embosom'd bowers. More green its green,
More fresh its balmy freshness, and withal
More warm its sympathies, than now becomes
Affection's lyre to sing, lest fulsome deem'd.
Most graceful bends its curvature of hills,
And pleasantly they stoop in verdant slopes
To kiss the warbling brooks, that coyly hide
In fringing willow depths their gush of joy.
Its air is full of living melodies,
Outrung from silvery cascades, waving boughs,
And feather'd minstrels' harps of thrilling fall;
For here the spring-bird earliest comes, and here

persons present, engaged in nearly the same occupation. At one side of the fire sat the village schoolmaster—a thin, pale, peak-nosed little man, with a powdered periwig, terminating behind in a long queue,
and an expression of self-conceit strongly depicted upon his countenance. He was amusing himself with a pipe, from which he threw forth volumes of smoke with an air of great satisfaction. Opposite to him sat the parson of the parish—a fat, bald-headed personage

dressed in a rusty suit of black, and having his shoes adorned with immense silver buckles. Between these two characters sat the exciseman, with a pipe in one hand and a tankard in the other. To complete the group, nothing is wanted but to mention the landlady, a plump, rosy dame of thirty-five, who was seated by the schoolmaster's side, apparently listening to some sage remarks which that little gentleman was throwing out for her edification.

But to return to the stranger. No sooner had he entered the kitchen, followed by the landlord, than the eyes of the company were directed upon him. His hat was so broad in the brim, his spurs were so long, his stature so great, and his face so totally hid by the collar of his immense black cloak, that he instantly attracted the attention of every person present. His voice, when he desired the master of the house to help him off with his mantle, was likewise so harsh that they all heard it with sudden curiosity. Nor did this abate when the cloak was removed, and his hat laid aside. A tall, athletic, red-haired man, of the middle age, was then made manifest. He had on a red frock coat, a red vest, and a red neckcloth; nay, his gloves were red! What was more extraordinary, when the overalls which covered his thighs were unbuttoned, it was discovered that his small-clothes were red likewise.

"All red!" ejaculated the parson, almost involuntarily.

"As you say, the gentleman is all red!" added the schoolmaster, with his characteristic flippancy. He was checked by a look from the landlady. His remark, however, caught the stranger's ear, and he turned round upon him with a penetrating glance. The schoolmaster tried to smoke it off bravely. It would not do: he felt the power of that look, and was reduced to almost immediate silence.

"Now, bring me your boot-jack," said the horseman.

The boot-jack was brought, and the boots pulled off. To the astonishment of the company, a pair of red stockings were brought into view. The landlord shrugged his shoulders, the exciseman did the same, the landlady shook her head, the parson exclaimed, "All red!" as before, and the schoolmaster would have repeated it, but he had not yet recovered from his rebuke.

"Faith, this is odd!" observed the host.

"Rather odd," said the stranger, seating himself between the parson and the exciseman. The landlord was confounded, and did not know what to think of the matter.

After sitting for a few moments, the new-comer requested the host to hand him a nightcap, which he would find in his hat. He did so: it was a red worsted one; and he put it upon his head.

Here the exciseman broke silence, by ejaculating, "Red again!" The landlady gave him an admonitory knock on the elbow: it was too late. The stranger heard his remark, and regarded him with one of those piercing glances for which his fiery eye seemed so remarkable.

"All red!" murmured the parson once more.

"Yes, Doctor Poundtext, the gentleman, as you say, is all red," re-echoed the schoolmaster, who by this time had recovered his self-possession. He would have gone on, but the landlady gave him a fresh admonition, by trampling upon his toes; and her husband winked in token of silence. As in the case of the exciseman, the warnings were too late.

"Now, landlord," said the stranger, after he had been seated a minute, "may I trouble you to get me a pipe and a can of your best Burton? But, first of all, open my portmanteau, and give me out my slippers."

The host did as he was desired, and produced a pair of red morocco slippers. Here an involuntary exclamation broke out from the company. It begun with the parson, and was taken up by the schoolmaster, the exciseman, the landlady, and the landlord, in succession. "More red!" proceeded from every lip, with different degrees of loudness. The landlord's was the least loud, the schoolmaster's the loudest of all.

"I suppose, gentlemen," said the stranger, "you were remarking upon my slippers."

"Eh—yes! we were just saying that they were red," replied the schoolmaster.

"And pray," demanded the other, as he raised the pipe to his mouth, "did you never before see a pair of red slippers?"

This question staggered the respondent: he said nothing, but looked to the parson for assistance.

"But you are all red," observed the latter, taking a full draught from a foaming tankard which he held in his hand.

"And you are all black," said the other, as he withdrew the pipe from his mouth, and emitted a copious puff of tobacco smoke. "The hat that covers your numskull is black, your beard is black, your coat is black, your vest is black; your small-clothes, your stockings, your shoes, all are black. In a word, Doctor Poundtext, you are —"

"What am I, sir?" said the parson, bursting with rage.

"Ay, what is he, sir?" rejoined the schoolmaster.

"He is a black-coat," said the stranger, with a contemptuous sneer, "and you are a pedagogue." This sentence was followed by a profound calm. Not a word was spoken by any of the company, but each gazed upon his neighbour in silence. In the faces of the parson and schoolmaster anger was principally depicted: the exciseman's mouth was turned down in disdain, the landlady's was curled into a sarcastic smile; and as for the landlord, it would be difficult to say whether astonishment, anger, or fear, most predominated in his mind. During this ominous tranquillity the stranger looked on unmoved, drinking and smoking alternately with total indifference. The schoolmaster would have said something had he dared, and so would the parson; but both were yet smarting too bitterly under their rebuff to hazard another observation.

In the midst of this mental tumult, the little bandy-legged ostler made his appearance, and announced to the rider that his horse had been rubbed down according to orders. On hearing this, the red man got up from his seat, and walked out to the stable. His departure seemed to act as a sudden relief to those who were left behind. Their tongues, which his presence had bound by a talismanic influence, were loosened, and a storm of words broke forth proportioned to the fearful calm which preceded it.

"Who is that man in red?" said the parson, first breaking silence.

"Ay, who is he?" re-echoed the schoolmaster.

"He is a bit of a conjurer, I warrant," quoth the exciseman.

"I should not wonder," said the landlord, "if he be a spy from France."

"Or a travelling packman," added the landlady.

"I am certain he is no better than he should be," spake the parson again.

"That is clear," exclaimed the whole of the company, beginning with the pedagogue, and terminating as usual with the host. Here was a pause: at last Doctor Poundtext resumed—"I shall question him tightly when he returns; and if his answers are impertinent or unsatisfactory, something must be done."

"Ay, something must be done," said the schoolmaster.

"Whatever you do," said the landlady, "let it be done civilly. I should not like to anger him."

"A fig for his anger!" roared her husband, snapping his fingers. "I shall give him the back of the door in the twinkling of an eye, if he so much as chirps."

"Anger, indeed!" observed the exciseman; "leave that to me and my cudgel!"

"To you and your cudgel!" said the stranger, at this moment entered, and resumed his seat by the fireside, after casting a look of inquiry upon the exciseman. The latter did not say a word; his countenance fell, and he was brandishing a moment before his legs.

There was another pause in the appearance of the red man again, on the voices of the company. The schoolmaster, was silent also; and disposed to say any thing. The assemblage of quakers. At one end of the plump person, with the tankard, the other placed upon his forehead. At the opposite side sat the exciseman, puffing vehemently from a tobacco-pipe, the jolly form of the landlady, and at his side the landlord stood at some distance. For a time the whole, with the exception of the stranger, were engaged in anxious thought. The one looked to the other with wondering glances, but though all equally wished to speak, no one liked to be the first to open the conversation. "Who can this man be?" "What does he want here?" "Where is he from, and whither is he bound?" Such were the inquiries which occupied every mind. Had the object of their curiosity been a brown man, a black man, or even a green man, there would have been nothing extraordinary; and he might have entered the inn and departed from it as unquestioned as before he came. But to be a red man! There was in this something so startling that the lookers-on were beside themselves with amazement. The first to break this strange silence was the parson.

"Sir," said he, "we have been thinking that you are —"

"That I am a conjurer, a French spy, a travelling packman, or something of the sort," observed the stranger. Doctor Poundtext started back on his chair, and well he might; for these words, which the man in red had spoken, were the very ones he himself was about to utter.

"Who are you, sir?" resumed he, in manifest perturbation. "What is your name?"

"My name," replied the other, "is Red."

"And where, in heaven's name, were you born?" demanded the astonished parson.

"I was born on the borders of the Red sea." Doctor Poundtext had not another word to say. The schoolmaster was equally astounded, and withdrew the pipe from his mouth: that of the exciseman dropped to the ground: the landlord groaned aloud, and his spouse held up her hands in mingled astonishment and awe.

After giving them this last piece of information, the strange man arose from his seat, broke his pipe in pieces, and pitched the fragments into the fire; then, throwing his long cloak carelessly over his shoulders, putting his hat upon his head, and loading himself with his boots, his whip, and his portmanteau, he desired the landlord to show him to his bed, and left the kitchen, after smiling sarcastically at its inmates, and giving them a familiar and unceremonious nod.

His disappearance was the signal for fresh alarm in the minds of those left behind. Not a word was said till the return of the innkeeper, who in a short time descended from the bed-room over-head, to which he had conducted his guest. On re-entering the kitchen, he was encountered by a volley of interrogations. The parson, the schoolmaster, the exciseman, and his own wife, questioned him over and over again. "Who was the man in red?—he must have seen him before—he must have heard of him—in a word, he must know something about him." The host protested "that he never beheld the stranger till that hour; it was the first time he had made his appearance at the Black Swan, and, so help him heaven, it should be the last!"

"Why don't you turn him out?" exclaimed the exciseman.

"If you think you are able to do it, you are heartily welcome," replied the landlord. "For my part, I have no notion of coming to close quarters with the shank of his whip, or his great, red, sledge-hammer fist." This was an irresistible argument, and the proposer of forcible ejection said no more upon the subject.

At this time the party could hear the noise of heavy footsteps above them. They were those of the red man, and sounded with slow and measured tread.—They listened for a quarter of an hour longer, in expectation that they would cease. There was no pause: the steps continued, and seemed to indicate that the person was amusing himself by walking up and down the room.

It would be impossible to describe the multiplicity of feelings which agitated the minds of the company. Fear, surprise, anger, and curiosity, ruled them by turns, and kept them incessantly upon the rack.—There was something mysterious in the visitor who had just left them—something which they could not fathom—something unaccountable. "Who could he be?" This was the question that each put to the other, but no one could give any thing like a rational answer.

Meanwhile the evening wore on apace, and though the bell of the parish church hard by sounded the tenth hour, no one seemed inclined to take the hint to depart. Even the parson heard it without regard, to such a pitch was his curiosity excited. About this time also the sky, which had hitherto been tolerably clear, began to be overclouded. Distant peals of thunder were heard; and thick sultry drops of rain pattered at intervals against the casement of the inn: every thing seemed to indicate a tempestuous evening. But the storm which threatened to rage without was unnoticed. Though the drops fell heavily; though gleams of lightning flashed by, followed by the report of distant thunder, and the winds began to hiss and whistle among the trees of the neighbouring cemetery, yet all these external signs of elementary tumult were as nothing to the deep, solemn footsteps of the red man. There seemed to be no end to his walking. An hour had he paced up and down the chamber without the least interval of repose, and he was still engaged in this occupation as at first. In this there was something incredibly mysterious; and the party below, notwithstanding their numbers, felt a vague and indescribable dread beginning to creep over them. The more they reflected upon the character of the stranger, the more unnatural did it appear. The redness of his hair and complexion, and, still more, the fiery hue of his garment, struck them with astonishment. But this was little to the freezing and benumbing glance of his eye, the strange tones of his voice, and his miraculous birth, on the borders of the Red sea. There was now no longer any smoking in the kitchen. The subjects which occupied their minds were of too engrossing a nature to be treated with levity; and they drew their chairs closer, with a sort of irresistible and instinctive attraction.

While these things were going on, the bandy-legged ostler entered, in manifest alarm. He came to inform his master that the stranger's horse had gone mad, and was kicking and tearing at every thing around, as if he would break his manger to pieces. Here a loud neighing and rushing were heard in the stable. "Ay, there he goes," continued he. "I believe the devil is in the beast, if he is not the old enemy himself. Ods, master, if you saw his eyes: they are like —"

"What are they like?" demanded the landlord. "Ay, what are they like?" exclaimed the rest with equal impatience.

"Ods, if they a'n't like burning coals!" ejaculated the ostler, trembling from head to foot, and squeezing himself in among the others, on a chair which stood hard by. His information threw fresh alarm over the company, and they were more agitated and confused than ever.

During the whole of this time the sound of walking over-head never ceased for one moment. The heavy tread was unabated: there was not the least interval of repose, nor could a pendulum have been more regular in its motions. Had there been any relaxation, any pause, any increase, or any diminution, of rapidity in the footsteps, they would have been endurable; but there was no such thing. The same deadening, monotonous, stupefying sound continued, like clockwork, to operate incessantly above their heads. Nor was there any abatement of the storm without; the wind blowing among the trees of the cemetery in a sepulchral moan; the rain beating against the panes of glass with the impetuous loudness of hail; and lightning and thunder flashing and pealing at brief intervals through the murky firmament. The noise of the elements was indeed frightful, and it was heightened by the voice of the sable steed like that of a spirit of darkness; but the whole, as we have just hinted, was as nothing to the deep, solemn, mysterious treading of the red man.

Innumerable were their conjectures concerning the character of this personage. It has been mentioned that the landlady conceived him at first to be a travelling packman, the landlord a French spy, and the exciseman a conjurer. Now their opinions were wholly changed, and they looked upon him as something a great deal worse. The parson, in the height of his learning, regarded him as an emanation of the tempter himself; and in this he was confirmed by the erudite opinion of the schoolmaster. As to the ostler, he could say nothing about the man, but he was willing to stake his professional knowledge that his horse was kith and kin to the evil one. Such were the various doctrines promulgated in the kitchen of the Black Swan.

"If he be like other men, how could he anticipate me, as he did, in what I was going to say?" observed the parson.

"Born on the borders of the Red sea!" ejaculated the landlord.

"Heard ye how he repeated to us what we were talking about during his absence in the stable?" remarked the exciseman.

"And how he knew that I was a pedagogue?" added the schoolmaster.

"And how he called on me by my name, although he never saw nor heard of me before?" said the ostler in conclusion. Such a mass of evidence was irresistible. It was impossible to overlook the results to which it naturally led.

"If more proof is wanting," resumed the parson after a pause, "only look to his dress. What christian would think of travelling about the country in red? It is a type of the hell-fire from which he is sprung."

"Did you observe his hair hanging down his back like a bunch of carrots?" asked the exciseman.

"Such a diabolical glance in his eye!" said the schoolmaster.

"Such a voice!" added the landlord. "It is like the sound of a cracked clarionet."

"His feet are not cloven," observed the landlady.

"No matter," exclaimed the landlord; "the devil, when he chooses, can have as good legs as his neighbours."

"Better than some of them," quoth the lady, looking peevishly at the lower limbs of her husband.

Meanwhile the incessant treading continued unabated, although two long hours had passed since its commencement. There was not the slightest cessation to the sound, while out of doors the storm raged with violence, and in the midst of it the hideous neighing and stamping of the black horse were heard with pre-eminent loudness. At this time the fire of the kitchen began to burn low. The sparkling blaze was gone, and in its stead nothing but a dead red lustre emanated from the grate. One candle had just expired, having burned down to the socket. Of the one which remained the unanuffed wick was nearly three inches in length, black and crooked at the point, and standing like a ruined tower amid an envelopment of sickly yellow flame; while around the fire's equally decaying lustre sat the frightened coterie, narrowing their circle as its brilliancy faded away, and eyeing each other like apparitions amidst the increasing gloom.

At this time the clock of the steeple struck the hour of midnight, and the tread of the stranger suddenly ceased. There was a pause for some minutes—afterwards a rustling—then a noise as of something drawn along the floor of his room. In a moment thereafter his door opened; then it shut with violence, and heavy footsteps were heard trampling down the stair. The inmates of the kitchen shook with alarm as the tread came nearer. They expected every moment to behold the red man enter, and stand before them in his native character. The landlady fainted outright: the exciseman followed her example: the landlord gasped in an agony of terror: and the schoolmaster uttered a pious ejaculation for the behoof of his soul. Doctor Poundtext was the only one who preserved any degree of composure. He managed in a trembling voice, to call out, "Avaunt, satan! I exorcise thee from hence to the bottom of the Red sea!"

"I am going as fast as I can," said the stranger, as he passed the kitchen-door on his way to the open air. His voice aroused the whole concourse from their stupor. They started up, and by a simultaneous effort rushed to the window. There they beheld the tall figure of a man, enveloped in a black cloak, walking across the yard on his way to the stable. He had on a broad-brimmed, low-crowned hat, top-boots, with enormous spurs, and carried a gigantic whip in one hand, and a portmanteau in the other. He entered the stable, remained there about three minutes, and came out leading forth his fiery steed thoroughly accoutred. In the twinkling of an eye he got upon his back, waved his hand to the company, who were surveying him through the window, and clapping spurs to his charger, galloped off furiously, with a hideous and unnatural laugh, through the midst of the storm.

On going up stairs to the room which the devil had honoured with his presence, the landlord found that his infernal majesty had helped himself to every thing he could lay his hands upon, having broken into his deak and carried off twenty-five guineas of king's money, a ten pound bank of England note, and sundry articles, such as seals, snuff-boxes, &c. Since that time he has not been seen in these quarters, and if he should, he will do well to beware of Doctor Poundtext, who is a civil magistrate as well as a minister, and who, instead of exorcising him to the bottom of the Red sea, may perhaps exorcise him to the interior of Leicester gaol, to await his trial before the judges of the midland circuit.

Forget-me-not.

There is no rule to be made, for writing letters, but that of being as near what you speak face to face as you can, which is so great a truth, that I am of opinion, writing has lost more mistresses than any one mistake in the whole legend of love.

The scholar without good breeding, is a pedant; the philosopher, a cynic; the soldier, a brute; and every man disagreeable.

Ingredients for a household: morality, order, industry, abundance, and good humour.

I envy no man that knows more than myself, but pity them that know less.

A virtuous mind in a fair body, is a fine picture in a good light.

The longer we live in the world, the more we cling to a few objects.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES—NUMBER VI.

NEW-YORK differs from all our other cities in the varieties of its prospects. If a stranger desired to witness the appearance of stately and retired wealth, I would lead him through the still wide avenues near St. John's church, and along the shadowy paths of its park. For the bustle of manual labour, he should make his way by the docks, among boxes, bales, carts, bars of iron, barrels, and wheel-barrow, with shipping around him from all parts of the world, and the accents of every language breaking upon his ears. For fashion and beauty, he should wander up and down the west side of Broadway; but for the real business of bargaining and speculation, for long heads and cunning hands, Wall-street is the place. There you will see, in the hottest of the dog-days, a knot of knowing geniuses collected together under a great tree, or on the shady side of the way, communicating to each other potent secrets; the rise and fall of empires, which derive importance from their influence on the rise and fall of stock; or brooding over the broken relics of dilapidated banks, with the hope of disposing of the ruins to some advantage.

As the clock struck two, I found myself one afternoon upon the steps of the exchange. The tide seemed setting in towards the large room. I suffered myself to be borne along with it. A few steps conducted me into the midst of this spacious and lofty apartment. This is the hour when merchants and brokers assemble to transact whatever business they may have with each other. The hum of many voices was like the buzzing of bees clustering around their hive. The low continued words of the busy and earnest multitude were blended together, and rose upon the air with a strange uniformity. There was something closely allied to contempt in the feelings with which I regarded the bargain-driving and money-making beings around me.

'Is this,' thought I, 'a rational mode of improving and enjoying life? Is there among this race of men engaged about the paltry means of accumulating wealth, none who might have aspired to a higher destiny? Has not commerce, with her engrossing engagements, stolen poets, historians, orators, statesmen, and philosophers, from fame and the world, to waste them here in the narrow and selfish paths of business? And what avails it, that they should add to the treasures already obtained? It is well enough for the young and poor to seek independence in the paths of the world; but they who have obtained a moderate fortune should abandon the field to other competitors, and be happy in a freedom from all unnecessary restraints. As for me, if I were wealthy, I would build me a cottage in some secluded and lovely spot. The ties of pecuniary hopes and fears should no longer impede the motion of my mind, and check the impulses of my heart. The luxuries of riches should relieve the simplicity of rural pleasures. I would have ever around me the sound of waving branches and running streams; the loveliest roads should meander through landscapes of natural beauty; horses and carriages, the newest, the neatest, the most elegant that money could purchase, should be ever at my command, and she, with her sweet blue eyes and soft hand, should charm me with her society, and inspire every hour with delight. Together we would pursue literature and science; our minds would expand, our hearts grow rich with love, and our lives glide away—'

"Like a silvery summer stream," whispered a voice in my ear, in a tone so low, that it seemed the memory of words gone by.

A light mist passed before me. The shuffling of feet changed into a noise like that of falling water. The sober citizens around increased in height, and took the form of trees. Their arms spread out like branches, and their humming voices softened into the rustling of leaves. Grass and waving flowers grew out from the neatly sanded floor, and the lofty ceiling deepened into azure sky, spread out with graceful clouds. The office of the Morning Herald turned into a brook that dashed and foamed about in some confusion; while the Courier and Enquirer, on the opposite side, glistened in the shape of a broad river that forced a passage in various directions among the hills.

I was standing upon a moss-covered rock, by the trunk of a knotty old tree, that had flourished a few moments before as Jacob Barker, and the potent spirit who had woven these agreeable spells was at my side. His arms were folded on his breast. His face expressed patience, a little dashed with ridicule, and I might have suffered regret at the slight curl of his lip, had not its import been amply contradicted by the good nature of his eyes.

"Your lives would glide away," repeated he, "like a silvery summer stream. Because absent from the crowd of your fellow creatures, do you conceive you could escape the weaknesses of their nature?"

"Surely," said I, "I should enjoy myself more uninterruptedly, if released from harassing cares? He who is deeply engaged in business is stretched on a bed of thorns. He fears the consequences of the responsibilities he has incurred. Obstacles and disappointments continually multiply around him. How can he be happy?"

"To be happy permanently," said my companion, "is not the lot of mortals. The hope of durable happiness on earth, you seem to have surrendered almost by universal consent. Neither philosophy nor virtue can always persuade it to the bosom. It is seldom found where eagerly sought; but, eluding the grasp of the most persevering pursuer, flies to some wretch without a home or friend."

"But," said I, "as there are certain objects which excite pleasurable emotions in us, the more we collect of them about us, the more certainly will our pleasures be multiplied and protracted, and consequently the surer will be our happiness."

"No," said the Genius. "The same objects will not at all times create the same effects, and happiness is not, as you seem to think, a palpable and existing principle. It is not like a place towards which you can travel, with the conviction that you will reach it in a certain number of steps. It is not an object which you may labour for, acquire by skill or violence, and detain by force; but it is an effect of many accidental combinations. It is a mingling up together in proper proportions of numerous properties of mind and matter, which, in their own nature, are ever changing their positions. There is no fixed shape for it. You cannot conjecture in what strange guise it will meet you. Toil for it to the summit of a mountain, and, as you are returning disappointed from its bleak and barren prospect, it will spring up by your feet at the road side. It comes not through whole years. It is too costly a material to constitute the solid fabric of a human life; but, as the diamond is found in small pieces in distant parts of the globe, so it flashes up in momentary streamings, from dark places, in barren soils, amongst the habitations of dangers and anguish. You have caught its feeling from the echo of a flute, a stream of sunlight upon the wall after a gloomy day; a pair of gazing eyes have sent it through your soul like an enchanted arrow, or it has sprung up spontaneously in your bosom, from the mere freshness and glow of health. It is like the light, colouring all things, yet continually altering its hue, and fading the swiftest where it shone the most brightly. The crowd whom your inexperience has just condemned, find it in the path of business. In active occupation their minds discover a pleasure which luxury and repose would fail to furnish. Fields, trees, brooks, and all the similar works of nature, refresh eyes unaccustomed to them, but their unchangeable forms soon suffer the mind to languish for the stirring and improving delights which man realizes in struggles with his fellow man. Remember that from the jarrings of crowded cities, the arts and sciences spring into being. The highest pleasures which nature affords, are produced in the exercise of mind and feeling; and, wherever these repose, you lose the intended superiority of your character, the vigour of pleasure, and the merit of virtue."

Again my eyes were dimmed with a passing cloud. Sky, grass, brooks, and trees, diminished in size and re-assumed their proper appearances. The noise of the brawling stream, hastening over its pebbly channel, sunk again into the shuffling of feet and the hum of many voices. The walls of the apartment closed up around me, and I was still among the most busy and money-making of my fellow-citizens. F.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

GLANCES INTO THE EAST.

ELEVATION OF MAHMOUD, THE PRESENT SULTAN, TO THE THRONE OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

THE pacha of Rudschuck had kept quiet in his camp while his emissaries were rousing the army. Ramis Effendi and Beggi Effendi, his principal agents, had disposed the oldest officers for the re-establishment of Selim. The capudan pacha promised to assist with all his forces.

Mustapha had quitted Constantinople on the twenty-eighth of July, for a kiosk, situated without the walls. Bairactar, availing himself of the sultan's absence, invited the grand vizier to his camp, under the pretence of important disclosures. When the latter entered the tent of the pacha, he was informed that the troops were in motion towards the seraglio. The terror-struck vizier could find no words to express his astonishment. Bairactar tore the seals from him, ordered him to be arrested, and the troops to advance. The populace of Constantinople, on beholding the same army which had been opposed to the Russians, fancied that peace was concluded, and received the columns with shouts of the wildest applause. These marched towards the outbuildings of the imperial residence. The janissaries, stationed there as guards, bowed when they beheld the sandjak scherif, and the vanguard penetrated into the first court-yard. Scarcely had the bostangi pacha time to shut the inner gate, which leads to the apartments of the servants of the seraglio, but the tchiavoux of the pacha of Rudschuck rushing towards the gate, battered it with their tremendous axes, when the chief of the black slaves appeared on the wall demanding the reason of this violent proceeding.

"Open the gate, vile slave!" shouted Mustapha Bairactar, with a voice of thunder. "I come at the head of my army with the sandjak scherif."

"Not before the sultan Mustapha has given orders," replied the faithful slave.

"Away with sultan Mustapha," exclaimed Bairactar. "It is the sultan Selim who is our master; we are here to deliver him from the hands of his enemies, to do homage to his virtues, and to re-establish him on the throne of his ancestors."

The tremendous voice of the pacha of Rudschuck, his threats to bring forward the cannon, the furious shouts of the soldiers, had filled the inmates of the seraglio with such terror, that the portal was on the point of being opened, in spite of the resistance of the bostangi pacha, when sultan Mustapha appeared. This prince had no sooner arrived at his summer pavilion, than he was informed by his mother of Mustapha Bairactar's march to Constantinople. Without delaying for a moment, he hastened disguised on board a trireme, flew back to the seraglio, whose communication with the sea and the kiosk the conspirators had imprudently neglected to guard, and joined the affright-

ed crowd of his slaves, to behold the designs of the conspirators on the point of execution. The juncture was critical. The sanguinary prince, forgetting that his cousin had spared his life on a similar occasion, coolly ordered the kiaser aga to strangle Selim, and to carry his corpse to Mustapha Bairactar.

It was the hour of prayer. Selim with his attendants were standing with their hands outstretched, their faces towards Mecca, when the executioners entered with cords concealed under their cloaks. Neither the prince nor his servants had the least suspicion of their cruel design, supposing they were come to deliver a message; but the moment Selim prostrated himself, invoking the name of Allah, the chief of the black slaves beckoned his satellites, and, throwing himself upon his victim, he flung a rope over his neck—his companions partly assisting him and partly threatening with their daggers the panic-struck attendants. The stunned prince, however, recovered his senses. After a desperate struggle with his executioners he succeeded in striking some of them down, while his faithful slaves were rushing upon the rest, endeavouring to seize their poniards. The kiaser aga had received so violent a blow, that he fell at the feet of the prince. It was then that the inhuman monster, by taking advantage of his position, deprived the unfortunate prince first of his senses, and then of his life!

The corpse was brought before Mustapha. The frivolous tyrant cast towards it a glance of ferocious joy, and exultingly exclaimed, "Open the gates! and deliver Selim over to Mustapha Bairactar, as he demands it."

The pacha of Rudschuck had approached as the portal opened, to pay homage to his master and benefactor; but no sooner had he beheld the lifeless remains of Selim, than, almost maddened to despair, he exclaimed,

"Unhappy master! what have I done? I am come to restore to you the imperial sceptre, and have brought you death."

He threw himself down over the corpse, kissed its hands and feet, and bathed them with his tears. The whole army stood motionless and in silent rage. But the moments were precious. Seid Ali, the capudan pacha, less accessible to feelings, took Bairactar by the arm, and raising him, said,

"And does it become the pacha of Rudschuck to cry like a woman? It is vengeance, and not tears, the sultan Selim demands. Let us not suffer a tyrant to exult over his crimes, and secure himself a throne by a second murder of his brother, the sultan Mahmoud."

Mustapha Bairactar, awakening as from a dream, cried,

"Let Mustapha be arrested, and Mahmoud proclaimed sultan; and may the sword of the executioner destroy the vile slaves who dared to lay their hands on the sacred person of sultan Selim!"

The words were no sooner uttered, than pages, slaves and soldiers, rushed forward to carry them into execution, and to throw Mustapha into the same prison where Selim had breathed his last. Others hastened to find Mahmoud, who, doomed to the same death with Selim by his cruel brother, had fled from his apartment, and assisted by his faithful slaves, had concealed himself. He was discovered after a long search, and with difficulty drawn from beneath a pile of carpets, almost dead with terror. Being hurried before the pacha of Rudschuck, the latter accosted him:

"My master! A terrible crime has deprived us of sultan Selim, our legitimate sovereign and benefactor. You are possessed of all the virtues of this great monarch. Be our master! live long to the glory of our holy religion, and the prosperity of the Ottoman empire."

When Mustapha Bairactar had pronounced these words, he prostrated himself before sultan Mahmoud, kissed the earth near his feet, and continued in this humble attitude until the new sultan commanded him to rise, proclaiming him at the same time grand vizier.

Such was the manner in which Mahmoud the II. the present sultan, was raised to the throne of the Ottoman empire.

MUSTAPHA BAIRACTAR.

It was to this distinguished character that Mahmoud owed the sceptre of his empire; for the restoration of which, in its ancient splendour, the energetic grand vizier began to exert himself with the whole strength of his superior genius. There were at this time (1808) two bodies of men in Turkey, equally powerful, and equally opposed to all reforms, the janissaries and the ulemas, lawyers, both the deadliest enemies of the grand vizier. The former might be subdued by the sword. It was the latter Bairactar most dreaded. An incident, which occurred shortly after the elevation of Mahmoud, served not a little to increase their rancour.

A young Greek, a native of Agrapha, on the frontiers of Thessalonica, had opened a grocery shop at Constantinople. Above his store, and in the same house, there lived a young beautiful moslem, the widow of a Turk, who had left her a great fortune. She beheld the young Greek through the blinds again and again, and a passion arose gradually in her bosom, which she was not strong enough to resist. Bent upon conversing with him—a desire rather dangerous, as no stranger, and still less a christian, is permitted by law, to enter the apartments of a Turkish female—she demanded an account of the goods she had received from him. He sent his bill. His fair neighbour, pretending not to comprehend the writing, returned it—an explanation followed on the part of the Greek, which was found still more unintelligible. At last the love-enraptured moslem requested him to come in person, where he would find her attendants to settle the account. The young Greek felt quite uneasy, yet taking courage, he ascended the stairs, and was received by the female slaves. But what was his astonishment when they informed him of their orders to bring him before their mistress! He followed trembling. The beautiful widow was half seated on the ottomane—she beckoned him to take a place at her side, and after some hints began to unfold her heart, to discover her passion, and to press him to marry her. She threatened him in case of refusal; not even concealing from him that revenge would be easy, by denouncing him as an intruder, who had gained admission under false pretences. After this, his visits became more frequent; and, as he attended his business regularly, no suspicion was excited. One day, however, when he was absent, two janissaries entered his shop to make some purchases. The demanded goods could not be found, and the young Greek was called down by his faithful confidant. He entered with a mien so confused that the janissaries were startled, and began to suspect that everything was not right. Their tantalizing questions greatly disconcerted him; they became more importunate, promising silence provided he confessed. The imprudent giaour, supposing that the soldiers were already in the secret, betrayed himself. The janissaries had no sooner understood the nature of his transgression than they hastened before the tribunal of the capuschi pacha, under whose cognizance the trespass came. The judge, after a short examination, condemned the Greek to die, conformably to the spirit and letter of the law. The sentence was laid before Mustapha Bairactar, the grand vizier, who, after having summoned the ulemas before him, demanded of them, whether they were convinced in their conscience, that the christian had deserved death? He was answered in the affirmative. The grand vizier pleaded that the young christian, far from having premeditated the crime, had rather been forced into it; and, if there was any one culpable, it was certainly the widow. He accordingly annulled the sentence of death pronounced against the christian, insisting at the same time on the punishment of the widow: the ulemas, however, demanded and obtained her pardon.

Mustapha Bairactar then sent for the young Greek, whom he accosted in a mild tone.

"Rayah," said he, "it is in vain that I have annulled the sentence of the ulemas, if thou remainest at Stamboul. Even I could not protect thee from the poniards which threaten thy life. Settle thy affairs, and in three days thou must be far from this city. Return to thy country, and guard thy tongue, bury thy adventure within thyself. Allah be with thee!"

The Greek returned in safety; but the high-minded vizier became the victim of his humanity. It was but a few weeks afterwards, that the great revolt of the janissaries broke out. They had been instigated by the ulemas to set fire to the houses adjoining the palace of the vizier. The flame was the signal for the general rise of the conspirators. A bloody battle ensued; the partisans of Bairactar were defeated, he himself, shut up in his own house and unable to defend himself, was found suffocated with two of his faithful slaves. With him fled the spirit of the better order of things. Bairactar was a noble Turk, a man fearless and just, soaring equally above the prejudices of his countrymen and their ignorance. His energy had roused the people from the deep lethargy into which the despotism of thirty tyrants* had thrown them. Their fanaticism rendered his efforts in vain. Had he lived longer, the Russian eagles would never have appeared before the seven towers. S.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

MELANCHOLY.

"What are spirits? Light indeed and gay;
They are like winter-flowers, not last a day;
Comes a rude icy wind, they feel and fade away."

I LOVE to study the human character in its early formation; to watch it in its progress towards perfection, ere the cold maxims or rude touch of the world have stamped upon it suspicion and distrust, and taught it deceit. I love to trace the workings of the mind in the varying of the countenance; to seek for feeling and sensibility, too delicate, too timid to be expressed in words in the depths of a full eye, or the ray of a passing smile; to mark the sudden checking of a sentiment which has risen to the lips lest it should be wrong, or lest it should meet with contempt and ridicule from those who cannot understand it. I think that the young are generally inclined to melancholy. There are those who will laugh at the idea. Such have forgotten their own youthful feelings; they have been annihilated by the selfish calculations of maturer years, and they have left upon the soul no trace. To me the sentiment seems just and natural. In speaking of youth I have reference only to those few short years which intervene between childhood and manhood. Childhood is the spring of life; it has its flowers and its thorns; but its flowers soon fade and its thorns are forgotten. We revel in the pleasures of that age without thought of the past, or fear of the future; and the remembrance of its sorrows exist not when those sorrows have passed away. It is true, we then receive impressions which cannot be effaced, but they sink into the soul, there to remain till reflection calls them forth, and the surface remains unruffled or disturbed but for a moment. But youth is the season during which we enjoy more of exquisite happiness or misery, or more of both than in any other. Our feelings, our passions, operate upon us with a concentrated force, and the strength of reason is as yet insufficient to stem the tide. He who has attained the entire command of his passions, the proper regulation of his feelings, possesses the secret of happiness. In youth this cannot be; in the rashness of its judgment it repels the very thought. The calm and even surface of the pure lake has no charms for its unbridled imagination. It delights in the roar of the torrent, and the deep stillness produced by the subsiding of the storm. The heart is awakened to the beauties of nature and of art, and its quickened sensibilities are alive to every touch of joy or sorrow. Every new object it meets with in its path excites some latent unknown feeling. The temper of the mind so continually varying, it is not strange that melancholy should preponderate; for in the sensitive bosom, is it not in this world the feeling oftenest excited? Alas, who can answer in the negative? It is not, however, like the melancholy of a bereaved heart or shattered constitution. It has no sympathy with the despair of a guilty mind, with the hopelessness of the unbeliever, or the wavering confidence of the sceptic. It is the depression caused by the temporary exhaustion of too highly raised spirits. It is relieved by a gentle indulgence, and soothed by the quieting thoughts of a lonely hour. I have sometimes felt, when under its influence, that the future was a blank, that hope had forsaken me, and left me desolate and wretched. In such moments I have wandered forth beneath the starry sky of a summer's night, and gazed upon the blue heaven with a wish to fly to its shelter from the rude storms of earth. I have thought of the countless worlds, ruled and directed by one all-powerful hand, and shrunk within myself at the idea of the littleness and insignificance of one human heart; of one atom in the great mass of matter and of mind. But, when the feeling has passed away, and a soft still voice whispered that even that little atom is not unregarded by the all-seeing eye, the consciousness has penetrated to my inmost heart. Thought upon thought have rushed over me with almost inconceivable force, chasing before them each feeling of discontent and repining, the clouds of the human mind, and leaving its heaven pure and calm. I have walked among the flowery valleys and blooming hills of our own fair land, and felt that in each little flower that faded with the season to bloom again in brighter hours, we might read our own destiny. These hours of saddened feeling are useful to us; they lead us to reflect, to look within ourselves for sources of happiness; to nature's works for proofs of future being. And we never turn away unsatisfied from such researches, for

"Nature never did betray
The heart that loved her: 'tis her privilege
Through all the years of this our life, to lead
From joy to joy; for she can so inform
The heart that is within us, so impress
With quietness and beauty, and so feed
With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues,
Rash judgments, nor the sneers of selfish men,
Shall e'er prevail against us, or disturb
Our cheerful faith, that all which we behold
Is full of blessings."

I believe there are some who never know these variations of the spirits. They pass for the happiest of human beings; but it is a mistaken idea. They are cheerful, but it is the mere absence of sorrow, the presence of youth and health. Take away these, and they fall into the opposite extreme, and are gloomy and discontented. Tell them of the moments when the very consciousness of life and being is sweet, of the rapture excited by the perusal of a powerful tragedy, of the pleasures of solitude, that the idea of death to some minds at certain moments, is inspiring, and carries with it no melancholy, and they will call you enthusiasts and visionaries. Tell them that the pride of bearing misfortune with dignity is a solace for adversity, and they will call you insensible. The hope of future good never can console them for present ill, for such live only in the present. There are some minds that discover in adversity many beautiful qualities that had been hidden before; like flowers that shun the brilliancy of the sun, and open only in the shade. I could not love that being over whose brow there never came a cast of thought; whose eye never shone through tears of saddened feeling.

I was intimate once with two sisters, whose characters may seem no unapt illustration of the subject. The youngest was a beautiful girl, there was no denying it; she had the fair complexion and polished brow which poets always give to beauty; her nose was Grecian, and in her full blue eyes and delicately pencilled eye-brow, the beholder could see no fault. She had long, rich, fair hair, and nothing could exceed the grace with which each little well turned curl kept its place on her forehead. They were then a happy family: she had parents who anticipated her every wish. The hours flew peacefully over her head, and nothing disturbed the tranquillity of her life; all marked the serenity and evenness of her disposition, and Helen Sandford was generally esteemed perfectly happy. Her sister, Julia, was less admired than she. Strangers often overlooked her when Helen was present. She was very pale, and oftener serious than lively; but I have seen her when animated by youthful pleasures, by far the gayer of the two. I used to love to hear her laugh; it rung out from the very soul; not the cold measured laugh of fashionable gaiety. Her cheeks would flush, and her dark eyes sparkle through their modest lashes, with the rays of genuine mirthful feeling. And yet she was not always gay. I have seen her sit for hours in pensive reverie; the misfortunes of another perhaps the cause, or reflections on the misery of the human race. She had all the sensibilities which usually characterize such dispositions. I have seen her weep for the sorrows of Lear, while her sister was listening with a settled smile to the whispered compliments from beaux, of whose attentions she was inwardly careless. She had a sweet voice; and those simple and plaintive songs which touch the heart, were her chosen favourites. I have said she was less admired than Helen; but those who knew her felt for her a deep and tender love, which Helen never inspired. Even her parents, though they would often reprove her for little violations of fashion and form, which Helen never committed, yet there evidently mingled in their affection for her something of a holier interest, a deeper tenderness, which the beauty and accomplishments of their youngest failed to produce.

They were both married on the same day. The husband of Helen was a rich merchant. He was many years older than she, and there was little about him to attract the fancy of a romantic girl; but she was not romantic. Her intended was a gentleman; his family was unquestionably respectable; his offers of settlement unobjectionable, and Helen yielded to the wishes of her parents for her acceptance of them with her usual grace. He had made a handsome fortune, and he wished a wife whose beauty and accomplishments would grace his establishment. He was charmed with Helen at first, and her gentle manners and serene temper completed her conquest. Neither doubted their own capacity to secure the happiness of the other, though neither had studied the means of doing so. The lover of Julia was a young physician, just entering upon the duties of his profession. He was not rich, but his own talents and industry, and the influence of many friends, seemed to insure him future opulence. He had long and deeply studied the disposition of Julia, and perfectly understood her character; he appreciated the purity of her mind; he knew how to strengthen her principles without injuring her native retiring delicacy; he placed unlimited confidence in her love for him, and he felt no wish to abuse it. I envied him, as he received her from her parents, that look of fond reliance. Helen and her husband were certainly a happy couple; their sky was without a cloud; but as Julia leaned upon the arm of her loved one, she envied not her sister, even though her heart was untroubled by the thousand doubts and fears and trembling anxieties that were shadowing her own. Who could blame her for these fears? She was entering upon an untried state; and though she doubted not her protector, she sometimes doubted herself. She doubted her own capabilities of fulfilling her duties, and feared perhaps her power to retain the heart she had won.

But each day did her fears grow less and less; and, as she grew older, as her mind expanded with those views of piety and religion which sooner or later are so ardently embraced by minds like hers, she became a truly happy woman; they were not always fortunate, but she was the flower that bloomed brightest in the shade; and in times of adversity, when even the firm mind of her husband was depressed by the weight of misfortune, hers was the voice that bade him hope for brighter days, hers the spirit that influenced him to greater exertions. These times have passed away and, in the whole circle of my acquaintance, I know no couple more blest in each other, more generally prosperous in their affairs—none whose society is more prized by their own little circle of friends than Julia and her husband. The same gentle, timid, pensive disposition is hers, but who is happier than she when her husband declares that to her he owes his prosperity and the happiness of his life? Helen and her husband are a fashionable couple; she is as beautiful as ever, but I have heard that he is less fond. Yet she knows it not; she cannot understand the feeling of disappointment with which he sometimes turns away from the coldness of her welcome, or from the apathy which she shows at a recital of his cares. She does not discover from his countenance that he sometimes wishes her less beautiful and more feeling, for he is a man of the world, and conceals it for the sake of his own peace. He sees her fretful and impatient under sickness and pain; and he knows that reproach from him might change indifference to discontent; but he is still proud of his beautiful wife, and their life is one continued round of fashionable frivolities, very different from that of her sister and husband, who truly know

"A world enjoyed, that wants no witnesses
But its own sharers and approving heaven;
That like an autumn flower, deep hid in vale,
Smiles, though 'tis only looking on the sky."

THE TOOTHACHE.

"There was never yet philosopher
That could endure the toothache patiently;
However they have writ the style of gods,
And made a piish at chance and sufferance."

It had been raining all day. The eye could no longer read the poetry of the blue heavens. A most monotonous vapour obscured the beauty of nature, and the air was filled with watery particles, which did not seem to come from any place in particular, but went in all sorts of oblique directions into people's doors and under their umbrellas. Men strided along in the dim distance indistinctly, with huge shapeless overshoes and melancholy countenances; and chimneys and steeples loomed up through the fog with something of the dignity of "misty mountain-tops." There is nothing extraordinary in the fact that after having paraded for some time through the streets, I was rather wet. From a smart shower, when the big drops come dashing and spluttering down in straight lines, there is a refuge; and when the umbrella becomes saturated, and discharges its little rivers from the ends of the whale-bone, you are content to step for a few moments under a shed, or on a door-sill, till it is over; but from such drizzling weather there is no refuge; it defeats all calculation; the whole city is soaked; the bannisters are damp, and one may often write his name with his finger upon the entry wall.

Hour after hour dragged heavily on. The sun, it was presumed, had descended, and nox atra incubuit mare. I went home through the mud, splashing on by the obscure lamp light, so completely undone in regard to dress, that I had scarcely the ambition to turn aside for a mud-puddle, but trudged on alike through wet and dry with a kind of miniature despair. Well, I reached the house, flung aside my dripping cloak, shook the drops from my forlorn hat, and laid my unfortunate looking gloves upon the table, hoping to lose the uncomfortable feeling of the day in the cheerful warmth of a blazing fire; but mortals are seldom blest with a freedom from trouble; as one vanishes others come on like waves of the sea, and so we are not often at rest. A dull pain, which I had for sometime suffered in my face, excited some suspicions of a visit from a bitter enemy of mine; until increasing gradually it assumed a character more distinct than agreeable, and I was compelled reluctantly to acknowledge that I had the toothache.

I will not linger to inform the reader what an insufferable torment this is; how it goes on aching, aching, aching, hour after hour; how nobody sympathizes with you, but some poor wretch who has recently been himself excruciated in a similar way, with the long train of sable recollections which throng upon the mind with the gloom of a funeral, at the mention of that unhappy and inexorable disease; but hasten to the conclusion of this history. The imperturbable gravity which overshadowed my visage excited some attention. Yielding with apparent patience, because I knew it could not be avoided, I drew forth from my pocket one of your long red silk handkerchiefs, and bound it around my face.

"What's the matter?" said one.

"Oh, nothing, a little toothache. It will go off presently."

"What's the matter?" asked another.

"The toothache," said I.

"Ah, how do you do?" said a third. "What's the matter with your face?"

"The toothache—the toothache—the toothache," said I, pacing backwards and forwards across the room.

"Hold some brandy in your mouth," said one.

"Put your face in cold water," said another.

"Cover your head up warm," said a third.

"Have you tried opium? Have you taken laudanum?" said one.

"Smoke a cigar," said another.

I allowed myself to be persuaded into several remedies. They put my feet in boiling hot water, enveloped my head in flannel, and sent me to bed in some measure relieved. The tooth, however, continued to ache, ache, ache, as if some fiend were beating and beating upon the nerve with his invisible and tormenting hammer. Sometimes I would sink into a troubled sleep; I lost my hold upon my waking thoughts and the objects around, and floated off among scenes of strange silent confusion; familiar faces appeared laughing and talking, and, perchance, I would catch the glance of a bright eye, or the tone of a sweet voice, which I had known before and remembered; for these will occasionally recur to the memory waking or asleep, when, a sudden start would put them all to instantaneous flight, and there I was, the still moonlight streaming in upon the floor, and the fiend still beating and beating with unrelenting perseverance. I heard the distant clock, through the silence of the night, striking two, three, and four, and despairing at length of winning "death's beautiful brother" to my eyelids, I lay watching with feverish anxiety, the first streaks of gray light that broke in the east.

I had almost resolved to have it out; but these "gothic appeals to cold iron" are anything but agreeable. I have an instinctive horror of a dentist. There is to me something monstrous in his deliberate self-possession. He walks so coolly to his case, chooses you out with so much tranquillity his proper instrument, wraps his buckakin around it with such seeming pleasure, walks up to you so slowly, says he wont hurt you, and as his vile steel rattles against your teeth, he talks of the weather—and—oh!—I hate the very name of a dentist.

When I arose in the morning the very thoughts of him frightened away the pain; and, still buried in handkerchiefs, I sallied forth with a resolution to hold out the fortress at all events for another day. It was a fine sunshiny morning; all the world were merrily in motion; but my unlucky bandages continued to be the object of notice, and the topic of conversation wherever I went.

"How do you do?" asked my friend Tom. "What the deuce is the matter? Have you the mumps?"

"Good morning," replied I, speaking thick through the handkerchiefs so as scarcely to be intelligible. "I have the toothache—had it all night—hav'n't slept a wink," (a white fib which every body tells when he has been disturbed during a part of the night; it does the hearer no harm, and there is no fear of a discovery) "hav'n't slept a wink—cheek all swollen—headache—feel like the deuce."

"Have you tried a hot brick and vinegar?"

"No," returned I, still struggling for utterance against the obstructions which bound my mouth and nose. "I bathed my feet, held brandy in my mouth, and covered my head with hot flannel."

"Pooh! nonsense! brandy indeed! nothing worse for the teeth than brandy. The others decay too as quick again. I'll tell you how to cure your toothache. My wife had the toothache, just as you have, and I made her wash behind her ears with cold water every morning for a week. Try it. It's a certain cure."

"I will; good morning."

Went into my friend M.'s office. There were Mr. H. the poet, Mr. F. the lawyer, Colonel S., and young doctor P.

all fine fellows, and excellent friends of mine; would all cure me if they could.

"Ah, how d'ye do? how are you?"

"Good morning, gentlemen."

"Why, what's the matter?"

"Got the toothache—face swelled up as large as a goose's egg. Look here—hav'n't slept these two nights."

"Have you tried a hot onion applied outwardly? You must squeeze it in a flannel bag, and keep it close to the cheek. It's the only cure, and a certain one. My cousin was relieved of a horrid toothache by it."

"I'll try it," said I.

"Take oil of cloves," said lawyer F.; "that's the best thing in the world."

"I can tell you an infallible remedy for the toothache," observed my friend the colonel. "Take a tablespoonfull of brandy, and four tablespoonfulls of ginger, mix it up well with two teaspoonfulls of mustard; wrap your head up in flannel; go to bed; put a couple of hot bricks to your feet, and keep on the poultice till it takes the skin off. You'll never have the toothache again as long as you live."

A little while afterwards—tooth still aching—I sat over my desk in a brown study. My two friends, B. and W. walked in.

"How do you do this morning? What's the matter with your face?"

"The toothache—had it all night—no sleep—look like a fright."

"Hand me that pen," said W., "I'll give you a cure. Take of nitri. dulcis, so much, and alum. pulv. so much."

"Horrible," said B. "I tried that once, and it screwed my face all out of joint. Have you tried the vapour bath?"

"No."

"Best thing in the world for toothache. Try it."

"I will," said I.

We were interrupted by Mr. L. He is one of your plain common sense sort of people; practical, fixed in his own opinions, a little inclined to stoicism, with a dash of savage philosophy, partly affected to hide tender feelings, and about six feet and an inch high without his shoes.

"What's the matter with your face?" inquired he.

"Toothache," said I, "all swelled; keeps me awake—and—"

"Try my nitri. dulcis and alum. pulv.," said W.

"Curse your nitri. dulcis and alum. pulv.," said L., "there is but one cure for the tooth-ache, and that's a sure one."

I looked tremblingly up; he had his great square fist doubled, as if he held something in his hand; he raised it to his mouth, and screwed it around with the motion of a dentist uprooting some huge double grinder with three diverging prongs. My friends were silent. I turned a little pale. He saw what an impression he had made, and with a grin that went to my very soul.

"Out with it, you fool; and there's an end. It's worth all the nitri. dulcis and alum. pulv. in the universe."

There was a melancholy truth in what he remarked. It sunk into my heart: I made up my mind; and when my worthy advisers left me, I walked around to Mr. P.'s; staid about five minutes; and, to confess the truth, I have had pleasanter moments; but the impetuous coursers of time dashed on, and I came out the happiest of men.

Q.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Editorial prerogative.—In discharging what we conceive to be the duties of an editor of a literary journal, we have not unfrequently been censured for altering the phraseology of our correspondents; and we now take occasion, once for all, to explain our views on this subject. An editor has been compared, by a writer in Blackwood's Magazine, to the keeper of a public ordinary. "As caterer for a series of intellectual banquets, his patrons hold him alone responsible for the quality as well as quantity of the viands presented for their entertainment. If he chooses to accept voluntary contributions, from friends or strangers, it is his bounden duty to see that such free-will offerings are properly prepared, according to the established rules of art, before they are served up to the guests." He must either do this, or impose on his customers; or offend his contributors, by rejecting their favours. If he adopt the latter alternative, literary epicures would be deprived of many an excellent article, that wanted nothing to render it palatable and nourishing, but to be dressed secundum artem.

To drop the metaphor, we have often, during the course of our editorial career, been compelled to reject poetical communications, which were replete with refined and elevated thought, beautiful imagery, and delicate sentiment, for no other reason than because they were woefully deficient in language, rythm, harmony, or rhyme. But whenever it has been deemed practicable, we have attempted to supply these deficiencies, in order that their intrinsic original beauties might not be lost to the public. If we have sometimes failed in these attempts, as perhaps we have, we alone are the sufferers in reputation. Our anonymous correspondents are not responsible for our imperfections.

We are well aware that most writers are exceedingly sensitive on this point, being very tenacious of their own modes of expression. We respect the feeling, and would be the last to do it violence, except in cases where the well-known canons of criticism are outraged, and the fundamental rules of the "sweet art" have evidently been misunderstood or disregarded. More than one of our tuneful correspondents, whose numbers flow smoothly and sweetly in rhyme, appear to be totally ignorant of, or indifferent to, the rules for constructing English blank verse. They seem to think that if each line commence with a capital, and contain ten syllables, it is verse, whether these ten syllables constitute three, four, or five feet: whether the caesura occupy its right position or not; and whether half the lines terminate with a short unaccented syllable, such as a conjunction or preposition, or some more grave and predominant part of speech.

Genius without method, is like passion without reason, or feeling without judgment—for ever running into wild and extravagant vagaries—exciting admiration, without imparting pleasure. To correct such imperfections and eccentricities in the productions of anonymous correspondents, or reject their pieces altogether, is what we conceive to be the prerogative of an editor.

We have been led to these reflections by some caustic remarks in a communication now before us. Among other queries, the writer asks, "whether a poet has not the same privilege as a painter, of choosing the drapery for his airy nothings, which he thinks most becoming; and whether a picture would present a more ridiculous figure, were the frame-maker to assume the right of heightening the colours, or deepening the shades, according to his ideas of beauty, than the written picture after having undergone the same process?"

Now, in our opinion, there exists no analogy between the two cases, as a frame-maker is employed and probably paid, for fitting a frame to the canvass, and is no more responsible for the merits of the picture, than a tailor is for the moral qualities of a customer for whom he makes a coat. Not so with the editor of a literary paper. He is not paid by the artists for exhibiting the pictures that are sent to his gallery, while his reputation as a connoisseur would fatally suffer were he to hang up every abortion that was offered for that purpose. But should he feel convinced that a few touches of his own pencil would render some of them worthy of public inspection, we repeat that it is his prerogative, if not his duty, to make the corrections.

These hasty observations will be understood by the correspondent to whom we have alluded, without our being more explicit. The piece with which we took the liberties which have thus rendered us obnoxious to unmerited censure, as originally written, was poetical, but not poetry; being destitute of the constituent principles of English verse. It might be termed poetical prose, and would have read very well had we published it without regard to its arbitrary admeasurement. In attempting to render it into verse, we may have burdened it with some unnecessary epithets; but this error we conceive more than compensated by an increase of harmony. It is scarcely necessary to add, that had the effusion in question emanated from a less gifted pen, we should not have taken the trouble to correct its imperfections, but should have thrown it among the rubbish we are in the daily habit of receiving.

Texas.—We have given a hasty perusal to an interesting pamphlet, from the pen of a revolutionary officer, entitled "Considerations on the propriety and necessity of annexing the province of Texas to the United States." This project has already been discussed pro and con by several of our political journals; but the most forcible arguments in favour of the measure, are to be found in the pamphlet before us. We cordially agree with the author, and sincerely hope that no well-wisher to the prosperity of this country will espouse the negative side of the proposition, until he has attentively read, and well digested the publication in question. To us it appears unanswerable.

The Constellation.—The first number of a weekly newspaper, called the "Constellation," was issued in this city, on Saturday last. It contains a great variety of matter, original and selected. The terms are three dollars per annum, and the office of publication is in Maiden-lane.

THE LAST BUGLE.

AT THE REQUEST OF MANY SUBSCRIBERS WE GIVE PLACE TO THE FOLLOWING MASTERLY PRODUCTION, WHICH IS NEARLY OUT OF PRINT.

MAESTOSO CON ESPRESSIONE.

Hark! the muffled drum sounds the last march of the brave, The soldier retreats to his quar-ters, the grave, Under death whom he owns his com-mander in chief, No more he'll turn out wit rea-dy re-lief, No more he'll turn out with the rea-dy re-lief, But in spite of death's ter-rors or hos-tile a-larms, When he hears the last bu-gle, When he hears the last bu-gle, He'll stand to his arms

When he hears the last bu-gle he'll stand to his arms.

SECOND VERSE.

Farewell, brother soldiers, in peace may you rest,
And light lie the turf on each veteran breast,
Until that review when the souls of the brave
Shall behold the chief ensign, fair Mercy's flag wave;
Then freed from death's terrors, and hostile alarms,
When we hear the last bugle, we'll stand to our arms.

JOY AND GRIEF.

ONE summer morn, when dewy flowers
Displayed their fairest smile,
Young Joy forsook his happy bowers
To frolic forth awhile:
He hid him to a silvery stream,
That rippled down the glade,
And there along its verdant brim
His thoughtless gambols played.

High o'er his head the willow flung
Its gold stems to the air,
While many a jocund warbler sung
His sweet-toned matin there.
He smiled to list the bees' soft hum,
Far from the din of men,
And the wild pheasant's distant drum
Swell echoing through the glen.

And oft his restless form he threw
Sheer in the dancing tide,
To pluck wild water-flowers that grew
Along the streamlet's side:
Soon on his fair unclouded brow
A lovely wreath appears,
Pure as the pearls of winter's snow,
And gemmed with night's rich tears.

Thus played he many a sunny hour,
With bosom glad and free,
Till, tired, he sought a neighbouring bower,
And slumbered dreamily.
Deep from her cypress-circled cell,
Grief spied the form of Joy,
And softly stealing down the dell,
Knelt by the sleeping boy.

Aside she flung his locks of gold,
And gazed with deepening sigh,
Till from her cheek a tear-drop rolled,
And dewed his half-closed eye:
He woke and sought with ready hand
To wipe the tear away;
But, ah! no power at his command,
Could dry that cankering spray.

Pensive he left the lone recess,
And his bright home regained,
Where still mid all his sportiveness
That hapless guest remained:
And thus where'er his form we seek,
In scenes beneath the sky,
We find a smile upon his cheek,
A tear-drop in his eye!

PREPARATIONS FOR PLEASURE.

A PIC-NIC.

BY HORACE SMITH.

To give a pic-nic party a fair chance of success, it must be almost impromptu: projected at twelve o'clock at night at the earliest, executed at twelve o'clock on the following day at the latest; and even then the odds are fearfully against it. The climate of England is not remarkable for knowing its own mind; nor is the weather "so fixed in its resolve" but that a bright August moon, suspended in a clear sky, may be lady-usher to a morn of fog, sleet, and drizzle. Then, again—but this being tender ground, we will only hint at the possibility of such a change—a lady of the intended party might quit the drawing-room at night in the sweetest humour imaginable, and make her appearance at breakfast in a less amiable mood, or, perhaps, "prefer taking breakfast in her own room,"—from which notice husbands sometimes infer that such a change has taken place.

Mr. Claudius Bagshaw, a retired silk mercer, in the vicinity of London, determined, notwithstanding all these arguments, to have a pic-nic party on the twenty-fourth of August, his wedding day. On the third of July, Mr. Claudius Bagshaw, after eating his breakfast and reading the Morning Post, looked out of his parlour window to watch the horticultural pursuits of his better part. Mr. Bagshaw had become a member of one of the "march-of-intellect-societies," and was confident that the pic-nic would turn out a very pleasant thing.

"How fortunate we shall be, dear," said Mr. Bagshaw, "how happy we shall be, if the weather should be as fine on our wedding-day as it is now."

"True, love," replied Mrs. Bagshaw, "but this is only the third of July, and, as the anniversary of our happy day is the twenty-fourth of August, the weather may change."

This proposition Mr. Bagshaw did not attempt to deny.

The Bagshaws were the happiest couple in the world. Being blest with the negative blessing of no offspring, the stream of their affections was not diverted into little channels, but ebbed and flowed in one uninterrupted tide reciprocally from bosom to bosom. They never disputed, they never quarreled.

Yes, they did sometimes, but then it was from a mutual over-anxiety to please. Each was afraid to pronounce a choice, or a preference, lest it might be disagreeable to the other; and hence there occasionally did arise little bickerings, and tiffings, and miffings, which were quite as unpleasant in their effects, and sometimes as difficult to settle, as quarrels originating in less amiable causes.

"But," said Mr. Bagshaw, referring to the barometer, "the instrument for indicating the present state and probable changes of the weather, still maintains its elevation; and I tell you what, dear, if the weather should be preposterous on the twenty-fourth of August, suppose, instead of going into the north, as we did last year, we migrate into Kent or Surrey? Instead of dining at Hampstead, as we did last year, shall we go to Greenwich, or to Putney, and eat little fishes?"

"Which ever you like, love," was the lady's answer to the so-intended question.

"But I put it to your choice, dear."

"Either—or neither—please yourself, love, and you are sure you will please me."

"Pshaw! but it is for the gratification of your—or, more properly seeking, for your gratification. I submit to you an alternative for the purpose of election; and you know, Jane, I repudiate indifference, even as concerning or applying to trifles."

"You know, Claudius, we have but one wish, and that is to please each other; so do you decide."

"But, Mrs. Bagshaw, I must promulgate a request that—having, as I have, no desire, but to please you—you will—"

"How, sir! would you force me to choose, when I am so obedient as to choose that you should have the choice entirely your own way? This treatment of me is monstrous!"

And here Mrs. Bagshaw did what is usual and proper for ladies to do on such occasions—she burst into tears.

"Why then, madam, to use a strong expression, I must say that—"

But a loud rap at the street-door prevented the utterance of an "expression," the force of which would doubtless have humbled Mrs. Claudius Bagshaw down to the very dust.

"Claudius," said the lady, hastily drying her eyes, "that is uncle John's knock. We'll go to Gre—Put—Greenwich, love."

"That's well, dear; and be assured, love, that nothing is so adverse to the constitution of what Locke emphatically calls the human mind, philosophically considered, as to persevere in that state of indcision which—that—whereof—but we will not go to either; uncle John shall select the locality."

Uncle John was a bachelor of fifty-five, possessing twelve thousand pounds, a strong disinclination to part with any of them, a good heart, and a bad temper.

"Good morning t'ye, good folks: as usual, I perceive, billing and cooing."

The Bagshaws had by this time got together in a corner of the garden, and were lovingly occupied in trimming the same pot of sweet peas.

"Quite the contrary, uncle John," said Mrs. Bagshaw. "Claudius and I have just had one of our most desperate quarrels."

And here the happy pair giggled, and exchanged looks which were meant to imply that their most desperate quarrels were mere kitten's play; and that uncle John did so interpret them, he made manifest by a knowing shake of his fore-finger.

"The fact is, sir, Jane and I talk of commemorating the annual recurrence of the anniversary of our wedding-day, at some place a little farther in the country; but our minds are in a perfect vacuum concerning the identity of the spot. Now, sir, will you reduce the place to a mathematical certainty, and be one of the party?"

"Why—um—no: these things are expensive; we come home at night with a guinea a-piece less in our pockets, and I don't see the good of that."

"I have it!" cried Bagshaw: "we'll make it a pic-nic; that won't be expensive."

"Then I'm with you, Bagshaw, with all my heart—and it shall be al fresco."

"There or any where else you please, sir," gravely replied the learned member of the universal-knowledge-warehouse.

"Uncle John means in the open air, Claudius; that will be delightful."

"Charming!" rejoined Bagshaw.

It may be inquired why uncle John, who objected to the disbursement of a guinea for a day's pleasure, should so readily have yielded at the suggestion of a pic-nic. Uncle John possessed a neat little morocco pocket-case, containing a dozen silver spoons, and silver-handled knives and forks, and although we are told that these implements are of later invention than fingers, there is, nevertheless, a very general bias in their favour, for the purpose to which they are applied. Now, uncle John being aware of the prevalence of their employment, it was for this reason he never objected to make one of a pic-nic party; for whilst others contributed chickens, pigeon-pies, or wines, it being the principle of such parties that each member should furnish something to the feast, uncle John invariably contributed the use of his knives, forks, and spoons.

The whole morning was spent in debating on who should be invited to partake of this "pleasantest thing that ever was," and examining into their several pretensions, and their powers of contributing to the amusements of the day; when, at length, the honour of nomination was conferred upon the persons following, and for the reasons assigned:

Sir Thomas and Lady Grouts—because of their title, which would give an air to the thing—(Sir Thomas, formerly a corn-chandler, having been knighted for carrying up an address in the late reign.) Miss Euphemia Grouts, daughter, No. 1—who would bring her guitar. Miss Corinna Grouts, ditto No. 2—because she would sing.

Mr. and Mrs. Snodgrass—Mr. Snodgrass being vice-president of the grand junction march-of-intellect-society. Mr. Frederick Snodgrass, their son, (lately called to the chancery bar) who would bring his flute.

Messrs. Wrench and son, (eminent dentists.) The father to be invited because he was charming company, and the son, a dead bore, because the father would be offended if he were not. And lastly,

Miss Snubbleston, a rich maiden lady of forty-four, for no other earthly qualification whatever than her carriage, which (to use Bagshaw's words) would carry herself and us three, and also transplant a large portion of the provender to the place of rendezvous.

Bagshaw having made out a fair copy of this list, somewhat in the shape of a bill of parcels, this, the first step towards the "pleasantest thing that ever was," was taken with entire satisfaction.

"Why, Bagshaw," exclaimed uncle John, who had cast up the numbers, "including our three selves, we shall be thirteen!"

The member of the institution perceived the cause of his alarm! but having been lectured out of prejudices respecting matters of greater moment than this, he prepared a look of ineffable contempt as his only reply; however, happening to think of uncle John's twelve thousand pounds, he suppressed it, and just contented himself with,

"And what then, sir?"

"Why then, sir, that is a risk I won't run; and unless we can manage to—I have it! the very man. How came we to forget him? The—very—man. You know Jack Richards?"

The last four words were delivered in a tone implying the utter impossibility of any human creature being unacquainted with Jack Richards.

"Not in the least, sir. I never heard of him."

"What! never heard of Ja—. The thing is impossible; every body knows Jack Richards. The very thing for us; such a wit! such a wag! he is the life and soul of every thing. Should he be unengaged for the twenty-fourth of August. But he is so caught up! I was invited to meet him at dinner last Sunday at Jones's, but he didn't come. Such a disappointment to us! However, I shall meet him on Thursday at the Time's, if he should but keep his promise, and then—"

"But, uncle," said Mrs. Bagshaw, "hadn't you better send him an invitation at once?"

"I'll do better still, my dear; I'll call at his lodgings, and if I find him hanging loose, I'll bring him to dine with you to-day." Then turning to Bagshaw, he added, "That a man like you shouldn't know Jack Richards, is surprising!"

As this was evidently pointed at Mr. Claudius Bagshaw in his capacity of member of a learned body, Bagshaw pursed up his mouth into a mock modesty smile, and slightly bowed. Off went uncle John in quest of Jack Richards; and, that the pleasantest thing in the world might not suffer by delay, off went Mr. Bagshaw to apprise the Snodgrasses, the Groutses, and the rest of the nominees; and, more important still, off went the lady to the poulterer's, to inquire whether he was likely to have any nice pigeons for a pie, about the twenty-third of next month. The dinner-hour arrived and so did uncle John, but with a face of unspeakable woe.

"I feared how it would be."

"What! can't he be with us on the twenty-fourth?" inquired both the Bagshaws at the same instant."

"He will if he can, but he won't promise. But to-day—! However, it serves us right; we were unwise to indulge a hope of his coming at so short a notice. He has almost engaged himself to you for Sunday fortnight, though. What a creature it is! he has given me such a pain in my side!"

"Something he said that almost killed you with laughing: repeat it, uncle, repeat it."

"Why, no, he didn't say any thing particular: but he has a knack of poking one in the ribs, in his comical way, and sometimes he hurts you."

We intended to describe Jack Richards at length; uncle John's accidental notice of this trait has, most probably, rendered that trouble unnecessary. Indeed, we feel that we need scarcely add to it, that he can sing a devilish good song, (and every body knows what is meant by that) and imitated the inimitable Mathew's imitations of the actors, not even excepting his imitation of Tate Wilkinson's imitation of Garrick.

Except the uncertainty of Jack Richards, the result of the morning's occupation was satisfactory. Bagshaw, still retaining his old business-like habits of activity and industry, had contrived to wait on every person named in the list, all of whom had promised their attendance! and Mrs. Bagshaw had received from the poulterer a positive assurance that he would raise heaven and earth to supply her with pigeons on the twenty-third of the ensuing August!

Committees were forthwith summoned. First, a committee to consider of the whereabouts. At this, after an evening of polite squabbling, which had nearly put an end to the project altogether, Twickenham meadows received the honour of selection—nem. con. as Bagshaw said. Next, lest it should happen as it did once happen, for want of such preconcert, that a picnic party of ten found themselves at their place of meeting with ten fillets of veal and ten hams, Mr. Bagshaw called a committee of "provender." Here it was settled that the Snodgrasses should contribute four chickens and a tongue; the Bagshaws, their pigeon-pie; Wrench and son, a ham; Sir Thomas Grouts, a hamper of his own choice wine; Miss Snubbleston, a basket of fruit and pastry; uncle John, his silver spoons, knives, and forks; and Jack Richards—his charming company. And lastly, came the committee for general purposes! At this important meeting it was agreed that the party proceed to Twickenham by water; that, to save the trouble of loading and unloading, Miss Snubbleston's carriage convey the hampers, &c. direct to the place appointed—the said carriage, moreover, serving to bring the ladies to town, should the evening prove cold; that, for the water-music, the following programme be adopted: 1. On reaching Vauxhall bridge the concert to commence with Madame Pasta's grand scena in "Medea," previous to the murder of the children, by Miss Corinna Grouts. 2. Nicholson's grand flute concerto in five sharps, by Mr. Frederick Snodgrass. 3. Grand aria, with variations, guitar, by Miss Euphemia Grouts. 4. Sweet Bird; accompaniment, flute obligato, Miss C. G. and Mr. F. S.—and 5. The Dettingen te deum, (arranged for three voices, by Mr. F. S.) by Miss Euphemia, Miss Corinna, and Mr. Frederick Snodgrass. The "interstices," as Mr. Bagshaw called them, to be filled up by the amusing talents of the elder Wrench, and uncle John's friend. And, lastly, that the company do assemble at Mr. Bagshaw's on the morning of the twenty-fourth of August, at ten o'clock precisely, in order to have the advantage of the tide both ways.

Three days prior to the important twenty-fourth, Mr. Bagshaw went to engage the boat, but in a squabble with the boatman Mr. B. got a black eye. This was the first mishap.

Restless and impatient though you be, depend upon it there is not a day of the whole three hundred and sixty-five will put itself in the slightest degree out of the way, or appear one second before its appointed time for your gratification. O that people would consider this, and wait avants with patience! Certainly Mr. Bagshaw did not. The night of the twenty-third to him appeared an age. His repeater was in his hand every ten minutes. He thought the morning would never dawn, but he was mistaken; it did; and as fine a morning as if it had been made on purpose to favour his excursion. By six o'clock he was dressed! by eight the contributions from all the members had arrived, and were ranged in the passage. There was their own pigeon-pie carefully packed in brown paper and straw; Sir Thomas's hamper of his own choice wine; and the rest. Every thing promised fairly. The young ladies and Mr. Frederick had had thirty rehearsals of their grand arias and concertos, and were perfect to a demisemiquaver; Jack Richards would certainly come; and the only drawback upon Mr. Bagshaw's personal enjoyment, but nothing in this world is perfect, was the necessity he was under of wearing his green shade, which would totally deprive him of the pleasure of contemplating the beauties of the Thames' scenery; a thing he had set his heart upon. Nine! ten!

"No one here yet! Jane, my love, we shall infallibly lose the tide;" and for the next quarter of an hour the place of the poor repeater was no sinecure.

A knock! Mr. and Mrs. Snodgrass and Mr. Frederick. Another! the whole family of the Groutses. Next came Mr. Charles Wrench.

"Bless us! Mr. Charles," said Bagshaw, "where is your father?"

Now Mr. Wrench, senior, was an agreeable old dentist, always gay, generally humorous, sometimes witty; he could sketch characters as well as draw teeth; and, on occasions of this kind, was invaluable. The son was a mere donkey; a silly, simpering, well-dressed young gentleman, the owner of no more than the eighth of an idea, and of a very fine set of teeth, which he constantly exhibited like a sign or advertisement of his shop. Appended to every thing he uttered were a preface and postscript, in the form of a sort of billy-goat grin.

"He! he! he! he! fayther regrets emezingly he caint come, being called to attend the duchess of Dilborough. He! he! he! he!"

As we have already said that it was in pure compliment to the father that the son was invited, and not at all for the sake of his own company, his presence was a grievous aggravation of the disappointment.

The next knock announced Miss Snubbleston. But where was her carriage? Why, it had been newly varnished, and they might scratch her pannels with the hampers; and then she was afraid of her springs. So here was Miss Snubbleston without her carriage, for the convenience of which alone she had been invited, considered by the rest in exactly the same light as young Mr. Wrench without old Mr. Wrench—id est, a damper. A new arrangement was the necessary consequence; and the basket, under the superintendence of a servant, were jolted down in a hackney coach, to be embarked at Westminster. But Miss Snubbleston brought with her a substitute, which was by no means a compensation. Cupid, her wretched, little, barking, yelping, Dutch pug, had eaten something that had disagreed with him, and his fair mistress would not "for worlds," have left him at home while he was so indisposed. Well, no one chose to be the first to object to the intruder, so Cupid was received.

ARRIVAL OF JACK RICHARDS.

"But where can uncle John and his friend be? We shall lose the tide, that's certain," was scarcely uttered by Mr. Bagshaw, when in came our uncle, together with the long expected Jack Richards.

"The usual introductions over, Mr. Richards saluted every body with the self-sufficient swagger of a vulgar lion."

"The day smiles auspicious, sir," said Bagshaw, who thought it requisite he should throw off something fine to so celebrated a person.

"Smile? a broad grin, I call it, sir." And here was a general laugh.

"Oh, excellent!"

"Capital!"

Uncle John, proud of his friend, whispered in Bagshaw's ear, "you see, Jack's beginning." And now hats and gloves were in motion.

"You have got your flute, Frederick?"

"Yes, mother," was the reply.

"Lau Ma!" cried Miss Corinna, "if I haven't come without 'Sweet Bird,' and my scena from 'Medea,' I declare."

As these were indispensable to the amusements of the day, a servant was despatched for them. He couldn't be gone longer than half an hour. Half an hour! thought Bagshaw; 'tis eleven now; and the tide— But the servant was absent a few minutes beyond the half hour, and poor Bagshaw suffered severely from that gnawing impatience, amounting almost to pain, which every mother's son of us has experienced upon occasions of greater—or less importance than this. They were again at the very point of starting, when a message was brought to Mrs. Snodgrass that little master Charles had cut his thumb dreadfully! What was to be done? Mrs. Snodgrass vowed, she shouldn't be easy in her mind the whole day, unless she knew the extent of the mischief: and as they only lived in Euston-square, and she could be there and back again in twenty minutes, she would herself go see what really was the matter: and away she went. Twenty minutes! During all this time, Bagshaw—but who would attempt to describe anguish indescribable! At length he was relieved by the return of Mrs. Snodgrass; but, to the horror and consternation of himself, and of all present, she introduced the aforesaid master Charles, an ugly, ill-tempered, blubbery little brat of seven years old, with a bloated red face, scrubby white hair, and red eyes; and with the interesting appendage of a thick slice of bread and butter in his hand.

"I'm sure you'll pardon this liberty," said the affectionate Mama: "but poor Charley has cut himself very much, and he would not be pacified till I consented to take him with us. He has promised to be very good. There, don't cry any more, darling!" and, accordingly, the urchin roared with tenfold vigour. There were no particular manifestations of joy at this arrival; and it is just possible, although nothing was uttered to that effect, that there did exist a general and cordial wish that young master Snodgrass were sprawling at the bottom of the deepest well in England. Uncle John, indeed, did utter something about the pug and the child—two such nuisances—people bringing their brats into grown up company.

At length the procession set out; the Bagshaws, uncle John and Jack Richards bringing up the rear in a hackney-coach. On reaching the corner of the street, Mrs. Bagshaw called out to the driver to stop.

"What is the matter, dear?" said Bagshaw.

"Your eye-lotion, love."

"Well, never mind that, sweet."

"Claudius, I shall be miserable if you go without it. Dr. Nooth desired you would use it every two hours. I must insist—now, for my sake, love—such an eye as he has got, Mr. Richards!"

So away went Bagshaw to the lake of Lausanne Lodge for the lotion, which, as it always happens when folks are in a hurry, it took him a quarter of an hour to find.

They were now fairly on the road.

"What a smell of garlick!" exclaimed uncle John; "it is intolerable!"

"Dear me!" said Mr. Richards, "do you perceive it? 'Tis a fine Italian sausage I bought at Morel's, as my contribution. We shall find it an excellent relish in the country," and he exhibited his purchase, enveloped in a brown paper.

"Pha! shocking! 'tis a perfect nuisance! Put it into your pocket again, or throw it out at window." But Mr. Richards preferred obeying the first command.

Apocryph of contributions, "uncle, have you brought your spoons?"

"Here they are," replied uncle; at the same time drawing from his pocket a parcel in size and form very closely resembling Mr. Richards's offensive contribution.

On arriving at Westminster Bridge, they found the rest of the party already seated in the barge, and the first sound that saluted their ears was an intimation that, owing to their being two hours behind time (it was now past twelve), they should hardly save the tide.

"I knew it would be so," said Bagshaw, with more of discontent than he had thought to experience, considering the pains he had taken that every thing should be well-ordered.

As uncle John was stepping into the boat, Richards, with great dexterity, exchanged parcels with him, putting the Italian sausage into uncle John's pocket and the spoons into his own; enhancing the wit of the manœuvre by whispering to the Bagshaws, who, with infinite delight, had observed it.

"Hang me," said Richards, "but he shall have enough of the garlick!"

The old gentleman was quite unconscious of the operation, as Richards adroitly diverted his attention from it by giving him one of his facetious pokes in the ribs, which nearly bent him double, and drew a roar of laughter from every one else.

Just as they were pushing off, their attention was attracted by a loud howling. It proceeded from a large Newfoundland dog, which was standing at the water's edge.

"Confound it!" cried Richards, "that's my Carlo! He has allowed me, unperceived, all the way from home—I would not lose him for fifty pounds. I must take him back—pray put me ashore. This is very provoking—though he is a very quiet dog!"

There was no mistaking this hint. Already were there two nuisances on board—master Charles and the Dutch pug; but as they were to choose between Jack Richards with his dog, or no Jack Richards, (or, in other words, no life and soul of the party,) it was presently decided that Carlo should be invited to a seat on the hampers, which were stowed at the head of the boat—uncle John having first extracted from Mr. Richards an assurance that their new guest would lie there as still as a mouse. This complaisance was amply rewarded by a speedy display of Mr. Richards's powers of entertainment. As soon as they reached the middle of the river Jack Richards suddenly jumped up, for the purpose of frightening Miss Snubbleston; a jest at which every body else would have laughed, had not their own lives been endangered by it. Even his great admirer suggested to him that once of that was enough. His next joke was one of a more intellectual character. Though he had never till this day seen Sir Thomas, he had accidentally heard something about his former trade.

"What is the difference between Lord Eldon and Sir Thomas Grouts?" Nobody could tell.

"One is an ex-chancellor—the other is an ex-chandler." Every body laughed, except the Grouts family.

This was succeeded by another thrust in uncle John's side; after which came a pun, which we shall not record, as the effect of it was to force the ladies to cough and look into the water, the gentlemen to look at each other, and Mrs. Snodgrass to whisper Mrs. Bagshaw.

"Who is this Mr. Richards?"

Indeed, there would have been no end to his pleasantries had they not been interrupted by a request that Miss Corinna would open the concert, as they were fast approaching Vauxhall bridge. Mr. Bagshaw (looking at the programme, which he had drawn out on paper ruled with red and blue lines,) objected to this, as it would disturb the previous arrangement, according to which the concert was not to commence till they were through the bridge. This objection was overruled, and the fair Corinna unrolled the music, for which the servant had been despatched with so much haste. Miss Corinna screamed! What was the matter?

"They had not sent the grand scena from Medea, after all, but a wrong piece!" And the pains she had taken to be perfect in it!

"Could not Miss Corinna sing it from memory?"

"Impossible!"

"How careless of you, Corinna! then sing what they have sent."

"Why, ma," said Corinna, with tears in her eyes, and holding up the unfortunate sheets, "why bless me, ma, I can't sing the overture to Der Freyschutz!"

The difficulty of such a performance being readily admitted, Mr. Frederick Snodgrass declared himself but too happy to comply with the calls for his concerto in five sharps, which stood next on the list; and with the air of one well satisfied that an abundance of admiration and applause would reward his efforts, he drew forth his flute, when, lo! one of the joints was missing! This accident was nearly fatal to the musical entertainments of the day; for not only was the concerto thereby rendered impracticable, but "Sweet Bird," with the flute-accompaniment obligato, was put hors de combat. Disappointment having, by this, been carried to its uttermost bounds, the announcement that two strings of the guitar had gone, was received with an indifference almost stoical; and every one was grateful to Miss Euphemia for so willingly undertaking (the whispered menaces of Lady Grouts being heard by nobody but the young lady herself,) to do all that could be done under such untoward circumstances. She would endeavour to accompany herself through a little ballad; but she failed.

Mr. Claudius Bagshaw, with all his literature, science, and philosophy, now, for the first time, wondered how any thing could fail, so much trouble having been taken to insure success. Drawing forth his repeater, he a hem'd! and just muttered.

"Unaccountable! Hem! upon my word! One o'clock, and no pleasure yet!"

"One o'clock," echoed his spouse; then 'tis time for your eye, dear!" and Bagshaw was compelled not only to suffer his damaged optics to be dabbled by his tormentingly-affectionate wife, but to submit again to be hoodwinked, in spite of his entreaties to the contrary, and his pathetic assurances that he had not yet seen a bit of the prospect; a thing he had set his heart upon.

Now occurred a dead silence of some minutes. A steam-boat rushed by. Bagshaw seized this opportunity to make a display of his scientific acquirements; and this he did with the greater avidity, as he had long wished to astonish vice-president Snodgrass. Besides, in the event of his offering to deliver a course of lectures at the institution, the vice-president might bear evidence to his capabilities for the purpose—his acquaintance not only with the facts, but with the terms of science. Whether those terms were always correctly applied, we confess ourselves not sufficiently learned to pronounce.

"How wondrous is the science of mechanism! how varied its progeny, how simple, yet how compound! I am propelled to the consideration of this subject by having optically perceived that ingenious nautical instrument, which has just now flown along like a mammoth, that monster of the deep! You ask me how are steam-boats propagated? In other words, how is such an infinite and immovable body inveigled along its course? I will explain it to you. It is by the power of friction: that is to say, the two wheels, or paddles, turning diametrically, or at the same moment, on their axioms, and repressing by the rotundity of their motion the action of the menstrum in which the machine floats,—water being, in a philosophical sense, a powerful non-conductor,—it is clear, that in proportion as is the revulsion so is the progression; and as is the centrifugal force, so is the—"

"Pooh!" cried uncle John impatiently, "let us have some music."

"I have an apprehension, Bagshaw," said the vice-president,—"that I should not presume to dispute with you—that you are wrong in your theory of the centrifugal force of the axioms. However, we will discuss that point at the Grand-Junction. But come, Frederick, the 'Dettingen te deum.'"

Frederick and the young ladies having, by many rehearsals, perfected themselves in the performance of this piece, instantly complied. Scarcely had they reached the fourth bar, when Jack Richards, who had not for a long time perpetrated a joke, produced a harsh, brassy-toned, German colina, and "blew a blast so loud and shrill," that the Dutch pug began to bark, Carlo to howl, and the other nuisance, master Charles, to cry. The German colina was of itself bad enough, but these congregate noises were intolerable. Uncle John aimed a desperate blow with a large apple, which he was just about to bite, at the head of Carlo, who, in order to give his lungs fair play, was standing on all fours on the hampers. The apple missed the dog, and went some distance beyond him into the water. Mr. Carlo, attributing to uncle John a kinder feeling than that which actually prompted the proceeding, looked upon it as a good-natured expedient to afford him an opportunity of adding his mite to the amusements of the day, by displaying a specimen of his training. Without waiting for a second hint, he plunged into the river, seized the apple, and, paddling up to the side of the boat with the prize triumphantly exhibited in his jaws, to the consternation of the whole party, he scrambled in between uncle John and his master, dropped the apple upon the floor, distributed a copious supply of Thames' water amongst the affrighted beholders, squeezed his way through them as best he could, and, with an air of infinite self-satisfaction, resumed his place on the hampers.

Had Mr. Jack Richards, the owner of the dog, been at the bottom of the Thames a week before this delightful twenty-fourth not one of the party, Mr. Richards himself excepted, would have felt in the slightest degree concerned; but since, with a common regard to politeness, they could not explicitly tell him so they contented themselves with bestowing upon Mr. Carlo every term of opprobrium, every form of execration, which good-manners will allow—leaving it to the sagacity of "the life and soul of the company" to apply them to himself, if so it might be agreeable to him. Poor fellow! he felt the awkwardness of his situation, and figuratively, as well as literally speaking, this exploit of his dog threw a damp upon him, as it had done upon every one else.

For some time the pic-nics pursued their way in solemn silence. At length, Bagshaw, perceiving that there would be very little pleasure if matters were allowed to go on in this way, exclaimed,

"An intelligent observer, not imbued with the knowledge of our intentions, would indicate us to be a combination of perturbed spirits, rowed by Charon across the river Tiber."

In cases of this kind, the essential is to break the ice. Conversation was now resumed.

"Ah! ha!" said the vice-president, "Sion-house."

"The residuum of the Northumberlands," said Claudius,

"one of the most genealogical and antique families in England."

And here, having put forth so much classical and historical lore, almost in a breath, he marked his own satisfaction by a short, single cough. The vice-president said nothing, but he thought to himself, "There is much more in this Bagshaw than I suspected."

Jack Richards was up again.

"Come, what's done can't be helped; but, upon my soul! I am sorry at being the innocent cause of throwing cold water on the party."

"Cold water, indeed! look at me, sir," said Miss Snubbleston, with tears in her eyes, and exhibiting her ci-devant shoulder-of-mutton sleeves, which, but half an hour before, as stiff and stately as starch could make them, were now hanging loose and flabby about her skinny arms.

"Too bad, Jack," said uncle John, "to bring that cursed Carlo of yours!"

Carlo, perceiving that he was the subject of conversation, was instantly on his legs, his eye steadily fixed upon uncle John, evidently expecting a signal for a second plunge. The alarm was general, and every tongue joined in the scream of "Lie down, sir! lie down!"

Uncle John, who had been more than once offended by the odour from his friend's garlic sausage, and who had on each and every such occasion vented an exclamation of disgust, to the great amusement of Mr. Richards, (who chuckled with delight to think of the exchange he had secretly effected,) here, in the very middle of the stream, resolved to rid himself of the annoyance. Unperceived by any one, he gently drew the parcel from Richards' coat-pocket, and let it drop into the water! Like king Richard's pierced coffin, once in, it soon found the way to the bottom. Uncle John could scarcely restrain his inclination to laugh aloud; however, he contrived to assume an air of indifference, and whistled part of a tune.

ARRIVAL AT TWICKENHAM, AND THE CATASTROPHE.

Arrived at Twickenham, the boatmen were ordered to pull up to a beautiful meadow, sloping down to the water's edge. There was no time to lose—they had no pleasure yet—so Bagshaw entreated that every one "would put his shoulder to the wheel, and be on the qui rata." In an instant a large heavy hamper was landed, but, as in compliance with Bagshaw's request, every one did something to help, a scene of confusion was the consequence, and numerous pieces of crockery were invalidated ere the cloth was properly spread, and the dishes, plates, and glasses distributed. But for the feast. Mr. Snodgrass's basket was opened, and out of it were taken four remarkably fine chickens, and a tongue—uncooked! There was but one mode of accounting for this trifling omission. Mr. Snodgrass's Betty was a downright matter-of-fact person, who obeyed orders to the very letter. Having been told, the evening before, to get four fine chickens for roasting, together with a tongue, and to pack them, next morning, in a basket, she did so literally and strictly; but, as she had received no distinct orders to dress them, to have done so she would have deemed an impertinent departure from her instructions. Well; since people in a high state of civilization, like Mr. Claudius Bagshaw and his friends, cannot eat raw chickens, they did the only thing they could under the circumstances—they grumbled exceedingly, and put them back again into the basket. This was a serious deduction in the important point of quantity, and uncle John felt a slight touch of remorse at having thrown, as he thought, his friend's Italian sausage into the Thames. However there was still provision in the garrison. But the run of luck in events, as at a game of whist, may be against you; and when it is so, be assured that human prudence and foresight—remarkable as even Mrs. Bagshaw's who bespoke her pigeons seven weeks before she wanted them—avail but little. When the packages were first stowed in the boat, the pigeon-pie was inadvertently placed at the bottom, and every thing else, finishing with the large heavy hamper of crockery, with Carlo on that, upon it; so that when it was taken up it appeared a chaotic mass of pie-crust, broken china, pigeons, brown paper, beef-steak, eggs, and straw!

"Now this is enough to provoke a saint!" said Bagshaw; and no one attempting to deny the position, with this salvo for his own character of philosophic patience, he indulged himself in the full expression of his vexation and sorrow. After a minute examination, he declared the pie to be "a complete squash," and that nobody could venture to eat it but at the imminent risk of being choked. As he was about to throw it over the hedge, Miss Snubbleston, seized with an unusual fit of generosity, called out to him.

"What are you doing? Though it isn't fit for us to eat, it will be quite a treat to the poor watermen. I dare say, poor souls, they don't often get pigeon-pie."

But the good genius of Mr. Carlo prevailed; and the truth of the adage, "tis an ill wind that blows nobody good," was confirmed in his mind as he found himself busily employed in the ingenious operation of separating pigeon from porcelain. It was, doubtless, extremely ill bred in one dog not to invite another, and Cupid expressed his sense of the slight by a long-continued yell, which drew down upon him, from the equally disappointed bipeds of the company, sundry wishes, the positive accomplishment of which would not have tended much to his personal happiness. The next basket was opened. Things were not altogether in a desperate state. Mr. Wrench's ham was in perfect order, and that, with Miss Snubbleston's salad, and some bread and—could it be possible! After so much preparation, and Mr. Bagshaw's committee of "proven-der" to boot, that no one should have thought of so obvious a requisite as bread! There would not be time to send Mr. Bagshaw to Twickenham town to procure some, for it was getting late, and if they lost the tide, they should be on the water till midnight, and they did not like the appearance of the sky, which was by no means so blue as it had hitherto been. However, the want of bread did not much signify; they could make a shift with Miss Snubbleston's biscuits and pound-cakes. But uncle John did not come out on an excursion of pleasure to make a shift; no more did Bagshaw, no more did any of the others. There was nothing else to be done; so where is Miss Snubbleston's basket? And where is Master Charles? gracious! Don't be alarmed, the precious rarity is in no danger. He was soon discovered behind a tree, whither he had dragged the fruit and cakes, and was engaged with all his might and main, in an endeavour, with a piece of stick to force out an apple. In this attempt, as it was presently seen, the interesting child had cracked a bottle, the contents of which, merely a preparation of oil, vinegar, and mustard for the salad, were quietly dribbling through the pound-cakes, biscuits, and fruit. Similar aspirations to those which had lately been so cordially expressed for the Dutch pug, were now most devoutly formed in behalf of Master Charles.

"This comes of bringing their plaguey brats with them," said uncle and Bagshaw.

Whilst this scene was going on, Jack Richards, perceiving that the service of the table was incomplete, bethought him of uncle John's silver handled knives and forks, and spoons. he felt first in one pocket, then in the other, then he ran down to search the boat, then he rummaged the baskets.

"Jack, my boy," hallooed uncle John, "don't trouble yourself, you'll never see that again."

"What, sir?"

"I could not bear the smell of it any longer, so I slyly drew it out of your pocket, and dexterously let it fall into the deepest part of the Thames."

And here uncle John chuckled, and looked about him for applause.

"Bless me, sir! Don't say so—why—bless my heart—you don't know—before we got into the boat, I put the sausage into your pocket, and your case of cutlery into my own!"

There was a general burst of laughter against uncle John. He turned as pale as—nay, paler, than any thing that has ever yet been dragged into the comparison; for an instant he stood stock-still, then thrust his hand into his pocket, drew forth the unfortunate substitute, and at the same time exclaiming D—tion! dashed it violently to the ground. He next buttoned his coat from the bottom to the top, pulled down his cuffs, whispered to his no longer admired Jack Richards, "You shall hear from me, Mr.—" and saying aloud to Bagshaw, "This comes of your confounded party of pleasure, sir," away he went, and returned to town outside a Twickenham coach; resolving by the way to call out that Mr. Richards, and to eject the Bagshaws from the snug corner they held in his last will and testament.

This explosion seemed to have banished pleasure for that day. They were all, more or less, out of humour; and instead of making the best of things, as they had hitherto done, they now made the worst of them. Sir Thomas's hamper of his choice wine (which, by the by, he purchased at a cheap shop for the occasion) was opened; and slices of ham were cut with the only knife and fork. Jack Richards tried to be facetious, but it would not do. He gave Bagshaw a poke in the ribs, which was received with a very formal, "Sir, I must beg—" To Mr. Wrench, junior, he said,

"You have not spoken much to-day—but you have made amends for your silence—d'ye take?—Your ham is good, though your tongue is not worth much!"

Instead of laughing, Mr. Wrench simpered something about impertinent liberties and satisfaction. On being invited by Sir Thomas to a second glass of his old East India, he said that one was a dose—had rather not double the Cape; and at the first glass of champagne, he inquired whether there had been a plentiful supply of gooseberries that year. In short, whether it were that the company knew not how to appreciate his style of wit and pleasantry, or that he was in reality a very disagreeable person, the fact is that—but hold! let us say nothing ill of him; he died last week, at Folkestone, of a surfeit of goose, in the forty-ninth year of his age. For the consolation of such as were amused by him, and regret his loss, be it remembered that there are still to be found many Jack Richards in this world.

As we have said, they now resolved to make the worst of every thing; the grass was damp, the gnats were troublesome, Carlo's nose was in every body's face, Cupid's teeth at every body's calves, and Master Charles was ill of the many sour apples; it was growing late, and no good could come of sitting longer in the open air. They re-embarked. By the time they reached Putney it was pitch dark, and the tide was setting against them. They moved on in mute impatience, for there was a slight sprinkling of rain. It now fell in torrents. Master Charles grew frightened and screamed. Cupid yelped and Carlo howled. Accompanied the rest of the way by these pleasing sounds, at one in the morning (two hours and a half later than they intended) they arrived at Westminster-stairs, dull, dreary, drowsy, discontented, and drenched.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES—NUMBER VII.

THE moon was streaming down through the trees, silvering the distant river with her trembling beams, and casting long and strongly marked shadows from the houses. The constellations, which have been the theme of man's wonder and admiration for thousands of years, were yet lending their quiet lustre to the lovely night; and the scene that was spread around me as I stood upon a gentle hill just in the suburbs of the town, seemed like a surpassing picture, it was so silent, motionless, and beautiful. I thought of those lines of Moore:

"A spirit there is whose fragrant sigh
"Is breathing now through earth and air;
"Where cheeks are blushing the spirit is nigh,
"Where lips are meeting the spirit is there.
"Hail to thee, hail to thee, kindling power,
"Spirit of love, spirit of bliss;
"Thy holiest time is the moonlight hour,
"And there never was moonlight so sweet as this."

The night is a theme for poetry as well as painting. I admired in my secret soul the arrangement by which nature had provided, for us this beautiful blessing, with its grateful companions, sleep and dreams. Although the evil passions of man have stalked forth beneath its shadows, and the cruel and degraded pervert its gentle influences to their own designs; yet to me it comes with the welcome step of a good angel, unraveling the web of day, and cheering me after toil and disappointment. It is a medicine to the sick and feverish spirit. It is a truce to the war of life. It is a dew to the flower of the mind, reviving its invisible and drooping leaves. Its wide silence, and the brilliant secrets which it reveals from the bosom of the sky, call up in the heart attributes which have been all day slumbering.

'Who can tell,' thought I, as the quiet witchery of the hour fell into the recesses of my nature, as light penetrating the depths of a stream, and each star in the heavens, and every broad stream of light upon the earth roused up its own sweet feeling; 'who knows what other undiscovered senses have been bestowed on us?—or what new capacities may hereafter grow up by which our pleasures may be multiplied, and their spheres enlarged? In what various and delightful ways do the surrounding objects already address themselves to our comprehension! What vast designs the human mind has compassed! What hidden qualities it has detected. Who shall interrupt its progress? What shall limit its wanderings?'

While indulging in these proud and lofty meditations, I had lengthened my walk towards the church, whose white steeple rises above the foliage of the trees in graceful simplicity. With eager step, and perhaps glowing cheek, I pursued my way, when the little church-yard, with its silent grove, and speaking but melancholy monuments, came up to my view. In a few moments I stood within the narrow enclosure, with nothing around me but the out-spreading trees, and recorded marble, and the ashes of the great and the gay—youth—beauty—worth—mouldering beneath.—There is a deep and strange feeling in standing thus in the solitary night, with no companions but the beings of a past world. We realize with extraordinary force, the unknown void towards which time's lapsing current bears us, and the impotent imagination, that has ranged all regions of created things, recoils aghast from the blackness of the prospect. Such a scene presents, too, a singular contrast between the living and the dead. Sweet flowers are springing from the rounded grave, with as much beauty as if they decorated a garden of pleasure—the sounds of the distant crowd—the laugh of the careless—the bark of the dog—or perhaps a burst of music floats like a stranger above the unheeding tombs—and the same moonlight that streams upon fair ladies' bower, tinges the neighbouring stream, and lends the wanton clouds their robes of silver, smiles, as if in ignorance, on the white slabs, the emblem of life's ruin, and the last display of its pride. I thought nature had forgotten them.

Here repose the bodies of many whom I had known and loved. Manly talent and faithful affection were there—youth's wild mirth, and woman's soft beauty. There poor Graham rests from his weary being. Haines was cut off from a career of honour, to become the tenant of this dark abode; and Emmet, whose words I had so often caught with rapture—whose glowing sentiments and venerable form yet lingered in my memory, there sleeps in silence with the rest.

As I stood by the grave of one whom I had known, lost in sad reflections upon hours gone by, I was a little startled by a step upon the grass, and a form glided towards me. I at once recognised the Genius, and welcomed him with the hope that he could dispel the sadness which had taken possession of my mind.

"Thanks, fair spirit," said I, "for this timely visit, although I fear your censure for frequenting this melancholy spot, and indulging in these vain regrets."

"Far from it," said he. "You are where the living should be no stranger; whether he comes to mourn over those who are gone, or to reflect upon the great surviving world."

"But do not these dark places promote the discontent which is our greatest foe?"

"If you come here to lament idly over the past, or to exaggerate the miseries of the future, you are only wandering from your own duty, and consequently from your interest; but you cannot be better engaged than in retiring here for a time from the confusion and error which prevail abroad, to canvass impartially the value of things."

"But here," said I, "I can read only painful truths. They chill warm hope—they prostrate proud and lofty ambition—they cause me to neglect the affections which reach their coiling tendrils towards the floating object around. And this stern foul doom stands before me like a monster in whose awful presence the beautiful erect spirit is abased."

"Therein," said the Genius, "you are in error. The terror of death is created more by the imagination than the reason. It is a phantom necessary in itself, which however you have clothed it with the drapery of fear, gloom, and anguish, contributes as much to the perfection of your earthly system of things, as any of the instruments of heaven's will that come in pleasing shapes, and bestow absolute and immediate joy."

"If death is no absolute evil," replied I, "why do all men fear it? There is no principle more deeply rooted in our nature. I have often wondered why the creative hand which has woven together so many charms, which has made the very elements lavish of joy, which has given the wild bird its gorgeous plumage and untaught music, and the modest flower its blended hues and fragrant breath, could not have presented death also in a form less terrible."

"If," said my companion, "the process by which the spirit is disentangled from the flesh, were one of ease or luxury, the race upon earth would soon come to an end. Every idle sorrow would waft away multitudes. It is therefore wisely ordered, that the way from the present limited state lies through a dark, repulsive, and painful passage; but strip it of the exaggerated hideousness in which fancy and ignorance have arrayed it, and it loses much of its horrid character."

"But," said I, "it teems with bodily anguish; the senses are wrenched from their duties; the healthy blood loses its warm impulses, and the pure intellect wanders from its course, as light refracted into broken and distorted images. Is not this an evil?"

"A partial and immediate evil," he answered, "and made so for a just purpose; but not the peculiar, undefinable, and complete misfortune which you have imagined it to be. It is a part of the same system of necessary and productive pain which pervades all life, sustains its various branches, and accomplishes its intelligent and happy designs. The infant feels it in the feebleness of its helpless frame; it acquires strength with cries and fears. Through sickness and anguish, its white teeth bud forth, the mother's joy; and the weary hours of its primitive being are as fraught with sorrow as those which mark the decline of age; yet you trace these to strength, health, intellect, all the attributes of mind and body. Why may not the pangs of dissolution be the preparatory stages of a higher state?"

"But they who remain behind," said I, "have the strongest claim upon our sympathy. The feeling with which I stand by a new grave consists not of compassion for the poor ashes of the dead, unconscious of the idle ceremonies which it has conjured up around it; but oh, the hearts that are swelling and breaking in the circle of spectators! The father—the son—brothers—sisters—the fond husband—the deserted wife—these are the objects for which my eyes moisten and my heart bleeds."

"Grief for the dead," said the Genius, "is truly an anguish; but it elevates and inspires the soul. It loosens the hold with which it has grasped the earth; it prepares it for its own destiny, and to one who has no unkind word to retract, no treachery to repent, it is not destitute of a sweetness purifying and ennobling. Besides, it is a misfortune which must necessarily overtake you; the world would otherwise be crowded with a multitude of helpless and useless beings. Its soil would no longer answer their labours with the golden harvest; the earth would not even afford them room to tread, and life would degenerate into an evil, from which death would be a welcome refuge. Besides, time has been gifted with healing powers. The swelling anguish of the bereaved at length subsides, and the population of the globe are sensibly benefited by an arrangement over which you mourn. It is the grand privilege of virtue and knowledge to meet death with courage, and to support the loss of others with resignation. Despair is unworthy a noble and intelligent being; only the ignorant and the guilty yield to its influence. To live wisely and die with dignity, are within the compass of all men's endeavours. He who has read nature with wisdom, cherishes confidence in the decrees of Providence, and rests upon his mercy."

I lost his soft accents upon the breeze of the evening; and, as I looked around, found myself alone among the rustling trees, with the quiet moonlight sleeping upon the still graves and pale monuments. F.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF FRANCIS I.

KING OF FRANCE.

FRANCIS WAS at one time the rival and enemy, at another time the friend, of Henry the eighth. He had some good qualities; but he had no strong sense of morality or of honour, and attended more to the pursuits of dissipation than to the duties of a sovereign. His reign was in some respects inglorious; yet it exhibits some romantic scenes and remarkable incidents, which are well detailed by the author of a work under the above title.

The base profligacy of the king appears in the following story:—Among the nobles who repaired to the court was the count de Chateaubriant: he was related by marriage to the younger branch of the house of Foix, three of the brothers of which family were in the army, and had already shown that they were worthy representatives of a name which had long stood eminent in the martial annals of France. The count had married their sister, whose extraordinary beauty had made up for her want of a dowry; and with a caution, in which the event proved he was too well justified, he had declined bringing her to court. The report of her charms had, however, reached the ears of the king, who invited her husband to let her visit the metropolis. The count made various excuses; but, finding that he could not resist the importunities of Francis, he endeavoured to put an end to them, by intimating that his wife loved her retirement too well to quit it, and that, as hitherto all his persuasions had failed, he felt unwilling to repeat them, or to force her inclinations. He had foreseen that all kinds of stratagems would be resorted to for the purpose of making him display his hidden beauty, and had adopted a precaution which he believed would effectually protect him against the artifices of the king, and those minions of the court who

(he knew,) not less from a love of mischief than from a desire of accomplishing the royal will, would endeavour to thwart his intentions. He had procured two rings, the exact counterparts of each other, one of which he had given to the countess, and the other he kept in his own possession. He told her that he should perhaps, when at court, be compelled to ask her to come thither: but he enjoined her to pay no attention to his letters, however importunately he might write, until she should receive one from him in which his ring should be enclosed. The young and innocent lady, who had always lived at a great distance from the court, who was happy in the love of her husband, and who found in his castle, situate in a remote part of Bretagne, all the splendour she then desired, unhesitatingly promised him obedience. The count again appeared at court, and again encountered the half-jesting reproaches of Francis, for not having brought his wife with him. He assured the king that her own wish alone kept her at home; and, in proof of his veracity, he offered to write, in such terms as the king might dictate, a request that she would join him. The ring not accompanying the letter, he received from his countess such an answer as he expected, and he triumphantly produced her epistle to the king, thus for a time relieving himself from solicitations which his jealous fears rendered extremely irksome. The mischievous perseverance of some of the courtiers, however, helped them to a discovery of his secret. He had a servant whose fidelity and attachment had gained him the entire confidence of his master. This man, who had observed the extraordinary care which the count took of his ring, asked him the reason of his solicitude; and to him the count did not hesitate to explain it, in the belief that it was of all things the least likely that he would ever divulge it. The servant was bribed by some persons about the court, for the purpose of gaining intelligence respecting the countess; and, the story of the ring being thus known, it was not difficult to get him to steal it. A skilful goldsmith made a fac-simile of the jewel with great despatch; and the original, after a short absence, was placed where the count, who had been very much distressed at missing it, found it again, and believed he had mislaid it. He was then urged once more to write to the countess, which he did with unhesitating confidence. The false ring was inserted in his letter, and despatched into Bretagne; and his first knowledge of the fraud that had been practised upon him was derived from the sudden appearance of his obedient wife, who immediately upon the receipt of the letter had hastened to Paris. Here the romance of the story ends. The king saw the countess, and was struck with her beauty. She fell beneath the artifices which were employed for her ruin; and her husband retired to his castle to hide his misery and dishonour in the scene of his former happiness, which her frailty had made a solitude.

That the king had no great share of political dexterity or address, may be presumed from his treatment of a German adventurer. Francis Sickinghen (Seckingen) was one of those extraordinary spirits who seem born for the purpose of proving what individual activity and genius can achieve. He was a gentleman of Germany, of small fortune and obscure family; but by his courage, his eloquence, and his intelligence, he had raised himself to a position of great importance. He was acquainted with all the influential persons of Germany, and had engaged most of them in his interests. His exploits would seem a fitter subject for romance than for history, but that history is sometimes the most marvellous kind of romance. He had raised a small force, which he kept constantly on foot, and with which he carried on war against the emperor and such of the independent states as had not engaged his alliance. He traversed Germany with a rapidity which defied pursuit. He had at different periods attacked the duke of Lorraine, the town of Metz, the landgrave of Hesse, and had reduced them to pay him a tribute. When a force with which he could not cope was directed against him, he and his army disappeared, until, by his intrigues, he had provoked the attack of some more powerful enemy against the emperor, and thus drawn off his resentment from himself, when he returned with unabated resolution to the prosecution of his former designs. Fleuranges, who knew his value, presented him to Francis as a man whose assistance might be made of the greatest service to his projects upon the empire. The king was struck with the extraordinary talents which the German displayed, treated him with distinction, granted him a pension of one thousand crowns, and made presents to the train of gentlemen whom Sickinghen always led with him, and who, in point of birth and fortune, were infinitely his superiors. Francis, however, treated him with a reserve which wounded the pride of this haughty adventurer. He engaged him to serve in Germany, but did not think fit to explain to him the real point at which he aimed. Sickinghen, before he departed, told his friend Fleuranges that he was grateful for the generosity, and delighted with the reception he had met with from the king, to whom he promised to devote his best services against all the world, excepting only the house of la-Mark, to whom he was under indelible obligations. "But he does not know me," he added, "if he thinks that I am more easily to be attached to him by his bounty than by his confidence. I see through his plans, although he and you have thought fit not to avow them: he aims at the empire. I demanded certain troops from him, and he has refused my request; he thought, perhaps, I wanted them for myself; but they were solely for the purpose of gaining for him a body of German gentlemen. Tell him that he will never be well served but by simple gentlemen such as I am. If he deals with princes and electors, they will take his money and deceive him afterwards." Sickinghen returned to Germany, and exercised again the free warfare to which he was accustomed. Some traders who had been unjustly dealt with by certain Milan merchants, applied to him for assistance; and he did them right by seizing property of the value of twenty-five thousand francs belonging to the Milanese. The latter carried their complaints to Francis as their liege lord, and he demanded restitution from Sickinghen, who replied, that, when the Germans under his protection should have had justice done to them, he would give up the effects he had seized. The king's council, who had no notion of the sort of man they had to deal with, punished the haughtiness of his answer by suspending his pension; and Sickinghen, thus freed from his engagements with Francis, became a party to those which his friends of the house of la-Mark had formed with the king of Spain. He afterwards put himself at the head of a body of Suabian troops, whose services Francis might have secured, but neglected; and his presence with this force in the neighbourhood of Frankfort, when the diet was assembled there, was believed to have contributed in no small degree to influence the election.

TIME FOR SLEEP.

Sleep, "tired nature's sweet restorer," is well known to be essential to the existence of man. Those who are long deprived of a necessary proportion of it, have their health impaired, and not unfrequently the period of their existence abridged.

Many would appear to imagine that provided a certain number of the twenty-four hours be passed in sleep, it matters little how or where such repose is obtained. This, however, is a very gross error. The accommodations of the night, equally with the occupations of the day, exert a very powerful influence upon the health and well-being of the system.

Night is evidently the period appropriated by nature for repose, and general experience has proved, that it is the only one during which we can with certainty obtain that sound, sweet, and refreshing slumber, so necessary for the preservation of health. Sleeping during the day is, indeed, on many accounts, a pernicious practice, which should be carefully avoided, excepting under particular circumstances of disease, or when a sufficient amount of repose cannot be obtained at the natural periods. This, however, does not apply to infants. For the first months after birth, a healthy child sleeps full two-thirds of its time. The propensity requires to be indulged by day as well as by night; but, with judicious management, it may be brought, in a short time, to require and enjoy repose during the latter period only. Young children, when fatigued by exercise, will also, in general, be found inclined to sleep during the day; from indulging them in a short repose, under such circumstances, no bad effects can result, provided their clothing be perfectly loose, so that every part of their bodies is freed from bands or ligatures.

The popular maxim, "early to bed and early to rise," is one which should be rigidly observed by every individual. It has been remarked that, in the natural state, the disposition to sleep usually comes on soon after the commencement of darkness; and, according to the oldest and most accurate observers, three or four hours sleep before midnight is very nearly as refreshing as double that portion in the morning. Persons who spend the day in manual labour, or active exercise in the open air, with great difficulty keep awake for a few hours after the night has closed in; and this disposition to early sleep is, perhaps, one of the strongest indications of perfect health.

The studious are noted for their disregard of "the regular hours of rest." The solemn stillness of night, inviting to those pursuits which require a fixed attention, and a connected series of thought and reasoning, leads them first into the habit; which is subsequently strengthened by the circumstance of intense application of the mind, uninterrupted by sufficient and appropriate exercise, producing a state of nervous irritability inimical to sleep. Hence the student fears to leave his midnight lamp for a couch which he can only occupy in a state of restlessness. Let him, however, relinquish his nocturnal studies, and seek, during the natural period, that repose which his mind and body alike demand; appropriating "the hours of early morn" to study, and the residue of the forenoon to exercise, and we are well persuaded, that while his progress in the pursuit of knowledge would be in no degree retarded, he will be the gainer, not merely in the enjoyment of more perfect health, but in the increased clearness and vigour of his intellectual faculties.

It has been very correctly remarked "that the atmosphere of the night is always more vitiated, and consequently less fit for respiration, than that of the day; and as we respire a greater portion of air while awake than in a sleeping state, it follows that from these, independent of other causes, the system is more liable to injury in the former than in the latter state."

Early rising is equally important to the health of the system as early rest. On no account should any one permit himself to again slumber, after the moment of his first awaking in the morning, whether this happen at the early dawn, or before the sun has risen; even though from accident or unavoidable causes he may not have enjoyed his six or eight hours of repose. It is much better to make up the deficiency, if necessary, at some other time, than to attempt taking another nap. Whoever shall accustom himself thus to rise, will enjoy more undisturbed sleep during the night, and awake far more refreshed, than those who indolently slumber all the morning.

Even this second nap is, however, by no means so injurious to health as the practice of continuing in bed of a morning long after waking; nothing tends, especially in children, and young persons generally, more effectually to unbrace the solids, exhaust the spirits, and thus to undermine the vigour, activity, and health of the system, than such a practice.

Let any one, who has been accustomed to lie in bed till eight or nine o'clock, rise by five or six, spend an hour or two in walking, riding, or any active diversion in the open air, and we will find his spirits more cheerful and serene throughout the day, his appetite more keen, and his body more active and vigorous.

Rees, in his life of Dr. Kippis, attributes the uninterrupted health of the latter, to habits of early rising, as well as to the uniform regularity and temperance to which he had been accustomed from his youth. It may be added, that however different in other respects may have been the habits of those who have been remarkable for their longevity, they were all early risers.

The habit of early rising is one of great importance in reference to the health of young persons; when commenced in the first years of life, it will be persevered in from choice. "Hence," to use the language of an experienced writer, "while under the eye of parents and guardians, children may be taught to rise constantly at a certain hour, which will render it more easy for them to persevere in the habit after they are removed from under that control. If no disease or accident intervene, they will need no further repose than that obtained in their first sleep, which custom will have caused to terminate, of itself, just at the usual hour, and then, if they turn upon the other ear to take a second nap, they will be taught to look upon it as an interposition, not at all redounding to their credit.

No one should retire to rest immediately after a full meal, or in an agitated state of mind. Indeed, after a light supper, at least two hours ought to elapse before bed-time; and as a requisite for sound and invigorating repose, it is necessary to banish all anxious, gloomy, or depressing ideas and thoughts, and every species of mental exertion. To the same intent, every circumstance calculated to excite the senses should be removed. The pernicious practice, adopted by many, of reading in bed until they fall asleep, is particularly to be avoided. In place of this dangerous expedient to invite sleep, it would be more salutary to walk up and down the room for a few minutes, or to partake of any other gentle exercise. Fortunately, however, the individual who lives a life of temperance and virtue, and partakes daily of sufficient active exercise, requires no opiate to lull him to repose:

"On him the balmy dews
Of sleep with double nutriment descend." Jour. of Health.

HUMAN LIFE.—The result of researches in different parts of France, England, the Netherlands, Switzerland, and Russia has been to show, that, out of a hundred men in those countries, only about twenty-five arrive at the age of sixty years. Mountainous countries, whatever may be their latitude, are those in which life is of the greatest duration.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Memoirs of the Life and Ministry of the Rev. John Summerfield.—Mr. Holland has, by this interesting biography of a most pious, eloquent, and popular clergyman, conferred an invaluable benefit on the christian community at large, and especially entitled himself to the grateful attention of the members of the very extensive church of which Mr. Summerfield was a distinguished and shining light. Recommended to the arduous task by so nice and able a judge like the poet Montgomery, imbued with an overflowing zeal in the cause of religion, and animated by a lively and devoted regard for the amiable virtues, the unobtrusive piety, and the impressive eloquence of his deceased friend, he has judiciously performed the charge intrusted to him, and presented all the materials spread before him in an unpretending, but attractive form, calculated to make a favourable impression on all sorts of readers. No gloomy spirit of bigotry casts its dark shadows over the path traced by the steps of the illustrious preacher: no illiberal denunciations or exclusive partialities render his example forbidding, or an imitation of his passing excellencies a hopeless attempt to the humble seeker after holiness and virtue. Benevolence, active, and spreading its wide embrace from east to west, and north to south, wherever the human form offers an object for its regard and a stimulus for its exertion, characterises the tone and the spirit in which this volume is written. This tone and spirit are borrowed, indeed, from the character which is attempted to be portrayed. The mind of Summerfield was expansive. In early life the ardour of his youthful passions led him to mingle with the world, and too often to indulge in its vices. He did not escape the contamination, and for a while was covered with iniquity—his sins became as scarlet, until he himself was startled at the awful gulf into which he was about to plunge. He aroused himself, and vindicated his claims to independence and to religion. He had indeed suffered, but not altogether in vain; he derived knowledge, if he had incurred guilt. And this very knowledge extended his after means of doing good by increasing his facilities to reach the avenues to the human heart. To this cause we attribute much of his subsequent popularity. Not that we lose sight of his resplendent powers and his native manner: these would always have commanded success in any sphere which his genius might have selected for their exercise; but we doubt whether they alone would have rendered his oratory so universally popular with the lower, as with the higher classes, with the unenlightened and the vulgar, as well as with the educated and the refined. His connection with the Moravians in early life also assisted to impart to his character much of its loveliness, its meekness, and its untiring efforts to do all the good within its reach. But it is not our object to attempt an analysis of Mr. Summerfield's character. Nor would we even approach the subject of his commanding and never-failing eloquence, "the delight of wondering, weeping, and admiring audiences." His own writings cannot convey any accurate impressions of its power, its persuasiveness, its ready sliding into the soul and the heart of all who listened in admiration and in love. As is beautifully expressed in the letter of Mr. Montgomery, addressed to the biographer, it "never can be renewed, except with the presence, the eye, and the voice of the preacher himself. In fact, every attempt to present on paper the splendid effects of impassioned eloquence, is like gathering dew drops, which appear jewels and pearls on the grass, but run to water in the hand; the essence and the elements remain, but the grace, the sparkle, and the form are gone." We have italicised the last sentence for its surpassing beauty. It could be written and imagined only by a poet.

The style in which the typography of this volume is executed is not the least of its attractions; and the beautiful portrait of the lamented preacher reflects no ordinary credit on the taste and skill of Mr. Thompson, the engraver. We may safely recommend this biography to our readers as an instructive and interesting work.

High School Society of New-York.—We have read with more than ordinary interest and pleasure, the "Fifth Annual Report of the Trustees," on this highly important subject. It was drawn up by the president of the institution, the Hon. Gulian C. Verplanck, and whilst it evinces a deep and lively solicitude for the welfare of the rising generation, and for the reputation of our city, in its active zeal to promote the great cause of science and learning, the ability happily displayed, is characteristic of that distinguished gentleman and scholar.

After detailing many of the evils to which the society had been subjected, some of which were of a serious nature and peculiar character, but in all of which a happy and effectual remedy has been applied, the state and condition of the institution are shown to be most admirably organized,—in the highest degree prosperous and respectable,—and consequently capable of dispensing inestimable benefits to the community.

At the head of this association, we find a gentleman long since conspicuous for his attainments in the sciences and general literature—Dr. John Griscom. Perhaps another individual could scarcely be found, who is equally competent, and, in all respects, as well qualified for the station. All the associate teachers, as well in the female as male departments, are persons of the best qualifications, connected with the fairest reputation, as will appear from the following sentence which we transcribe from the report: "Above all, we have a numerous and efficient corps of excellent teachers, fitted for their stations not less by their moral character, temper and manners, than by their professional skill and general attainments."

The following paragraphs, with which our brief remarks will close, are entitled to great weight, and should therefore be read with particular attention:

"The influence of sound instruction here, will not only be felt within these walls, but will naturally spread in no small degree to every other school, public or private, in this city, now, and in a succeeding generation.

"More than this, the wise and good of our land, the religious and the patriotic, in all parts of our union, are roused to the improvement and diffusion of education. Situated as New-York is, the emporium of American commerce, and the thoroughfare of our ever-active population, it is in this, as in relation to other matters, 'a city upon a hill which cannot be hid.' Its useful and benevolent institutions are clearly examined by intelligent and philanthropic visitors and travellers from the north, the south, and the west. Every improvement in education, every more practical or more extensive application of a known principle which may be developed here, will soon be copied or improved on the shores of our lakes, or on the banks of the mighty rivers of the west."

The Cook's Oracle and Housekeeper's Manual.—An early copy of this most valuable work of Dr. Kitchiner, which has so long been the admiration of the refined and intellectual, whether philosopher, statesman, scholar, general, or man of fashion, has been very politely sent to us by an attentive friend. Independently of its various merits, therefore, which have long been known to the literary world, we take great pleasure in recommending it to the special notice of housekeepers, because it has been published, by the enterprising and indefatigable Harpers in a very neat, convenient, and elegant form. It is peculiarly adapted to the wants and the taste of this community, by the additions of a medical gentleman of this city. The importance and advantages of possessing some manual of this kind has been conceded by almost every family, and may be proved on the obvious ground that it curtails and obviates useless experiments and unprofitable trials. But the work will speak for itself, and the very numerous recommendations which attest its value, will amply ensure its claim to general use and approbation. The bare mention of the fact, that, within twelve years, seventy thousand copies have been sold in England, is sufficient evidence of the estimation in which it is held in that enlightened country, so distinguished for its edible taste and powers. In conclusion we shall hint that to all families, and those members of it particularly who meritedly prize themselves on the skilful and neat management of their houses, there could not be offered a more appropriate and welcome present at the approaching holidays; far more valuable would it prove than most of the annual trash that is so readily given, to be as readily laid aside or else forgotten as soon as read.

Sunday Evening Lectures.—There has been lying on our table for some time, an interesting little work, comprised in two neat duodecimo volumes, entitled "A Course of Lectures for Sunday Evenings; containing religious advice to young persons." It has been recently published in this city, by Orville A. Roobach; but who the author is we are not informed. Be he who he may, however, he has admirably succeeded in a very difficult department of literature, viz. that of conveying religious instruction in language adapted to the comprehension of children. It is acquitting ourselves of a pleasing duty to recommend these lectures to parents and instructors. This book is the best of the kind that we have read, and we have no doubt of its doing incalculable good. Such an assistant has long been wanted in the regulation of family discipline. The idea of this work was first suggested to the author, by the inattention of some amiable children during the reading of "a well-written discourse" by their father.

On reproving them for this apparent listlessness and indifference, they readily replied, that not comprehending what was read, they were compelled to amuse themselves in some other manner, in order to keep awake; "but that if the subjects were suited to their capacities, they should very willingly attend." On this hint, the author acted, and the elegant little volumes before us are the result. The children were right: show us any "of a larger growth," who could listen to a lecture, in an unknown language, without resorting to the same expedients for relief, and we will retract our opinion; "for how can the mind be expected to attend to those instructions which are beyond its power to conceive? and how can our conduct be influenced by those arguments whose force we are destitute of abilities to discern?" These lectures, which are fifty-two in number, being one for each Sunday evening in a year, are short and interesting. We have read several of them to a little niece, as an experiment, and she is anxious to hear more. An ounce of practical test, is worth a ton weight of theoretical speculations.

The National Gazette.—Amid the disgust, unavoidably excited by the very silly outpourings of a large majority of the diurnal press of our country, it is pleasing to note, here and there, a redeeming exception; a consolatory evidence that all the conductors of this powerful and all-important engine of public opinion, this lever which directs the morals, and extends or limits the intelligence of the thousands in city, village or in hamlet, are not altogether indifferent to the great cause or ignorant of the various responsibilities entrusted to their keeping. Contracted must be the mind, and seared the heart of that man, who would jeopardise the intellectual advancement or the moral improvement of numbers of his fellow-men, by abusing the privileges he enjoys in commanding the only avenues which they possess to knowledge and virtue. And yet many such has chance, party favour, or personal influence, advanced to the giddy height of editorial power, divested alike of sensibility, learning, and discrimination. In such hands what becomes of the public press? It is made the pander to personal notoriety, and to selfish and contracted views, and the vile and desecrated altar-stone, upon which the good of the many is unhallowedly offered up, even as the sacrifices to Moloch.—Be it the duty of every honest and discriminating mind to protest loudly, in the highways and in the byways, against such prostitution of mental labour. If we have not more often raised our voice and cry of indignation against the pervading abuses in this department of letters, it is because we have long been fatigued with its excess, and scarcely had patience left to endure its exhibition. We have, in reality, given up long since the disgusting task of skimming the crude ebullitions of the misnamed politicians who presume to preside over the columns of newspapers in general. But they are not all obnoxious to the denunciation we have made, and among the few, the very few—we have selected the Gazette, edited by Mr. Walsh, for present notice, because we would recommend it on general grounds to the support of the public, as far superior to the mass of ill-compiled and worse executed miscellanies which issue from the same city. Its valuable and elegant selections, evidently made by the hands of a classical and ripe English scholar, and having always in view the diffusion of useful knowledge, elegant literature, or correct and elevated morals; its lofty tone of independence and impartiality manifested in its original department, aiming always to promote the public good, and vindicate the national character from the taunts alike of foreign enemies and inconsiderate domestic partisans, claim for it the first place among its numerous competitors for public patronage. The only fault we can venture to find, is the rare communications of the editor himself, the excellence and raciness of which induce our perhaps inconsiderate desire for their greater frequency.

A fine day in New-York.—The present season, thus far, has not presented a fair specimen of an American autumn. Of our springs, little can be said, except in the licensed hyperbole of poetry. Our summers are too hot, and our winters too cold; but our autumns are generally delightful; particularly that "mild, mellow, soft and yellow" period, denominated the Indian summer, when the rising sun appears like a round sheet of copper, and can be gazed at with the naked eye with impunity, even at its highest meridian. On such a day, it is pleasant to stroll along that great artery of our city, Broadway, and gaze upon the streams, currents and eddies, of restless crowds eternally in motion. On such a day, beauty emerges from the consecrated shrine of her household gods, and exhibits her loveliness in public. Equipped from the armoury of fashion, by the hand of taste, she comes forth prepared for conquest and subsequent capitulation. Here she wears her sweetest smiles, and practises her most fascinating graces. On such a day, shop-keeper's clerks brush up their top-knots, comb their whiskers, brighten their features, and with most flexible bodies, prepare to "become all things to all" women. On such a day, dry goods and fancy articles of every description, are transferred from the shelves to the counter, where they are handled, and inspected, and cheapened, and praised, and condemned, by hands, eyes and lips, too pure, bright, and sweet, to be suspected of insincerity. On such a day, the trees in the park exhibit their autumn attire of variegated leaves, of almost every hue but green. On such a day the whole city is dressed in smiles, and even the wooden idol which surmounts the temple of justice seems to peep out from beneath the bandage by which she is hoodwinked, and casts a look of compassion on the silly fanatics who crowd around her shrine—with an arch leer of contempt at the disgraceful nuisances on her right and left. On such a day, the Wall-street brokers sharpen up their wits, as barbers do their razors, and for the self-same purpose too. On such a day, the wide unruffled bay appears like a polished mirror, a lake of liquid silver, or a sea of glass; while the vessels on its bosom, instead of moving about "like things of life," are motionless as sleeping halcyons. On such a day, business revives, and so, in the same ratio, do animal spirits.

A poetical compliment.—Amanda has taken us by surprise, and though our innate modesty—of which we have a "pretty considerable share"—peremptorily forbids the publication of her favour, we shall venture, for once, to act in direct opposition to its mandate. What! when the first cup of real nectar that ever sparkled before us is presented by a female hand, shall we "dash it from our lips?" No, lady modesty, thou askest of us too much. Besides, the following effusion was the envelope of a still weightier argument from our fair correspondent—a five dollar bill in advance for the present quarter and ensuing year. Such an advocate is irresistible.

Lines addressed to the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

The Mirror—oh the Mirror,
Is paper I admire;
Its poetry is always new,
I so delighted can I read.
And then its moral essays, too,
Enhance its value higher.
The Mirror—I subscribed, you know,
(I recollect the day)
When the first number pleased me so—
How time has passed away!
'Tis nearly seven years ago—
It seems but yesterday!
The Mirror—oh the Mirror,
I first saw it, I remember,
One summer, at the springs, by chance,
'Twas August or September,
Pa gave a dollar in advance,
Which paid up to November.
Its pages then appeared to me
So full of pleasant things I
But I had only seen, you see,
Some sixteen giddy springs;
And now Time flies so rapidly,
I'm sure he must have wings.
The Mirror—oh the Mirror,
It was beautiful and new,
And, like myself, had just "come out."
Before the public view;
We've both improved since, no doubt,
But then, we're older too.
All other papers it excels;
I read it every week,
And oft my little bosom swell'd
Until I couldn't speak!
When many a winking eye beheld
The tear upon my cheek.
The Mirror—oh the Mirror,
Every number had a page
Entirely filled with poetry,
For verse was then the rage,
With anecdote and repartee,
From wits of every age.
Sweet Ida breathed in numbers bland
Her soft enchanting lays,
And there was Woodworth, Sigma, and Maudie Thayer and a host of more;
I often sigh'd to try my hand,
And share their blooming lays.
The Mirror—oh the Mirror,
For three hundred weeks and more,
I've never failed to read the sheet,
With pleasure, cheer and o'er,
And long for Saturday to meet
The carrier at the door.
For Ariel's tuneful numbers
Are delightful to my ear;
Jeanie breathes a strain so chaste,
'Tis ecstasy to hear;
While Reuben's wit and classic taste,
In sparkling gems appear.

Sam Patch.—We do not obtrude the name of this unfortunate and infatuated man for the purpose of indulging in the misplaced and ill timed jests which form such fruitful themes for the unthinking editors of the daily press. We wish to allude to his miserable and untimely end, his unprepared departure from this life to appear "unannounced, unanealed" in the presence of his Creator and Judge. His own rashness and foolhardiness contributed undoubtedly to bring about this fatal event, but they were not all in all. The unpardonable encouragement of the multitude, the echoing applauses and inciting notices of the newspapers—these come in for their full share of the blame, and should be met with on the part of the reflecting portion of the community with unequivocal censure and indignation. Enterprises like those of Patch should be discountenanced; they are unproductive of good, and conduce to much positive evil. They are unredeemed even by the display of agility, dexterity, or scientific tact, which secure so much applause to the exertions of rope-dancers and jugglers. They are a mere venture of life against dangers which no prudence can always obviate, no diligent skill overcome. The death of Patch is fairly chargeable, therefore, to the morbid and idle curiosity of the gaping and ignorant multitude. But it is surely no fit subject for sarcasm or ridicule.

Miss Clara Fisher.—This young lady took a farewell benefit at the Park on Monday evening, prior to her departure for New-Orleans, and we dare venture to say that that theatre never contained a more brilliant and fashionable audience. The house was crowded in every part. We have so often stated our opinion of this wonderful girl—so often expressed our admiration in no measured terms of her singularly beautiful and fascinating performances, that any thing we might now add would be little more than a repetition of what has been formerly said. Every engagement raises her higher in the estimation of the public, and discloses some fresh vein of original talent. Perhaps there never was an actress [with such a flow of spirits, so wild, so gay, so full of joyous animation, and at the same time so extremely judicious; in the very hey-day of her glee she never "o'ersteps the modesty of nature," and she can venture to the very bounds of propriety without going an iota beyond them. In truth, the play-going public of this city will miss her sadly; and highly as she was prized when present, she will perhaps be still more so now that she is absent, for as Shakspeare, who has something to suit every occasion, truly says,

"It so falls out
That what we have we prize not to the worth,
While we enjoy it; but being lack'd and lost,
Why then we rack the value—then we find
The virtue that possession would not show us
While it was ours."

Wherever she goes she will bear with her the best wishes of this community, and when she returns, she will be greeted with as sincere and hearty a welcome as ever shook the walls of a theatre.

At the conclusion of the performances, Miss Fisher came forward and delivered the following spirited and appropriate address, written for the occasion by a gentleman of this city. Neat and clever as the lines are, no idea can be formed by those who were not present of the effect imparted to them by the tones, looks, and gestures of this gifted female; a burst of applause followed every pause, and at the close, cheers and deafening acclamations from the whole audience responded to her "farewell, farewell!"

No more the feigned speech, or smile of art;
I come to pay the tribute of the heart:
Of favours past, in artless phrase to tell,
Favours, remembered—need I say how well?
But vain the task—the lips, alas! too weak—
On such a theme, the heart alone should speak.
But two brief years have flown, since first I came
A youthful votary to these halls of fame:
I pressed, unheralded, a foreign stranger—
Your smiles received me in the stranger's land;
Still cheered me onward in my glad career,
Vanquished each doubt, dispelled each fluttering fear;
Till now, a veteran of the mimic field,
With lance in rest, I boldly bid ye yield!
Capricious as the wind my course has been,
In truth, a very Rover of the scene;
The buxkin's pomp—Thalia's mirthful train—
And motley farce, where folly's features reign—
The grave, the gay—the galliard, and the song—
In all, I've mingled with the votive throng;
Caught from your glance, new ardour in the chase—
The meed is here—may, have I won the race?
Let Fancy, for a while, her vigil keep,
And summon "spirits from the vasty deep."
Nay, look not grave, indeed they're harmless sprites,
And not the spectral shades that "walk o' nights."
They rise! in varied form, grotesque—and fair—
I'll paint them for you ere they melt in air.
Yet hold! So fast they throng upon the view,
The task were hard, I'll only sketch a few.
There, passive Lydia breathes her soul-felt passion,
And sighs that sweet romance is out of fashion;
Albina speaks, and nature answers true—
Rovers, beware! her sword shall "run ye through;"
To pity's pleadings, hear ye now respond,
"I cannot find it, 'tis not in the bond."
That visage stern—that voice presaging sorrow
"Saddle white Surrey for the field to-morrow!"
The gay Letitia veils her form of grace—
"One cannot look one's sweetheart in the face."
Away with smiles—the joyous scene is past,
And darkly comes the parting hour at last;
A wand'ring now, o'er southern seas to roam,
My dearest hope, to find as bright a home;
Friendship as warm, as kindly hands as these,
Before such eyes, how can I fail to please?
I go—but when the south-wind's balmy breath
Warms the cold earth, and wakes the flowers from death,
When pilgrim-like, each bird of spring returns,
And the veil'd sun with wonted splendour burns,
Will your bright smiles with nature's re-appear?
Shall I then meet as warm a welcome here?
To part! what sorrows mingle in that word!
The saddest lip hath voiced, or ear hath heard;
Full deeply now, I prove its potent spell,
Breathing in broken speech, farewell—farewell!

Gratitude.—We have been requested, by several of our subscribers, to publish the music of a favourite song, entitled "Gratitude," as sung by Mrs. Austin, in the Caliph of Bagdad. Their wishes shall be complied with, if possible, in our next.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

OLD ENGLISH COMEDIES.

"Comedy is a graceful ornament to the civil order; the Corinthian capital of polished society. Like the mirrors which have been added to the sides of one of our theatres, it reflects the images of grace, of gaiety, and of pleasure double, and completes the perspective of human life."

THE above sentence, it is presumed, was written with reference to the comedies that held possession of the stage in the days of our unenlightened ancestors, some century or century and a half ago; for, if applied to the three and five-act farces which modern manufacturers impudently baptize by the name of "comedies," and which the present generation are well contented to receive as such, instead of a graceful truth, it becomes a piece of caustic irony, from the pointed severity of which neither the public nor the playwrights of the year eighteen hundred and twenty-nine have wherewithal to shield themselves. Without at all canting about "the good old times," it must be conceded, on all hands, that whatever may have been the faults and deficiencies of our ancestors, and however well assured the present self-sufficient race of mortals may feel of their general superiority, they are at present at an immeasurable distance behind them in every department of dramatic literature, but more particularly in comedy. Formerly a comedy was a work of genius—a green leaf added to the literary coronal of the land; it was then composed of sparkling wit and rare invention—of characters rich and racy, yet natural; and of incidents gay and sprightly, yet probable; and was, indeed, a mirror to show "the very age and body of the time, its form and pressure." Now, what is a comedy? Messrs. Morton, Peake, and Poole can best answer the question. "Ay, tell us that and unyoke." It is a thing where the broadest and coarsest extravagancies of farce are jumbled together with the most mawkish and lachrymose sentimentality that ever made "a vashervoman weep"—where the characters are caricatures vilely executed, and the incidents precisely such as could not by any possibility have ever taken place—where the dialogue consists of puns, slang, stray jests, and flowers of rhetoric from the circulating library, with a copious infusion of ordinary slip-slop conversation—where the jokes are all practical, and stumbling over a chair, or drawing out a ragged pocket handkerchief, are among the happiest inventions of the author; and though, at times, a few gleams of humour may shine athwart the gloom, yet wit, who is a little more aristocratical and choice in his company, absents himself altogether. And what is it that makes this farrago of abominations escape the fate decreed against all sinful transgressions? It is stage-effect. To this every thing is sacrificed—this the authors have studied, and this they understand, and hence the secret of their disgraceful success. We look upon George Colman the younger as the last of the genuine English comic writers, and his John Bull, Poor Gentleman, and Heir at Law, as the three last English comedies.

It is not meant, however, to be said, that this and this alone strictly applies to the three gentlemen mentioned above, though any one who will take the trouble of reading their works, (particularly Morton's) will find that a great part, mixed with a few redeeming qualities, may be truly applied to most of their productions. They are mentioned by name because they are the three best of the numerous herd of stage writers of the present day; and Poole, in his Paul Pry, has even given us a glimpse of better things. True, the dialogue in that piece is meagre enough, but there is a good deal of broad humour and no sentiment; the situations are extremely laughable, and the character of the inquisitive Mr. Pry himself very cleverly sketched. It would be well if we had more pieces like this, instead of such plays as "Town and Country," which Kean honoured and brought into notice by personating the mouthing and melancholy hero, and which example many clever actors have since inconsiderately followed.

But, alas! for the dashing gallants and wits that glitter in the pages of Wycherly, Congreve, Vanburgh, and Farquhar. Their day, it would seem, is gone for ever; and what have we got in their place? Look at modern comedy, and in nine cases out of ten you will find a variety of the "Tom and Jerry" species for its hero;—some heedless, spendthrift booby, worthless but not witty enough for a rake; who commits all sorts of follies with impunity through the space of five acts, and then ends by laying his five fingers on his bosom and informing the dramatic personæ in general, and the young lady in white, whose hand he of course receives, in particular, that "though his head may have erred, his heart is still in the right place!" What the deuce have the audience to do with his heart? It is from his head that they expect entertainment, and if they are disappointed in that, what satisfaction to them, after the infliction of his slang and impertinence in the place of genuine wit and spirit, is the information that he intends to reform and live decently and soberly with his wife?

But objections, and in some instances, on good grounds, have been raised to the representation of the older dramatists, on the score of indelicacy; though it is one which might easily be obviated by judicious pruning; and, after all, the gay and polished libertinism of some of the old comedies is not half so indelicate, and not one quarter so disgusting, as the vulgar liberties that are frequently taken with modern would-be fastidious audiences, and which they not only suffer, but chuckle over with evident satisfaction. But the old comedies have got a bad character on this account, and we all know the force of the proverb "give a dog a bad name," &c.

There is too much truth in what a clever writer has said, that "the cant of delicacy has done thrice the injury to the drama that sheer downright fanaticism has ever done; and shallow refinement is ten times more hopelessly inaccessible than the prejudices of the narrowest bigotry." Even George Colman the younger, who ought to have known better, and who in his younger days was by no means fastidious, has joined in the pestilential cry, that has been one great cause of driving the gay and sparkling Thalia from the stage, and substituting a Merry Andrew in her place.

That talented actor Mr. Hilson, who on his benefit night on former occasions has generally brought forward a sterling comedy, has this year, we perceive, fixed upon Vanburgh's admirable one of the "Confederacy;" but we are afraid it will avail him but little. It is, to be sure, one of the best in the language; but what of that? Such things are out of fashion. If he will engage Mr. Sloman, or some other famous buffo to sing "Coal black Rose," or any other precious doggerel, miscalled a comic song, it will no doubt be much more to his pecuniary advantage. We know, to be sure, that variety is the life and soul of dramatic entertainments, and that the bad makes us relish the good so much the better when it comes, the same as a few days of fog renders the clear air and sunshine doubly delicious; but if we keep too long in a theatrical fog, the public taste may become affected, and fall into a consumption from which all after exertions will fail to recover it.

VARIETIES.

FAITH AND GOOD WORKS.—The doctrine of assurance, which of late has become so popular among the valetudinarians in Scotland, whether orthodox or not, is assuredly one of the most comfortable for all fearless and impudent sinners. Last summer, a reverend gentleman who has most successfully expounded this doctrine, and distinguished himself for zeal in proselytising the chance visitants of his parish, happened to get into a keen controversy on the subject of assurance with a ferryman, while crossing one of the lochs near Glasgow. John, the boatman, had a mind of his own on the question, and felt proud to discuss the nice point of faith with his pastor. The latter, with his usual fervour, unfolded his views, and marshalled forth his arguments, all, as the satirist has it, "weel nailed wi' scripture." John found the talk all against him, and tried in vain to thrust in a word—but no; reason followed after reason, illustration clustered about illustration, and quotation thundered after quotation, unceasingly. Despairing of being heard on his native element (they were half across the ferry by this time,) John rested on his oars and let the boat drift a little out of its course. "Pull away, John," cried the minister, "the boat's drifting." "I see that," said John; "but can you tell which of these oars I should pull; for the one I call faith and the other good works?" The pastor smiled; and John, seeing his advantage, followed it up. "Indeed, sir, you may lecture about the virtues of assurance and the worthlessness of works till the sun goes down; but just look at me and my boat, and I'll put the subject in a clearer light than either crooked words or book-learning has ever done. The oar in my right hand I call faith—that in my left I call good works. Now, sir, if I pull with faith alone, the boat goes round and round to one side, but not an inch forward. If I take them both, however, and pull with all my heart and strength, the boat cuts through the water like a steamer, and reaches the other side in a jiffy! Now for the moral and application," quoth John, exultingly. "A man's soul may be likened to this little boat; and before it makes any speed towards its last mooring place, it must have two oars—one of faith, and one of good works; and both must be pulled at the same time. We have seen that if either the one or the other be used singly, the boat may struggle and founder about long enough at the mercy of wind and wave, and yet never make any headway. It may be lost in the trough of the sea of utter destruction; but indeed, sir, it has but a small chance of ever touching the shores of salvation. Does not that knock away the feet from assurance, Mr. Pastor?"

HERCULANEUM AND POMPEII.—The accidental discovery of these two subterranean cities has done more to improve our knowledge of antiquity, or rather of the habits, usages, and manners of the ancients, than could be effected by any other means. The structure of their houses, their furniture, the various implements for domestic purposes, the state of the advancement of the mechanical arts, have been displayed in a manner which has had the effect of almost carrying us into those distant times. Last year an oil mill was found in one of the houses of Pompeii very far superior to any now in use in Italy. It was formed of lava, and consisted of a concave and convex hemisphere fitting into each other, and having rotatory motions in opposite directions. By a neat mechanical contrivance, these two stones were prevented from approaching each other in the first instance so nearly as not to break the stone, but merely to crush the pulp of the olive, so that this fruit oil must be of singular purity. When this has been pressed off, the convex stone could be lowered into the concave, and the whole fruit was broken up together. At Herculanum, a short time since, the residence of a barber was discovered. The shop and its implements were in a wonderful state of preservation: the seats on which the customers were seated, the basins, the stove, and even many pins designed for the head dresses of the Roman ladies!

USE OF LETTERS.—"Learn to read," said Stone the mathematician, "and you will soon know every thing." Stone's father was gardener to the duke of Argyle, who, walking one day in his garden, observed a Latin copy of Newton's Principia lying on the grass, and, thinking it had been brought from his own library, called some one to carry it back to its place. Young Stone, who was then in his eighteenth year, claimed the book as his own. "Yours," replied the duke. "Do you understand geometry, Latin, and Newton?"—"I know a little of them," replied the young man. The duke was surprised; and, having a taste for the sciences, he entered into conversation with the young mathematician. He asked him several questions, and was astonished at the accuracy of his answers. "But how," said the duke, "did you learn all these things?"—Stone replied, "A servant taught me ten years since to read. Does one need to know more than the twenty-four letters, in order to learn every thing else that one wishes?" The duke's curiosity redoubled: he sat down on a bank, and requested a detail of the whole process by which he had become so learned. "I first learned to read," said Stone; "the masons were then at work upon your house. I approached them one day, and observed that the architect used a rule and compasses, and made calculations. I inquired what might be the meaning and use of these things, and I was informed that there was a science called arithmetic. I purchased a book of arithmetic, and I learned it. I was told there was another science called geometry; I bought the necessary books, and learned geometry. By reading, I found there were good books in these two sciences in Latin; I bought a dictionary, and learned Latin. I understood, also, that there were good books of the same kind in French: I bought a dictionary, and learned French. And this, my lord, is what I have done."

A ROMANTIC PASSION FOR DANGER.—Saussure gives the same account of the chamois-hunters of the Alps, as Kotzebue does of those of the Tyrol. The pursuit is exceedingly dangerous and by no means lucrative, but altogether fascinating. A young man, newly married to a charming wife, said to Saussure, "my grandfather, and also my father, were killed in the chase; and so firmly persuaded am I that I shall end my life in the same manner, that this hunting-sack, which I always carry with me, I call my winding-sheet, because I do not expect ever to have any other; and yet, sir, even if you should offer to give me a fortune on condition of my abandonment of the chase, I would at once reject it."

STANZAS.

SMILE on! that young lip well may smile, those eyes may well look bright,
And not a passing cloud arise to dim their sunny light.
And well the look of happiness may those fair features wear,
Undimmed by time, untouched by grief, and all unmarked by care;

Thy life is gliding calmly on, a clear untroubled stream,
Reflecting but the lights of heaven, that o'er it brightly beam,
Or flowers of earth that bend to gaze upon its tranquil tide,
Which thus in light and loveliness securely on doth glide.

Too bright thy lot, too blue thy sky: with flowers too passing fair
Thy path is strewn; too much of bloom and radiance is there;
For should that radiance fade away, the bloom desert thy path,
How couldst thou bear the sudden blight, how brook the tempest's wrath!

But yet methinks that I can read within thy sparkling eye,
In thy bright smile, and lofty brow an omen proud and high,
Which doth of future triumph tell, a promise of success,
In all the various paths of life which yet thy feet may press.

'Tis a vain fancy! yet I love to deem that thou art one Whom, favoured both of heaven and earth, life ne'er will frown upon;
Methinks the ill that may be thine, my heart would rather bear,
Than one so formed for all its joys, its griefs should ever share. THYRA.

THANKSGIVING.

The harvest which God thus gave to this pious people, caused them to set apart another day of solemn thanksgiving to the glorious hearer of prayers!—Mather's Magnalia.

Choirs of the glad and free,
Wake your high harps of praise!
Ring out the notes of jubilee,
Your noblest psalms raise!
Dwellers of mountain steep,
Beneath the pine at rest,
And ye in teeming vales that sleep
Pillow'd on plenty's breast,
Lift the warm thanks of grateful hearts
To Him who every perfect gift imparts.

Hail to the pilgrims' day
Of bright and happy dawn!
And thou, proud orb of cheering ray,
Move in thy glory on.
Yet still in all thy course sublime
Above earth's peopled bowers,
Thou shalt not mark a happier clime
Nor happier hearts than ours.

Look—not a foe's form
Midst freedom's host appears;
Hark—not a note of battle's storm
Breaks on our listening ears:
Save that at times above the swells
Of ocean's sighing waves,
A deep and solemn murmur tells
Of Europe's struggling slaves,
Where God's own image, fashioned free,
Is bowed by rank's vain pageantry.

Here ignorance, of owl sight,
To her dark haunts is awed,
As science from her spheres of light
Darts her free beams abroad;
While genius at her bidding bends
His influence proud and high,
And through his broad and burning lens
Pours them on every eye;
From the dim orb of waning years
To childhood laughing through its tears.

Here, as an angel bright and free,
Religion walks abroad,
And fears no monarch's stern decree,
Thus shalt thou worship God:
But in her own appointed way,
And conscious-chosen time,
Whether at rise or shut of day,
At week or Sabbath chime.
Whene'er devotion's spirit calls,
She bends the humble knee
Low in the temple's marbled walls,
Or 'neath the green-wood tree.

Joy is o'er all our land,
The fruited glade and elope,
Mellowed by summer's radiant hand,
Have filled the autumn cup:
While commerce from her treasured keels
Presents her orient hoard,
And harvests of a thousand hills
Crown the o'erflowing board!

Then wake your noblest strains,
Choirs of the glad and free!
Go up unto your hallowed fanes
On this high jubilee:

Praise Him who led the pilgrim bark,
With its men of holy worth,
Through the stormy deep, a second ark,
With life for a second earth.
Yea, praise ye Him who bounteously
Gave you this goodly clime,
Sealed by your fathers' blood, to be
Yours through all coming time;
Praise him—the light, the life, the love
That guides, sustains, and woos all hearts above!
PROTEUS.

TO A BRIDE.

To wish thee bliss in courteous phrase,
Be theirs who love thee less;
For fervent thoughts and anxious hopes
The lips may not express.

'Twere vain to breathe the hacknied prayer,
That thornless wreaths should twine
Thy brow, or joy's full sparkling cup,
As now, be ever thine.

Deem not the lay too sad, young bride,
For Hymen's first-born hours;
Dregs will be in the cup, and thorns
Inwoven with the flowers.

Exemption from the general doom,
I dare not ask for thee;
But should thy path o'er sunny hill,
Or through dim valley be,

Thy mother's spirit be thy guide!
Her faith thy cherished guest.
Heaven can no richer boon confer,
To live—to die so blest.

POPULAR TALES.

A QUARTER OF AN HOUR TOO SOON.

BY HORACE SMITH.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER I.

"If I have ever done anything worth talking of in the world, it was by being always a quarter of an hour before my time." So said Nelson. But he was born to be a great man: and there is nothing more different than the same maxim applied to a great man and a little one. I have been ruined through life by being always a quarter of an hour before my time. For the comfort of the lazy, the only true philosophers after all, let me tell my brief history.

My father was a captain in the guards, and just as a militaire should be, a gay, dashing, bustling fellow; utterly ruined at five and twenty; handsome enough to make him a terror with rich old men with flirting only daughters; adroit enough to be on the books of a whole synagogue; and desperate enough to marry, when he could do nothing else in the wide world.

Few men have their fortunes made by the sons of Israel; but my father was one of the few. At Bristol he was seized for some tardiness of finance by a rabbi. The Jew, to save the expense of a double establishment, had brought his daughter with him from London. Jessica saw the captain, and was smitten. She was heiress to seventy years of usury; and the captain fell prodigiously in love. The flintiness of the man of Israel was worn away by six months' tears and teasing; and Jessica and my father were at the height of happiness.

My ill luck began as early as it could, for it began the moment I was born.

I pass over the innumerable occasions on which I felt the calamity of taking time by the forelock during my first dozen years, remarking that at school I was invariably among the first martyrs to that sage system by which the birch is made a substitute for brains, and the laws of prosody and clean hands are written, like those of Draco, in blood. I discovered also that my family conceived that I and the holidays were much too ready in our return; that the schoolmaster might have kept me a week or a fortnight more of the vacation with all their soul; and that my demands on my father for money were looked on as prompt beyond all chronology; indeed, it appeared that he would have had no great objection if time, on this point, had stood still for life.

But school must be left at last; and my leaving it was destined to be a matter of eclat. A horse-race, which agitated all the grown fools of the country for a month before, was too interesting an affair not to resound within the walls of our house of bondage. I was determined to be present, coute qu'il coute. The attempt was treason to the majesty of discipline. But when did conspiracy want tempters? If, while I was without the sinews of war, and reduced to my last credit, (for the reduction to the last shilling had occurred on the day of my return) I persevered, who shall suppose that my resolution quailed, when, by the evening's post, within exactly twelve hours of the starting, I received an enclosure of five pounds for my own expenditure, from the liberal hands of my father, and five times the sum for my master, from the punctual hands of my mother?

Like every hero and heroine, I had a confidant, and, of course, as unlike myself as the antipodes—a quiet, honest, good-humoured fellow, a sort of human feather-bed or footstool, the natural resting-place of the fiery, the weary, or the idle. Jack Dulman was the scorn and friend of every soul among us; a two-legged tortoise, whose back would bear any weight, whether of obligations or injuries, and whom nothing short of the general conflagration could stir out of his pace, mental or bodily. To Jack I communicated my secret, and implored him to take the opportunity of seeing the world. We pledged our faiths, and both went to bed, but not both to sleep. I sprang at five from a feverish pillow, on which I had counted every ticking of the house clock, till I could have told the seconds by instinct. The morn was fresh and fair, the sun in his glory, the wind "did gently kiss the trees," sucking music and perfume out of the woodbines and the hawthorns, as far as the eye could reach from my attic: and among the inferior melodies of birds and milk-maids, I caught the neigh of steeds, caparisoning for the day of fame. I quivered with expectation; not the most expert country gentleman that ever jockeyed his bosom friend, nor the most match-hunting matron that ever felt herself encumbered with daughters, looked forward with a more eager anticipation of what the day was to produce. I flew to Jack's pillow, but sleep sat upon him with a twenty-parson power. He was buried, welded in torpor. I might as well have tried to animate a stone. In the vexation of my soul I gave him a kick, which, however, never reached his consciousness; and, expressing my opinion in language more vigorous than select, bounded down stairs, and was gone like a falcon on the wing.

Panting, covered with dust, and buoyant with delight, I reached the valley, in whose centre the hopes and fears of the whole county were centered. All was congratulation and smiles among the fair dames, mounted on every thing that could bear the weight of country-fet beauty; the gentlemen were in their best costume and their best bows; and, until the bell at the starting-post rang, rustic eloquence was in its full flower. But the bell shook the blossoms prodigiously; and the squire's bay filly, and my lord's gray mare, left the ladies desolate in a moment. I ran through whole cargoes of living lillies and carnations, ranged upon carriage-tops and stand-house shelves, and wasting their profitless sweetness on each other. But my time for being a florist was not yet come; and, hurrying with the rest, I was engulfed in an eddy of gentlemen of the first weight within a circle of fifty miles; was advised by a friend of my father's, a man of ten thousand a year, to bet on a foundered horse; lost my bet almost before I had pronounced the fatal words; and saw my five pounds pass into the hands of my adviser. The blow staggered me a little; I remonstrated, was hustled out of the ring by half a dozen of my honourable friend's grooms; and lost blood, honour, and a pocket-handkerchief.

But now, if I had begun through frolic, I persevered through revenge; and never hard-pressed general rejoiced more at the sight of succours than I, when my friend Jack's lazy length loomed into the field. I instantly demanded a loan: he pondered; but while in the nervous agitation of one who waits his sentence from a judge, I was waiting for the slow motion of his mind, and feeling every pocket for the hopeless discovery of the means of fortune and revenge together, I struck upon the five fivepound notes remitted for my quarter's tutorship.

I have had some conscience at different periods of my life. But it was not then; my blood was up; I ran to the ring.

betted my whole possession against my honourable friend's filly, and rejoiced in his prospective downfall. The bell rang; off went the steeds; shouts, dust, riot, trampling, shrieks, clapping of hands, and waving of handkerchiefs, followed; and I reached the winning-post just in time to see my honourable friend advance towards me with a smile and a demand of my five and twenty pounds. I surrendered it as if it were wrung from my soul.

"Now, let me give you a piece of advice," said he. "Never be in a hurry to wager upon the wrong horse again. A quarter of an hour's thinking about the matter would have saved you your five and twenty pounds, which I now take from your father's son, merely that you may remember his friend's advice."

I could have slain my mentor on the spot; but he was six feet high, and I felt too pleasant a novelty in advice not followed by flagellation, to encourage him to break the charm.

I was homeward plodding my weary way, in a world "left to silence and to me," when I overtook Jack. He was whistling; the phenomenon excited my curiosity. It turned out that he had won five and twenty pounds; nay, the very notes that had so calamitously assisted my honourable adviser's maxims!

"When you met me," said Jack, "I had just five shillings, which I intended to bet on the same horse with you. But the day and the dust sent me to sleep; and I awoke only soon enough to see the last half mile. A fellow, riding about to pick up bets, took my five shillings among the rest; and the seed produced the crop you see."

But Jack was not a bad fellow, after all. I gave him the history of my wager, and of my perturbations about the debt to the pedagogue. He offered to give me the money back, but I insisted on only borrowing it; and I reckon it among the white spots of my life, that the five and twenty pounds were discharged at no deeper a date than half a dozen years.

But the truancy of the morning decided my fate. The letter containing the story of the race was answered by an order for my immediate return. Never was rapture equal to mine. But what is human life? I had scarcely packed up my meagre valise, when the tidings of my father's death broke up all my plans. He loved hunting and play, and was unlucky in both. By the latter, and the help, of course, of an old and intimate friend, he reduced the last acre of his estate to a smoothness that would have been incredible to an American farmer. Not a trunk, not a twig, was left upon its surface; and the land rapidly went the same road with the produce. With the aid of a hunter, for which he had "promised to pay" two hundred and fifty guineas within the week, he fractured his neck, and died lamented by the jockey club, the jews, and the insurance-offices.

I loved my father, for he was a man after my own heart—goodnatured, showy, and spoiled. I loved not my mother, and the feeling was, of course, reciprocal; for the spirit of Duke's place was in her soul. She had abjured her tribe, but she had no darker conception of evil than the waste of money; and with her the prodigal son would have had, instead of the fatted calf, a mittimus from the next bench of justices.

I determined on embracing my father's profession, and gracefully wrote a long letter for her leave. It was accorded by return of post. I came up to town, and begged for the honour of a final interview. It was granted, and the hour named, half past twelve. I was a boy, giddy and careless enough, but I was not a brute. I had something of a heart beating within me; and it seldom beat quicker than when I set out to visit the mother whom, for some years, I had not seen, and whom, for the rest of my life, I might never see again. I grew impatient; I could neither sit nor stand; so I sallied out, and found myself at the door of her handsome house in Hanover-square.

The hour tolled twelve; I wandered with my eye on St. George's clock. My blood alternately glowed and chilled, till I began to think I must have loved this sternest of all the Jessicas, without having ever known it before. I was passing the door for the fortieth time, when a footman, in superb mourning, threw it open, for the indulgence of displaying his person to a passing group of fashionable females. I bounded up the steps, and, to the infinite astonishment of John, rushed to the drawing-room. The door was open, but the room a solitude. I heard voices in the next, opened the door, and saw my mamma, in all the pomp of widowhood, sitting at a boudoir table, beside a moustached fellow, about my own age, who was tenderly encircling her matron waist with one languid arm.

The pair started up on my entrance. The man of moustaches took the matter with supreme tranquillity, plucked a bouquet from the mantel-piece, and walked about the room consoling his senses with its perfume. But the lady was indignant; and when I endeavoured to explain the mal-apropos by producing her own note, she read it with a fiery glance, and turning on me, said,

"Always the same, sir, I perceive; always disobedient. I ordered you to be here at half past twelve."

She held up a watch sparkling with gems, and convinced me that I had anticipated her time by full fifteen minutes. Fatal fifteen minutes! They cost me twenty thousand pounds and a mamma; for she married the man of moustaches before the month was out; and, on the lapse of my brother's fortune, by the death of that pampered boy, flung it into her young husband's kid glove.

My premature entrance was the decisive blow. My mother had been a beauty, and was still more than the beau resté. She had always loved admiration, and that taste had not suffered any very remarkable decay; but she had always loved money, and that passion retained its supremacy without a jot of abatement. In short, she would have had as much adoration as possible, as long as possible, and with unlimited dominion over her own exchequer. The result would have been to flirt much, and marry never; or, at worst, only when she could flirt no more. But my unlucky presence tore through this exquisite web of Penelope. A guardsman, seen in the attitude of an acknowledged lover, must be intended for a husband; or must bring the idle world's idlest tongue upon her. A quarter of an hour later would have seen him coolly dismissed to tie his cravat at the glass of his solitary coffee-house, and meditate his fruitless visits for the season. As I had witnessed the courtship, I was to be honoured by the opportunity of seeing the marriage. And within ten days, the blooming bride was driving full gallop to the lakes, with the man of moustaches for her compagnon de voyage.

I was chagrined at the whole affair, and read Hamlet with an additional respect for Shakespeare's knowledge of woman-kind; but I was not prepared to act the part of the princely misanthrope; and the sight of my name two days after in the Gazette, as ensign in a regiment under orders for the Peninsula, made me fling sorrow to the winds. I surveyed my uniform in the mirror, practised the salute which I was yet to perform at some royal review at the head of my regiment, wiped all tears from my eyes, and was in Portsmouth as soon as the mail could carry me.

AN INDIAN MEMOIR.

METAMORA.

THIS prize tragedy, written by John Augustus Stone, for which the sum of five hundred dollars was paid, will be offered to the public, for the first time, on Tuesday next. It is needless to remind our readers that the distinguished tragedian, Mr. Forrest, is to sustain the hero and principal character of the piece. During a long intimacy with theatrical events, we have never known to exist so great an excitement in the minds of a community as now prevails in regard to Metamora. Subject, bard, actor, are all our own; and knowing as we do the talents of the author, the skill and genius of the histrione, the liberal views of Mr. Simpson, the force of the corps dramatique, and the industry and taste of the stage director, we look forward to the production of this piece as the commencement of an era highly favourable to the advancement of our national dramatic literature. Mr. Stone has evinced his research and good taste in the choice of the hero of his play, and, as will be seen, has slightly altered the name, probably from a regard to the euphony. Metamocet, the Wampanoag chief, called by the English King Philip, possessed virtues too rare to remain for ever buried in oblivion. Of this our countryman Washington Irving appears to have been deeply sensible, and we have great pleasure in presenting our readers the following article from his pen. We feel confident it will be read at this time with peculiar interest.

PHILIP OF POKANOKET.

[The following anecdotes, illustrative of Indian character, are gathered from various sources, that have every appearance of being authentic. It was thought needless to encumber the text with references.]

It is to be regretted that those early writers, who treated of the discovery and settlement of our country, have not given us more frequent and candid accounts of the remarkable characters that flourished in savage life. The scanty anecdotes that have reached us are full of peculiarity and interest; they furnish us with nearer glimpses of human nature, and show what man is, in a comparatively primitive state, and what he owes to civilization.

In civilized life, where the happiness and almost existence of man depends so much upon public opinion, he is for ever acting a part. The bold and peculiar traits of native character are refined away, or softened down by the levelling influence of what is termed good breeding, and he practises so many amiable deceptions, and assumes so many generous sentiments, for the purposes of popularity, that it is difficult to distinguish his real character from that which is acquired or affected. The Indian, on the contrary, free from the restraints and refinements of polished life, and living, in a great degree, solitary and independent, obeys the impulses of his inclination, or the dictates of his individual judgment, and thus the attributes of his nature, being freely indulged, grow signally great and striking. Society is like an artificial lawn, where every roughness is smoothed, every bramble eradicated, and the eye is delighted by the smiling verdure of a velvet surface: he, however, who would study nature in its wildness and variety, must plunge into the forest, must explore the glen, must stem the torrent, and dare the precipice.

These reflections arose on casually looking through a volume of early provincial history, wherein are recorded, with great bitterness, the outrages of the Indians, and their wars with the settlers of New-England. It is painful to perceive, even from those partial narratives, how the footsteps of civilization in this country may be traced in the blood of the original inhabitants; how easily the colonists were moved to hostility by the lust of conquest; how merciless and exterminating was their warfare. The imagination shrinks at the idea, how many intellectual beings were hunted from the earth; how many brave and noble hearts, of nature's sterling coinage, were broken down and trampled in the dust.

Such was the fate of Philip of Pokanoket, an Indian warrior, whose name was once a terror throughout Massachusetts and Connecticut. He was the most distinguished of a number of contemporary sachems, who reigned over the Pequods, the Narragansets, the Wampanoags, and the other eastern tribes, at the time of the first settlement of New England—a band of native, untaught heroes, who made the most generous struggle of which human nature is capable; fighting to the last gasp for the deliverance of their country, without a hope of victory or a thought of renown; worthy of an age of poetry, and fit subjects for local story and romantic fiction, they have left scarcely any authentic traces on the page of history, but stalk, like gigantic shadows, in the dim twilight of tradition.

When the pilgrims, as they are termed, first took refuge on the shores of the new world from the persecutions of the old, they found themselves in the most gloomy and helpless situation. Few in number, and that number rapidly perishing away by sickness and hardships; surrounded by a howling wilderness and savage tribes; exposed to the rigours of an almost arctic winter, and the vicissitudes of an ever shifting climate; their hearts were filled with the most gloomy forebodings, and nothing preserved them from sinking into utter despondency, but the strong excitement of religious enthusiasm. In this forlorn situation, they received from Massasoit, chief sagamore of the Wampanoags, the cheering rites of primitive hospitality. This powerful prince, who reigned over a great extent of country, came early in the spring, with a small retinue, to the new settlement at Plymouth; instead of taking advantage of the scanty numbers of the strangers, and expelling them from his territories, into which they had intruded, he entered into a solemn league of peace and amity, sold them a portion of the soil, and promised to secure to them the good will of his savage allies. The good old sachem died in peace, and was happily gathered to his fathers before sorrow came upon his tribe—his children remained behind to experience the gratitude of white men.

The successor of Alexander was Metamocet, or King Philip, as he was called by the settlers, on account of his lofty spirit and ambitious temper. The well known energy and enterprise of his character made him an object of great jealousy and apprehension, and he was accused of always cherishing a secret and implacable hostility towards the English. An uncultivated savage is never a nice inquirer into the refinements of law, by which an injury may be legally inflicted. Leading facts are all by which he judges, and it was enough for Philip to know, that before the intrusion of the Europeans his countrymen were lords of the soil, and that now they were becoming vagabonds in the land of their fathers.

But whatever may have been his feelings of general hostility, and his particular indignation at the treatment of his brother, he suppressed them for the present, renewed the contract with the settlers, and resided peaceably for many years at Pokanoket, or, as it was called by the English, Mount Hope,* the ancient seat of dominion of his tribe. Suspicions, however, which were at first but vague and indefinite, began to acquire form and substance, and he was at length charged with attempting to instigate the various tribes of the east to rise at once and make a common effort to throw off the yoke of their oppressors.

The only positive evidence on record against Philip is the accusation of one Sausaman, a renegade Indian, whose natural cunning had been heightened by a partial education which he had received among the settlers. He had two or three times changed his faith and his allegiance, with a facility that shows great looseness of principle, and, after having acted as Philip's confidential secretary and counsellor, and enjoyed his bounty and protection, he deserted him when he found the glooms of adversity beginning to lower around him, went over to the whites, and, in order to gain favour, turned against his former benefactor, and charged him with plotting against their safety. The treacherous informer, was shortly after found murdered in a pond, having fallen a victim to the vengeance of his tribe. Three Indians, one of whom was a friend and counsellor of Philip, were apprehended and tried, and, on the testimony of one questionable witness, were condemned and executed as his murderers.

This treatment of his subjects, and ignominious punishment of his friend, outraged the pride and exasperated the passions of Philip. The fate of his insulted and broken-hearted brother still rankled in his mind, and he recollected the tragical end of Miantonimo, a great sachem of the Narragansets, who, after manfully facing his accusers before a tribunal of the colonists, acquitting himself of an alleged conspiracy, and receiving assurances of their amity, had been perfidiously despatched at their instigation. Philip, therefore, gathered his fighting men around him; persuaded all strangers that he could to join his standard; sent the women and children to the Narragansets for safety, and wherever he appeared was continually surrounded by armed warriors.

The nature of the contest that ensued with Philip was such as generally marks the warfare between civilized men and savages. On the part of the whites it was conducted with superior skill and success, but with wastefulness of the blood, and a disregard of the natural rights of their antagonists: on the part of the Indians it was waged with the desperation of men fearless of death, and who had nothing to expect from peace, but humiliation, dependence, and decay.

The events of this war are minutely transmitted to us by a clergyman of the time; who dwells with horror and indignation on every hostile act of the Indians, however justifiable, while he mentions with applause the most sanguinary atrocities of the whites. Philip is reviled as a murderer and a traitor, without considering that he was a true-born prince, gallantly fighting at the head of his subjects to avenge the wrongs of his family, to retrieve the tottering power of his line, and to deliver his native land from the oppressions of usurping strangers.

The project of a wide and simultaneous revolt, if such had really been formed, was worthy a capacious mind; and had it not been prematurely discovered, might have been overwhelming in its consequences. The war that actually broke out was but a war of detail; a mere succession of massacres. Still it sets forth the military skill and prowess of Philip; and wherever in the prejudiced and passionate narrations that have been given of it, we can reach at simple facts, we find him displaying a vigorous genius, a fertility in expedients, and an unconquerable resolution, that command our sympathy and applause.

Driven from his paternal domains at Mount Hope, compelled to take refuge in the depths of forests, or the glooms and thickets of swamps, and frequently surrounded by the enemy, yet he repeatedly found means to evade their toils, and suddenly emerging with his forces, carried havoc and dismay into the settlements. At one time he was driven, with a band of followers, into the great swamp of Pocasset Neck, where the English forces did not dare to pursue him, fearing to venture into these dark and frightful recesses, where they might perish in fens and miry pits, or be shot down by lurking foes: they, therefore invested the entrance to the neck, and began to build a fort, with the intention of starving out the foe; but Philip and his companions, leaving the women and children behind, wafted themselves on a raft over an arm of the sea, in the dead of night, and escaped away to the westward, kindling the flames of war among the tribes of Massachusetts and the Nipmuck country, and threatening the colony of Connecticut.

One of the most faithful friends that Philip had in the time of his adversity, was Canonchet, chief sachem of all the Narragansets. He was the son and heir of Miantonimo, the great sachem, who had been put to death by the perfidious instigations of the English: "he was the heir," says the old chronicler, "of all his father's pride and insolence, as well as of his malice towards the English:"—he certainly was the heir of his insults and injuries, and the legitimate avenger of his murder. Though he had forborne to take an active part in this hopeless war, yet he received Philip and his shattered forces with open arms; and gave him the most generous countenance and support. This at once drew on him the hostility of the English; and it was determined to strike a signal blow that should involve both the sachems in a common ruin. A great force was, therefore, gathered together from Massachusetts, Plymouth, and Connecticut, and sent into the Narraganset country, in the depth of winter, when the swamps, being frozen and leafless, no longer afforded impenetrable fortresses to the Indians.

Apprehensive of attack, Canonchet had sheltered the greater part of his stores, together with the old, the infirm, the women and children of his tribe, in a strong fortress, where he and Philip had likewise drawn up the flower of their forces. This fortress, deemed by the Indians impregnable, was situated upon a rising mound, or kind of island, of five or six acres, in the middle of a swamp, constructed with a judgment and skill vastly superior to the usual fortifications of the Indians; and indicative of the martial genius of these two chieftains.

Guided by a renegade Indian, the English penetrated, through December snows, to this strong hold, and came upon the garrison by surprise. The fight was fierce and tumultuous. The assailants were repulsed in their first attack; several of their bravest officers were shot down in the act of storming the fortress sword in hand. The assault was renewed with greater success; a lodgment was effected; the Indians were driven from one hold to another; they disputed their ground inch by inch, fighting with the fury of despair; most of their veterans were cut to pieces, and, after a long and bloody battle, Philip and Canonchet, with a handful of surviving warriors, retreated from the fort and plunged into the depths of the surrounding forest. The victors set fire to the wigwams and the fort; the whole was soon in a blaze; many of the old men, the women, and the children, perished in the flames. This last inhuman outrage overcame even the stoicism of the savage. The neighbouring woods resounded with the yells of rage and despair, uttered by the fugitive warriors, as they beheld, with anguish of heart, the desolations of their dwellings, and heard the agonizing cries of their wives and offspring. "The burning of the wigwams," says a contemporary writer, "the shrieks and cries of the women and children, and the yelling of the warriors, exhibited a most horrible and affecting scene, so that it greatly moved some of the soldiers." The same writer cautiously adds, "They were in much doubt then, and afterwards seriously inquired, whether burning their enemies alive could be consistent with humanity."

The defeat at the Narraganset fortress, and the death of Canonchet, were fatal blows to the fortunes of King Philip. He made an ineffectual attempt to raise a head of war, by stirring up the Mohawks to take up arms; but though possessed of the native talents of a statesman, his arts were counteracted by the superior arts of his enlightened enemies, and the terror of their warlike skill began to subdue the resolution of the neighbouring tribes. The unfortunate chieftain saw himself daily stripped of power, and his ranks rapidly thinning around him. Some were suborned by the whites; others fell victims to hunger and fatigue, and to the frequent attacks by which they were harassed. His treasures were captured; his chosen friends were swept away from before his eyes; his uncle was shot down by his side; his sister was carried into captivity; and in one of his narrow escapes he was compelled to leave his beloved wife and only son to the mercy of the enemy. "His ruin," says the historian, "being thus gradually carried on, his misery was not prevented, but augmented thereby; being himself made acquainted with the sense and experimental feeling of the captivity of his children, loss of friends, slaughter of his subjects, bereavement of all family relations, and being stripped of all outward comforts, before his own life should be taken away."

To fill up the measure of his misfortunes, his own followers began to plot against his life, that by sacrificing him they might purchase dishonourable safety.

However Philip had borne up against the complicated miseries and misfortunes that surrounded him, the treachery of his followers seemed to wring his heart, and reduce him to despondency. It is said "he never rejoiced afterwards, nor had success in any of his designs." The spring of hope was broken—the ardour of enterprise was extinguished—he looked around, and all was danger and darkness; "there was no eye to pity, nor any arm that could bring deliverance." With a scanty band of followers, who still remained true to his desperate fortunes, the unhappy Philip wandered back to the vicinity of Mount Hope, the ancient dwelling of his fathers. Here he lurked about, like a spectre, among the desolated scenes of former power and prosperity, now bereft of home, of family, and friend. There needs no better picture of his destitute and piteous situation than that furnished by the homely pen of the chronicler, who is unwarily enlisting the feelings of the reader in favour of the hapless warrior whom he reviles. "Philip," he says, "like a savage wild beast, having been hunted by the English forces through the woods above a hundred miles backward and forward, at last was driven to his own den upon Mount Hope, where he retired with a few of his best friends, into a swamp, which proved but a prison to keep him fast till the messengers of death came by divine permission to execute vengeance upon him."

Even in this last refuge of desperation and despair a sullen grandeur seems to gather round his memory. We picture him to ourselves seated among his care-worn followers, brooding in silence over his blasted fortunes, and acquiring a savage sublimity from the wildness and dreariness of his lurking place. Defeated, but not dismayed—crushed to the earth, but not humiliated—he seemed to grow more haughty beneath disaster, and to receive a fierce satisfaction in draining the last dregs of bitterness. Little minds are tamed and subdued by misfortune; but great minds rise above it. The very idea of submission awakened the fury of Philip, and he even smote to death one of his followers, who proposed an expedient of peace. The brother of the victim made his escape, and in revenge betrayed the retreat of his chieftain. A body of white men and Indians were immediately despatched to the swamp, where Philip lay crouched, glaring with fury and despair. Before he was aware of their approach, they had begun to surround him. In a little while he saw five of his trustiest followers laid dead at his feet; all resistance was vain; he rushed forth from his covert, and made a headlong attempt at escape, but was shot through the heart by a renegade Indian of his own nation.

Such is the scanty story of the brave, but unfortunate King Philip; persecuted while living, slandered and dishonoured when dead. If, however, we consider even the prejudiced anecdotes furnished us by his enemies, we may perceive in them traces of amiable and lofty character, sufficient to awaken sympathy for his fate, and respect for his memory. We find amid all the harassing cares and ferocious passions of constant warfare, he was alive to the softer feelings of conjugal love and paternal tenderness, and to the generous sentiment of friendship. The captivity of his "beloved wife and only son" are mentioned with exultation, as causing him poignant misery; the death of any near friend is triumphantly recorded as a new blow on his sensibilities; but the treachery and desertion of many of his followers, in whose affections he had confided, is said to have desolated his heart, and bereaved him of all further comfort. He was a patriot attached to his native soil—a prince true to his subjects, and indignant of their wrongs—a soldier, daring in battle, firm in adversity, patient of fatigue, of hunger, of every variety of bodily suffering, and ready to perish in the cause he had espoused. Proud of heart, and with an untameable love of natural liberty, he preferred to enjoy it among the beasts of the forests, or in the dismal and furnished recesses of swamps and morasses, rather than bow his haughty spirit to submission, and live dependent and despised in the ease and luxury of the settlements. With heroic qualities, and bold achievements, that would have graced a civilized warrior, and rendered him the theme of the poet and the historian, he lived a wanderer and a fugitive in his native land, and went down, like a foundering bark, amid darkness and tempest—without an eye to weep his fall, or a friendly hand to record his struggle.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES—NUMBER VIII.

"Come in," said I, as some one knocked at my door. A stranger entered, and stood gazing at me. By degrees I read in his form something more and more familiar, until at length rising, I reached out my hand, which was promptly and cordially grasped in his.

"What, Charles, my boy," exclaimed I, with such a hearty and continued shake as friends give after years of separation. "How are you? In the name of the seven wonders, where do you come from?"

"How are you, my dear fellow?" said he. "I am heartily glad to see you."

"Draw up a chair, Charles," said I, "and sit down. As I live, I did not know you."

When I last saw him he was a handsome boy. His complexion was fair almost to effeminacy; around his mouth a girlish sweetness often predominated over the firmer character of manliness, and his sunny face beamed with the brightness of unshadowed hope and pleasure. Now his face was browned, apparently by exposure to the sun, and his slender form had assumed the athletic shape of vigorous manhood. The lips firmly set together, told of courage, judgment, and habitual command over himself; and the well marked eye-brows and unshrinking eyes, impressed you with an idea that he who rested them upon you, though noble, generous, and formed for tenderness and feeling, could be stern enough when occasion required.

A brief observation of his still handsome features informed me of these changes, and I involuntarily exclaimed,

"Bless my soul, Charles, how you have altered!"

"Altered, yes, I may well be," he replied. "Since I saw you last I have been round the world. Labour, storm, and perchance trouble, have been at work upon me; and here I am, in the scene of our old follies and pleasures, after an absence of six years, standing like one in a dream in my native city."

"Well," said I, "you of course will sing the old song of changes in every thing around."

"Changes," said he, "I hardly can trace my way through your town. Every thing seems new; new streets, new buildings, and new faces. I met Harry L.—I am sure it was he—a few moments ago. You know what a little sickly creature he was. I think now he is six feet, and wears a pair of whiskers like a Turk. I was too much amazed to address him, and he passed without speaking. And you too are altered; your face is thinner, your features larger; you have grown tall and thoughtful. Oh, this old busy Time! every where I see the traces of his passage."

"And your return," said I, "will be a queer mixture of merry and melancholy interest. How long have you been in town?"

"I reached here this very morning. Have seen only a few of my friends. Our own family are broken up. You remember my father.—The green sod is on him now."

He paused—his lips were pressed rather more closely, and I thought his eyes glistened; but I looked away from his face. There is something sacred in such grief: and he went on.

"What has become of all our old friends?"

"Dead—or married—or gone off—and scattered over the globe—a few are here."

"Where's William B. my old rival? Do you remember what a tremendous battle we fought on Richmond hill, and how I knocked him down head first into the bank of sand? I've laughed at that many a time."

"William's married—and has a little William," said I, "who bids fair to be able to pay you his father's debt."

"And what's become of D.? I loved that fellow with my whole soul. He was formed for greatness and virtue—where is he?"

"In his grave," said I. "He died three years ago."

"Charles D. dead. I swear when we parted—something whispered me it was for ever. His eyes were wet too; he wrung my hand—and—dear Charles—well, I have heard people say they regretted that as we advanced in life the fine edge of early feeling wore off, and our hearts grew hard—for my part, I thank heaven for it; for if it were otherwise, I should for ever be plunged in sadness. Well, let it pass—and Frank M. is he dead?"

"No, he has grown up into a proper rascal."

"He never was much better, I think," said Charles.

"I always hated that fellow," said I, "with his ill-natured scowl and saucy answers. He is here, however, practising as a physician, poor as he deserves to be; and I have troubled myself little about his private affairs. I suppose he lives by his wits, and what he wants in industry, he makes up by cheating."

"A shrewd knave, I'll warrant," said Charles; "but I almost forgot Edward N. the gay, generous, noble Ned."

"Edward N." said I, "continues to be my bosom friend, and is as witty, lively, and engaging as ever. I love him just as I hate the other. They are each other's antipodes. I would have Frank driven out of this society, of which Ned will prove the ornament and the blessing."

Our conversation flowed on from one subject to another, winding in among all the pleasant recesses of past years, to which the mist of time lends so strange an interest and beauty, when, to my speechless amazement, his form and features underwent a singular transformation. His figure assumed a sudden grace and perfection; his hair flowed down in chestnut ringlets; his eyes pierced me with increasing sweetness and lustre. There was light about his head, and I perceived I had been all the while talking to the Little Genius.

"Oh, ho," said he, "sir student. What, you knew me not? Your friend Charles, is tossing upon the blue waves thousands of miles off, and it is me whom you have been edifying with your sage remarks; but take a peep into the mirror, good youth, and tell me what you see."

"Why," said I, "there is Ned N. the very creature he was ten years ago. He hath the boy's form and aspect; and, as I live, there is the old school, and the very companions of my early sports. Yes, every thing is as it was; and Ned utters the well remembered jokes, and plays the wanton and wild caprices for which of old he was famed. And there too is Frank, gloomy, unsociable, and repulsive. He repels the advances of his mates. Ned offers him his hand. He turns away—the rude, unfeeling rascal. Ned's friend, Pierre, has given Frank a blow, but in return measures his length upon the grass. I remember the incident well. I am living my childhood over again."

"And what hath it changed to now?"

"A lonely wood, and the hour of night. A few stars shed a dim light upon the little grave yard. The leaves are stirring with the night wind, and the fire-flies are flashing in the thick deep shadows."

"See you no human being?" said the Genius.

"No," I answered. "It is solitary, and—but—yes, there is a figure stealing along—he springs the fence—he kneels by a grave—he covers his face with his hands—sobs break the surrounding silence; and—gracious heaven! 'tis Frank M.!"

"You hated him," said the Genius, "because he was melancholy; and, from an idle desire to talk, you have slandered him to one whom you might have made his foe. Yet he was formed for all the best thoughts and actions of man. Even before you knew him, he had become attached to a sweet young girl. Bright, tender, devoted—there are such sometimes—who would have been his good angel. But in yon narrow grave she lies, and with her the wreck of the boy's peace. He grew moody—his mates insulted him, and made him what he was. But what do you observe now?"

"I behold him still; but he is a boy no longer. It is yet night; but, he stands in a great city. It must be late, for there are no passengers in the streets, and a watchman holds his lonely walk wrapped in his cloak. Frank stops before a low gloomy building—he has entered—and I see him no longer."

"Look again," said the Genius.

"There is a wretched apartment. Every object bespeaks the extreme of poverty and despair. Upon a bed, ragged and filthy, lies a miserable man. His eyes are sunken, his cheeks haggard and hollow; disease has ravaged his body, and his mind is racked with anguish. Frank has taken his skeleton hand, and administers to him medicine and consolation. I recognise him to be Pierre; he who but now struck him—and he lies in jail."

"Turn your eyes again towards the mirror."

"There is a splendid hall," said I. "All the fashion and loveliness of this city, move in graceful dance upon the bending floor. Jewels are flashing—eyes sparkling—and cheeks glowing. And there is Ned! How handsome he is! With what modest grace he leads yon silvery voiced and beautiful creature through the cotillion! What can he be whispering to her? Their hands are together. She may almost feel his breath upon her cheek. If I am not in error his lips touched it; but a messenger calls him out, and presents a letter. I can read the contents by your aid, 'tis from Pierre: 'I am dying in jail, where your cruelty has laid me, for a debt which I am unable to pay. Come to me to-night, for my wife and child —.' He reads no more, but tells the messenger, he will see him to-morrow; to go to the sheriff, or the officer, or to any one. He cannot be troubled with business to-night."

"And what doth the glass show now?"

"A sunny morning in summer. A little grave-yard; a slab of marble, bearing the name of Pierre L. A flashing chariot drawn by two beautiful horses, glides along the winding road, and Ned, with a party of ladies and gentlemen, appears bent on pleasure."

"This is life," said the Genius. "They who ride with the licentious and cold-hearted libertine, whose wealth, person, and unmeaning extravagance, have won your admiration, think of him as you did; and Frank will probably pass on to his death, unappreciated, and perchance despised. You have contributed to blast his honest and precious reputation. When next you give opinions upon the dispositions of your acquaintance, think what cause you have to admire or to condemn; but never lend yourself to the circulation of the vile calumnies which float about society, impelled by the thoughtless, the ignorant, or the cruel."

I cannot say I was very sorry when the Genius vanished into air.

RUSSIAN PRAYERS.—The prayers of the Russians are generally very short, and consist frequently of these words: "Lord have mercy upon us!" which are sung with beautiful effect in most of their chapels.

AN INTERESTING BOOK.—A lady told her servant girl to procure the most interesting book she could find in the library. She selected one entitled "Interest tables for any sum between one farthing and one hundred dollars for any number of days."

PRICE OF A MILK MAID.—A young gentleman, meeting a handsome milk maid in the country, said, "What will you take for yourself and your milk, my dear?" The girl instantly replied, "Your hand and a gold ring, sir."

A SOLEMN FUN.—"Which is the most unpleasant toll in the kingdom?" said a jehu to his friend. "That which is caused by the death of a friend," was the reply.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE ORIGIN OF GRECIAN LITERATURE.

THE present age has been stigmatized as selfish, because men and matters are weighed in the scale of prudence and interest, and policy has penetrated both the palace and the hut, and pervades the high and the low. Yet this selfish age has shown us a psychological phenomenon, to which we shall scarcely be able to find a parallel in the pages of history. For three hundred years past an afflicted nation sighed under the despotic yoke of a stubborn tyranny, and sighed in vain. Her sufferings drove her to madness. In the last extremity she wrings the bloody weapon from the hands of her oppressor, and strikes him a deadly blow. The war of extermination begins. Despair struggles against superior force. The deadly strife continues with doubtful success. The sympathies of the world are with the oppressed; but, checked by the iron arm of policy, the ruins of Greece seem destined to vanish from the face of the earth, when the very masters which fetter the millions of Europe, drop their notions both of policy and legitimacy, and yielding to chivalrous generosity, strike the barbarian down, to raise up the bleeding slave. Greece is redeemed from inevitable destruction!

We are not among those who anticipate splendid results from this powerful effort for a nation trodden down for many centuries. We do not expect to behold the star of Greece brighten again with its ancient splendour. Nations are like men, they flourish but once; they have their infancy, their youth, their manhood, their age. History shows no exception.

Greece has bequeathed to us the living, the imperishable monuments of her genius, the models of the arts and sciences, after which we have formed ourselves.

Human culture, such as it is at present, resembles the Nile; a vast stream divided by the ingenuity of man into a thousand channels, winding through the immense Delta: just so education enlivens and adorns by the aid of arts, sciences, inventions, and improvements, the human understanding, which otherwise would lie barren.

Like the Nile, which pours its waters from hidden springs into the wild country, inhabited by the king of the desert, the bounding antelope, and the swift-footed ostrich, waxing gradually broader and broader as it verges towards the habitations of man—and swelling majestically into the valley, which it is destined to change into a garden, but losing its grand character through the united efforts of thousands, who direct its waters to adorn their gardens, to refresh their dwellings, to fertilize their fields, and to animate the barren grounds; like this stream, human culture seems to have arisen from one single source, which, hidden in the obscurity of mystic tradition, enlivened the heroic barbarous ages, dividing after the lapse of a few centuries into a thousand channels, fertilizing the mind, which would have remained barren without it, and changing too its grand uniform character for that of the more useful. And this stream, the favourite of refined minds, is that sublime art, which cometh from the glow of the human heart, and speaketh to the heart—it is poesy.

There is something so highly rational in a retrospective glance of this nature; the tracing back of human culture to its sources, that it is with regret we feel ourselves obliged to confess our being only enabled to give faint outlines. The first dawnings of Grecian, and, what in reference to us is nearly the same, of our own literary culture, are, like the sources of the Nile, hidden by the mysterious veil of inaccessible antiquity. All we can do, is to approach it. To penetrate it is beyond the power of man.

Grecian culture, like that of every nation, arose out of religious feeling, the parent of all that is good;

noble, and precious in man. The Greeks in their infancy were, like our British and Teutonic ancestors, savages, and they were, like the latter, governed by priests. These priest-kings had come from Samothrace and Egypt into Thessaly and Bœotia; they had brought with them their religious creed. It consisted in mysteries, oracles, and sybilline prophecies, carefully concealed from the multitude by the initiated. Their prayers and songs were chanted in strophes, and these constituted the beginnings of Grecian poetry—the religious hymn. But although the Grecian savage had not refused to receive his gods from foreigners, and to revere the donors as his kings, his glowing phantasy rejected the gloomy mysteries of Samothrace and Egypt, and his religious festivals soon assumed a brighter aspect—dancing, music, and pantomime were introduced in the form of chorusses in their religious rites. One of these chorusses, consisting of the youths, began the song and the dance—it was answered by the second chorus, composed of the men, and joined by the third, composed of the aged. The hymns of the mystic Orpheus and of Musæus give us a faithful picture of the ancient temple rythmus. They contain the oracles and moral sayings of the seers, the prayers of the sybils, and the pious effusions of enthusiastic minds; and they are rich in mythological traditions and allusions.

The Greeks were thus indebted for the first seeds of civilization to emigrant priests. As long as these were in the exclusive possession of the treasures which they had brought from their native countries, they were suffered to rule over their grateful subjects; (till about fifteen hundred years before Christ,) but savages so lively, so richly endowed as the ancient Hellenes, could not continue for a very long time in a state of nature; they soon caught the glimpses of civilization, and, learning to appreciate its advantages, they ascended a step higher. Young men, daring, adventurous, and of great bodily strength, arose among them, were joined by followers, and were called heroes. They were, like the heroes of Ossian, accompanied by bards, who sung their deeds. Thus originated the epopee. It was in Ionia (Asia Minor) that poesy, leaving the sacred precincts of the temple, first mingled with real life. Of the songs of these bards, those of Homer alone, with some fragments of Hesiod, are entirely preserved.

The adventurous impetuosity of the Grecian heroes had broken the priestly yoke. Their own sway met the same fate by the united opposition of the people. The fall of Troy, (about one thousand two hundred years before Christ,) gave the first opportunity. Several princely families were extinct; others had been expelled by their subjects. The Dorians and Æolians led by the Heraclides, conquered the Peloponnesus. These political revolutions gave rise to free constitutions. All the petty Grecian states had shaken off their lords, and took the sceptre into their own hands; Sparta and Epirus excepted, to the former of which Lycurgus gave a military monarchico-aristocratic form of government; and it is singular, that of all the Grecian states, this alone should not have contributed to the glory of Grecian literature. With the downfall of the petty sovereigns, and the growth of political freedom, Grecian genius began to develop itself in every direction, and the fairest of arts to put forth the most variegated blossoms. It is highly interesting to trace the several forms of poetry, that sprung up in these times, back to their sources.

The Grecian language, naturally poetical, had kept equal pace with the civil and the political institutions of the country. It had been sacred, so long as the priests ruled; heroic, under the sway of heroes; it now became social with the rise of political freedom. In Asia Minor several Ionian cities had grown wealthy and powerful, and there it was likewise, that the social poesy received its first outlines. By adding the lively pentameter to the stately hexameter, epic poetry was drawn from its heroic height, and the Ionian elegy took its origin. In the distich of the elegy were sung the various incidents and relations of life, its enjoyments and woes; it now was martial, then political, erotic or didactic, and only several centuries later Simonides the Athenian changed its tone into the mournful and elegiac.

Another fruit of political and personal liberty was the cutting epigram, which, with the railing satire, originated at the same time. The Grecian language is naturally sharp, acute, and highly expressive. There is a rythm almost inherent in it, wonderfully adapted to the jeering and railing at human follies, the iambus. Archilochus from Paros (seven hundred and fifteen years before Christ,) by giving the trochæus and catalectic tetrameter its finish, raised satire to a high degree of perfection. Prior to satire, the sweeter lyric had delighted the females of Greece. The rich stream of this poetic vein soon separated into two channels. The Ionian lyric sung in the delightful climate of Asia Minor, the pleasures of wine and of love; it was playful, easy, and graceful; its rythm was simple, its representative and model was Anacreon, the friend of Polycrates from Samos, and of Hipparchus from Athens. He is full of the most delicious naiveté, humour, and sweet grace, lively and extremely delicate. It is infinitely to be regretted that so few authentic poems of his have come down to us.

The Doric Æolian lyric, on the contrary, pours forth exalted hymns to the gods. It is impassioned, rising from the depth of a glowing soul, to objects the most sublime. Its rythm changes from the strophe to the antistrophe and the epode. Alkman (six hundred and thirty-three years before Christ,) gave to this species of poetry its form in his hymns, hymenæus and erotics. Who can think of his successor without emotion? The glowing Sappho, (six hundred years before Christ,) whose intense feelings speak so forcibly to our hearts, even now after the lapse of twenty-four centuries. A few odes only, and some fragments of hers, are extant. The greatest however of the Æolian lyric poets was Pindar, the Theban; (four hundred and twenty years before Christ,) the expositor of the divine and sacred legends and traditions, whose prophetic songs and visions streamed forth into the enthusiastic souls of his contemporaries, and of a posterity capable of appreciating their beauties. Of him we have forty-five triumphal hymns, with some odes and fragments.

The Grecian drama was the natural offspring of the epopee and the lyric. Its first dawnings are discovered in the dithyrambic chorusses, which were sung on festivals, and were united with the dance, music, and the pantomime. Dithyrambic singing schools had been established by Arion in Corinth. Others were started in Athens, whose gay inhabitants, to represent Silenus the more vividly, dressed themselves in sheep and buckskins: from this circumstance, or because a buck became the prize of the victor, the name of tragedy originated. It was early the custom to interrupt the chorus by a monologue, which treated of incidents of real life. Thespis (five hundred and ninety years before Christ,) seems to have introduced the epic monologue, but with it the beauty of the representation vanished, and it approached more to the religiously serious form. The lively spirit of the Athenians soon called back the satiric drama. Protinus, from Phlius, gave it a more perfect form. Susarion, who strolled about the country, produced the first comedy. The drama however was not yet characteristically distinguished in its three species, when Æschylus, from Ephesus, (four hundred and ninety years before Christ,) undertook to raise tragedy to its poetical height, and to give it its present features. The government of Athens had constructed a theatre of stone. Æschylus changed the monologue into a dialogue and introduced scenery. The subject of his tragedies is, with the exception of his Persians, generally taken from the mythological and heroic age; the characters are ideal, the language is bold and lyric, the chorus predominant. Of seventy-five of his tragedies, only seven have been preserved. Of his satiric dramas, none.

His disciple and rival, Sophocles, (four hundred and forty-nine years before Christ,) introduced a third person into his dramas, confined the religious chorus within narrower limits, and endeavoured to excite the moral feeling and sympathy of his audience by the truth of his characters, the dignity of his action, and the noble simplicity of his diction. Of more than a hundred tragedies written by him, we possess only seven.

The last of the Grecian dramatic triumphs is Euripides the friend of Socrates, distinguished by his knowledge of the human, and especially the female heart. His aim was to excite moral feeling, though in doing so, he perhaps fell into the fault of declaiming, and of keeping the chorus too little connected with the action. We have nineteen of his seventy-five tragedies. Grecian tragedy is the representative of heroic deeds and events. The action was to be sublime, no matter whether its issue was fortunate or adverse. It was never to depart from the lofty dignity which characterized the heroes. In this sense, and as a great political engine, Grecian tragedy ought to be considered by those who desire to appreciate its chaste beauty. Tragedy lived epically aristocratic in the past, while comedy, early popular, laughed democratically lyric at the present age, enjoying from her very outset a title to extravagance, and growing soon into the wanton luxuriance of caricature, which unsparingly chastised both public and private characters, not without licentiousness. The most ancient comedy (with a chorus) was entirely of a political nature, and ended with the national independence of Greece (after the battle at Cheronea, four hundred and forty-four years before Christ.) The second species, less political, depicted characters under fictitious names, approaching more to general delineations. Out of this species soon grew a third, viz. the more recent comedy, without chorus, representing scenes and incidents of both public and private life, and characterized by its regular conception of a plan, its denouement of a dramatic plot, and its regular scenes. Its seat was Attica, whose caustic inhabitants took immense delight in, as they themselves formed the principal ingredients of, it. Of numerous authors, only one has come down to us; Aristophanes, a citizen of Athens, distinguished by the richness of his wit, and his inexhaustible good humour, as a star of the first magnitude in the literary heavens. His raillery hits both the dissipated and the wicked, spares neither gods nor men, and the swelling vein of his gaiety oversteps sometimes the boundary line of decency; he becomes not unfrequently indelicate, and his pungent wit verges towards farce, yet his blemishes have been fully equalled, if not surpassed by British comic writers, without their having a shadow of that infinite delicacy, which renders his pictures such delicious apician morsels. Of fifty-four, eleven only of these invaluable masterpieces of moral, historical, and statistical paintings have been preserved.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

LEGAL FICTIONS.

THE fictions of the law are in the mouths of all who have ever heard of that science, and are graduated in public estimation according to the degree of knowledge and education which every man possesses. All, however, acknowledge their existence; all have a vague idea of their nature, and with all they form a by-word, not among the least palpable distinctions with which that profession is invested. The man of science, while he admits that such things are, views them with indifference, and characterizes and speaks of them as things which might or might not be, and as productions of neither good or ill; the casuist condemns them as possessing no positive good, and, par consequens, a negative bad tendency; the unlettered clown rails at them as nothing more or less than a sophisticated system of lying; the unlucky and disappointed suitor, who attributes his defeat to any thing but the injustice of his case, regards them as the most prominent part of a system which has for its object the encouragement of chicanery, and whose tendency in all cases is to place the honest man at the mercy of the knave; while the moralist, who adheres with rigour to the maxim "lie not at all," regards only the fact while he joins in its condemnation as departing from a principle which ought in no case to be evaded, and a departure from which can in no case, and under no circumstances, be justified. Each, in short, views it on principles peculiar to himself, and, without reference to general grounds of policy or expediency, justifies or condemns its adoption.

While pursuing a train of reflections such as these, a few mornings since, chance threw me in the way of a communicative friend of mine, a young lawyer, to whom my ideas on the subject of his profession were not altogether new.

"How happens it," said I, introducing the subject of conversation, "that in general estimation the leading views and objects of your profession, certainly the most noble, viewing it simply as a profession, of any which we possess, are so entirely overlooked, as it must be confessed they are, while a degree of prominence, altogether unmerited and uncalled for, is given to its minuter parts, I mean its fictions and its forms?"

"Simply for the reason," replied he, "that men deduce their ideas on every subject from facts and circumstances which are constantly before them, and by means of which they are oftener brought in contact with it than in any other way. We reason from what we see, and, let the remote cause be what it may, our ideas of every science are either elevated or degraded, according as the immediate circumstances presented to our view are the one or the other. The science of medicine is doubtless as exalted and as useful, I will even admit more useful, than any other, and yet, from the fact of its being brought home to us by means of cupping and bleeding, and such other attendants, the name of a physician becomes identified with these symbols of his profession; and according as he is regarded, in jest or earnest, he is set down as a leech or a butcher. So it is with us. The mainsprings of our profession are of necessity concealed from the public eye, and not unfrequently from the members of the profession itself. It is by these fictions and forms that it is brought to every man's door; and because he cannot trace each form or proceeding to what he conceives the justice of his own individual case, the whole system is wrong, injustice is regarded as the end, and knavery, lying, and chicanery come to be considered, by common consent, as the means. This is the secret; and as long as every profession is hidden from those who do not belong to it, it must necessarily continue to be the case. To reconcile these apparent contradictions is the great art of each profession, and they can only be reconciled while the line of each profession is preserved distinct. You will perhaps smile when I tell you, however, that these fictions to which you have referred, are the very means by which justice is administered, and that without them its administration would be difficult, complicated, and slow."

"I must confess," said I, "that I am not a little at a loss to perceive how mere fiction can, as a general principle, be made in any way conducive to justice, or how a system of justice can be pure, based upon a principle so equivocal, and, at first sight, so uncertain; and, without at all disputing the proposition that the end may in some instances justify the means, I must be excused in saying that I cannot, in reference to the present subject, see the connection between the end and the means."

"To be candid with you," continued the lawyer, "such were my impressions, and such the conclusions to which I deliberately had arrived before, and for a long time after, I entered upon the profession. The course of my experience on the subject taught me however that these were impressions which are rather to be removed by the force of ridicule than of argument. I studied law with a wag. His profession was a matter of business with him altogether; and if ever he allowed himself to be diverted from the mechanical mode of thinking on professional subjects into which he had fallen, it was in such a way as to present his profession in so strong a contrast with considerations of another character, that both not unfrequently became ridiculous. Of lying by rule he was a perfect master; and in the pursuit of legal inquiry, he seldom sought for the truth, excepting among the most inextricable mazes of fictitious jargon. Yet his search after truth was painful and unremitting. His sincerity, I will venture to say, was unequalled; his integrity unimpeached and unimpeachable. I shall never forget an incident with which my experience with him furnishes me, and which my recollections of him, often bring forcibly to my mind. A fraud had been practised upon a client of his, of an unprecedented and complicated character. The details were numerous, tedious, and intricate. My preceptor heard them with the patience of a philosopher, and when they were concluded, advised the customary panacea in cases of that kind, a bill in chancery.—By this proceeding you perhaps require to be informed that the whole facts of the case are spread before the court in the form of a narrative; every allegation of which the defendant is required to answer under oath. This advice was adopted, and after a few days a bill in size such as bills in chancery are proverbially set down to be, was placed in my hands to be copied. For some eight or ten pages the narrative went on with great clearness and precision; but then it went off at a tangent into charges of conspiracy, inconsistent details, and tortuous interrogatories, in which even I, although somewhat accustomed to proceedings of that description, became bewildered. I still went on until at length my confusion half convinced me that some inexplicable error had crept into the manuscript, attributable only to the hurry and multiplicity of business in which the draftsman was involved. This conviction emboldened me to suggest, which I did with as much delicacy as possible, that such was the case. The sly old jurist smiled when he discovered my embarrassment.

"You forget, young man, that a knave can only be taken in a snare. Point out the pit which you have been at the pains to dig for him, and he laughs at you and escapes. Tell your enemy your strength, and that moment you disarm yourself. There is no course so effectual to ferret out chicanery as mysterious insinuation, coupled with apparent inconsistency; and, as a skilful general, when opposed to a powerful enemy, is justified in resorting to stratagem, so we, to detect and punish fraud and imposition, may safely be indulged in a little evasion and equivocation."

"The singularity of the fact that equivocation had been resorted to, was only equalled in my mind by the singularity of the reason by which it was justified, and at the time I set both down as founded on a system of morals which I could neither excuse nor adopt. Now however those impressions are worn away, perhaps more by the force of habit than of conviction, although not the less effectually on that account. Habit has taught me to view legal fictions as secondary to the great end of justice, and I, in common with the great mass of the profession, choose to view that profession as promotive of the ends of civilized society in the highest possible degree, and rather than forego the prospects which it holds out to perseverance and industry, to embrace it with all its quibbles and its faults.

Our John Does and our Richard Roes, our James Jacksons and our John Stileases, our declarations, pleas rejoinders, surrejoinders, rebutters and demurrers may excite, as they have always hitherto done, the merriment and the ridicule of those who either look at them at a distance, or of those who have had to pay dearly for them without being able to discover their utility, but in the end it will be found that the maxim fictio cedat veritati,—"let fiction yield to truth," is predominant, and that all these suppositions or fictions are but limbs, and not the least firm too, in the great chain which connects and holds society together. Perhaps some of them might be dispensed with—perhaps all. This however is the work of time, and, after all, it may be well questioned whether the utility of the task would any thing like compensate the labour with which it would necessarily be attended."

From the warmth with which my friend treated the subject, and the ardour which he discovered in the vindication of his profession, I felt but little disposition to prolong the discussion, and, after yielding my assent to what he had said, we separated. The next day afforded me an opportunity of testing his sincerity. Happening to stroll into one of the courts, the well known voice of my friend struck my ear. He was addressing the court, and curiosity prompted me so stay and hear him. I had listened but a few moments when I found that he was reasoning upon a fiction of law which resulted in the proposition, in which he was sustained by the court, that a man who had died the day before, was alive in judgment of law, and continued so until the expiration of the term which lasted ten days longer. How the justice of the case was, I knew not; but it was not without some difficulty that I could regard seriously the sort of judicial resuscitation which, with the aid of a few fictions, my friend had so successfully brought about. THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Poor.—The season is fast approaching when the claims of the indigent and the distressed will be renewed, and the assistance of the wealthy required to supply their necessities and mitigate their sorrows. The experience of the last year admonishes us of the necessity of attending to this subject in good season, that as much of evil as is possible may be obviated, and that which must be endured be efficiently alleviated. A variety of means suggest themselves for the attainment of this important object. The prevention of indigence can only be effected by procuring employment for those who are by misfortune deprived of it. For this purpose committees should be appointed in each ward to devise measures by which the industry of mechanics may not be left unexercised; and we believe they were so appointed last year. Of any plan adopted by them, or of their having even entered at all upon the performance of their duties, we have not as yet had any information. If they have so neglected the charge entrusted to them, it is deeply to be deplored as a public calamity, and not a moment should be lost in repairing the evils likely to accrue from the omission.

An example of prudence and economy in the upper classes, as they are termed, is another important means of obviating the fatal inroads of want and distress. No cause acts with such sure and wide-spread influence in creating poverty, and its awful train of heart-gnawing sufferings, as the wasteful expenditure of money. Practised by the rich in a sumptuous and attractive manner, that causes their tables to groan under a thousand superfluities, and gradually exhausts their bodies and minds by the overstimulating and finally enervating effects of the circean cup, whether it comes mantled with the sparkling foam of the brilliant I. C. or blushing with the ruddy and deep hues of Burgundy, it is imitated by the next descending ranks each in their appropriate style. The wine changes its quality to suit the limited means of him who quaffs, or is exchanged for the more powerful influence of Monongahela, or Usquebaugh, Ontario, Cognac, or lastly, raw new England. The dainty brandt or boneless turkey finds its substitute in stuffed goose or minced pie. It is all the same in principle and in act. Extravagance is the ruling evil—indulgence in sensuality the prevailing vice. These must be corrected. The poor will want less—the rich will have more. The former will not then experience the degradation of suing for relief—the latter the mortification of denying it. If the sums daily, nay hourly expended for superfluous and idle indulgences were set apart—the accumulated amount would astonish every one. It would wipe away the national debt, extirpate poverty from out the land, crown every tenement with neatness and comfort, and procure to every inhabitant thereof competence and independence! Who would not exchange all the transitory pleasures which momentary enjoyments can procure—passing away like the dream of the morning, the dew-drop upon the flower, or the brilliant pageantry of an anniversary celebration—for the solid, substantial, never-fading bliss of glorious independence? No duns then to lower with their angry and reproachful brow upon your shrinking soul—no threats of process—seizure, or curtailment of your liberty!—If man thought of these in time, he never would incur them. It is not by an agrarian or levelling law that he is to be transmuted, like the metal of the alchemist, into a philosopher's stone of perfection. Such protean agency effects little in morality. Prudence, economy, temperance—these are the agents by which the glorious revolution in the present condition of the large majority of the community can alone be achieved. And it is the duty as it should be the pride of the more enlightened and favoured portions of society, to set the example, and inculcate the lessons by which the reformation is to be effected.

Monumental structures.—All the celebrated cities of antiquity were more or less indebted for their external magnificence and imposing effect, to those stupendous works of art which were intended to perpetuate the remembrance of great men and great achievements. Ancient Babylon, Nineveh, and all the cities of Greece and Italy, were celebrated for their towers, obelisks, and monumental columns; and many modern cities in the eastern hemisphere, are now distinguished in the same way. But we have hitherto looked in vain for such aspiring evidences of American enterprise. What can be the reason? Have we had no great men? Are no glorious achievements connected with our national history? Let the annals of two centuries answer those questions. The first landing of our forefathers at Plymouth, and the achievement of our national independence, are two events of such inconceivable magnitude, as respects their influence on the destiny of the whole human race, that no parallel can be found in the history of eighteen centuries. But, independent of these, have no splendid discoveries, inventions, or improvements of public utility distinguished the American character? We answer the question by naming Franklin, Hadley, Fulton, and Clinton, while a host of others might be referred to in authentic records. But where are the permanent memorials to convince posterity of the facts, and inspire others with the noble ambition of becoming benefactors of mankind? New-York, this queen of American cities, for whom we claim the appellation of the "London of the Western world," cannot boast of a single monument of a public character. Philadelphia has none; the flat, square, quaker-like surface of that great city, is scarcely interrupted by the elevation of a cupola or turret—steeples, of course, are out of the question. It is true that she has several shot-towers; but however useful they may be, it will not be contended that they are, in the slightest degree, ornamental. Boston has none; although her citizens, with their characteristic patriotism, are now engaged in erecting one on a neighbouring height, in commemoration of the battle of Bunker-hill. But Boston, the very cradle of the revolution, does not possess a column or tablet to perpetuate its events. It is true that that city once had a monument, a lofty column, erected on a still more lofty hill, consecrated to the heroes and statesmen of the revolution. But the hill and the obelisk have both been swept away by the besom of public improvidence! Perish such improvements! Beacon hill was once the most splendid ornament of the town. But it has, long since, been levelled with its base.

We are happy to perceive, however, that the time is rapidly coming, "nay now is," when columns of marble and granite shall ascend to the clouds, to perpetuate the names and record the deeds of patriots, heroes, statesmen, philosophers, and philanthropists. Baltimore, long since famed for the patriotism and public spirit of her citizens, has taken the lead, and will be promptly followed by her sisters of the middle and eastern states. Baltimore has erected and just completed a magnificent monument to the memory of Washington, and surmounted it with a colossal statue of the "father of his country." The superb column on which it is placed, is one hundred and sixty-three feet in height, constructed of white marble, slightly variegated. It stands on a hill, one hundred feet high, so that the whole structure, including the statue, has an elevation of two hundred and seventy-six feet; forming a very conspicuous object to the view of every one approaching the city, whether by land or water. Besides this, Baltimore was already distinguished by a splendid monument, inscribed to the memory of those brave citizens who fell in the battle of North Point, during the last war with Great Britain.

Let New-York, since she has neglected to take the lead, be ambitious of following so laudable an example. The opening and regulating of streets has formed angular gores of waste ground in almost every part of the original city. Let each of these be occupied with an obelisk, or a column, of an elevation equal to any of our church spires, and resting on a base or pedestal inscribed with the names and achievements of those to whom it is dedicated. Let this be defended by an iron railing, sufficiently near to render the inscriptions intelligible to the eye, and of a figure somewhat adapted to the shape of the site on which the monument will be erected. But, first of all, let the Park or Bowling Green exhibit an equestrian statue of Washington.

To the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

MR. MORRIS—I am an individual who has hitherto conducted himself in an irreproachable and discreet manner, as far as poetry is concerned, having eschewed the tagging together of rhymes in every shape whatever, except on two occasions, when my feelings were wound up to an awful state of excitement, and fairly got the better of my judgment: the present is one instance—the other was a horse-race. I went, a few evenings ago, to the theatre: it was Miss Fisher's benefit, and I was, as usual, highly delighted and excited by her performances; but, at the conclusion, after listening to the manner in which she spoke, or rather breathed, the latter part of her farewell address, my "wits began to turn," and I felt a strong almost an irrepressible tendency towards poetry. In order to overcome this folly, I betook myself to a neighbouring publican's, where, after making a hearty supper of beefsteaks and a bottle of London brown stout, I went home and retired to rest. My sleep, which is generally the sleep of innocence, calm and unbroken, was "perplexed in the extreme." That "bright intelligence," Miss Clara, seemed hovering over me, and the dying fall of her voice continued to make sweet music in mine ear. Along with these were joined sensations of a less agreeable nature, arising, as I am inclined to believe, from the baffled attempts of the gastric juices to overcome the indigestible properties of my very substantial supper. The morning's light found me in a high fever. I bathed my temples with cold water, and applied the usual remedies, but without effect, when, perceiving a sheet of paper on the table, I seized a pen, and heedless of consequences, perpetrated the following lines.

It is to be hoped that this long preamble will not be deemed impertinent, as I look upon it there are few persons privileged to trouble the public with poetry, without first making out an extremely urgent case, (as I trust I have done) by way of an apology. Yours, &c. C.

ON THE DEPARTURE OF MISS CLARA FISHER FOR NEW-ORLEANS.

Thou art gone to the south! where the light breeze is stealing
Pleasantly over the bright sunny land;
And the gay year unchill'd, still new be auties revealing,
Shows flowers in December by summer winds fanned.

Where from groves of the orange the rich exhalations,
Impregnate with odours the mild, balmy air,
And soft gales o'er tobacco and sugar plantations,
Come "woolly sweet!" to welcome thee there!

But for us of the north—oh! our joys are departed—
Mellow autumn is verging to winter's drear brink,
Feet and feelings are cold—we are dull and down hearted,
And nought's left to warm us save Lehigh or drink.

(Forgive me, sweet girl! if rude and unpolished,
My muse uses epithets homely and true—
But this heart shall be crack'd first, nay, shiver'd—demolish'd—
Ere it ceases to feel admiration for you!)

But as I was saying—grim winter comes scowling,
In snow, sleet, and vapour o'er valley and plain,
And over the city the north-wind sweeps howling
Interspersed with mild weather of fog and of rain!

Fog, snow, sleet, and vapour! Oh! away, girl, away!
To the beautiful south, where soft April showers
But refreshes the verdure that knows not decay,
And sprinkles the leaves of the undying flowers.

Why what shouldst thou do amidst colds, coughs, and such pests—
Midst potions and lotions—detested and vile—
Midst doctors and druggists, and bleak north-north-westers,
To dim thy bright eyes and chill thy bright smile?

Then away to the south! but when summer returning,
Brightens the earth, and the Battery looks green;
When the warm sun shines forth, and the year's out of mourning,
Oh say, wilt thou then, at "old Drury" be seen?

When the mild breath of May whispers "off flannel jackets!"
When the fields are all verdure, all music the air!
And the southern breeze wafts in the New-Orleans packets,
Oh then, sweetest Clara! say, wilt thou be there?

Come with the young year, in glee and in gladness—
Come with all things that are joyous and gay—
Come with those bright smiles—and sorrow and sadness,
Spleen, vapours, blue-devils, will vanish away!

VARIETIES.

WOODEN HOUSES.—Wooden houses are very common in America; and in the pine countries of Europe, they are almost universal, except for palaces and public buildings. In the interior of Russia, ready made houses are sold at the fairs. They are carried to the fair and there set up, and when the purchaser has selected one to his mind, it is taken to pieces and removed to the situation destined for it.

ODORIFEROUS LAMP.—A night lamp has been invented in Germany, and is now manufactured at Philadelphia, in which eau de cologne may be burned instead of oil. The fragrance diffused is very grateful, being in fact occasioned by the actual formation of aromatic vinegar during the whole time the lamp burns.

EXTREMELY POLITE.—A young widow of very polite address, whose husband had lately died, was visited soon after by the minister of the parish, who inquired as usual about her husband's health, when she replied, with a peculiar smile, "He is dead, I thank you."

A GOOD ONE.—A tip-top exquisite was endeavouring to call a coach, one day, but his lungs not being very available, or having too little muscular power to blow them, or deeming it very vulgar to speak loud enough to be heard, a sailor happening along and observing the difficulty, hailed coachee in a voice like a speaking trumpet. "Here," said Jack, looking unutterable things at the dandy, "here's something that wants you."

CHANGING A NAME.—A western paper announces the marriage of Miss Polly Schrecongost. We unite in congratulating her. She did well to change her name. What a pity it is that John Ollenbeuhengrapensteinerhohenbicher, (who it appears has a letter in the Baltimore post-office) could not get off his name by an equally agreeable process. The ladies have the advantage in this respect.

When Lord Ellenborough was attorney-general, he was listening with some impatience to the judgment of a learned judge, who said, "I rule," &c. "You rule," said the attorney-general, in a tone of voice that was heard by his brethren at the bar, "you rule! you was never fit to rule any thing but a copy-book."

A famous grammar master in this vicinity, once inquired of a six foot urchin, "What is a noun?" With ears erect, and a stupid stare, he replied, "Any thing that consists!"

Some Frenchmen seeing a man stand still in the high-way, during a heavy shower of rain, asked him why he did so? "Why," says he, "do you think I am mad, to ride in the rain as you do?"

A lady in a paroxysm of grief was said to have shed "torrents of tears." "Poor thing!" remarked an unfeeling punster, "she must have had a cataract in either eye."

The best thing to be done when evil comes upon us, is not lamentation, but action; not to sit and suffer, but to rise and seek the remedy.

"I never eat beef," said an exquisite, the other day, "I live upon raisins, and grapes, and figs; beef's too gross, positively."

FINN'S LATEST.—Why is a boy having his ears boxed, like a criminal in manacles? Because he is hand-cuffed.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE MOTHER AND DAUGHTER LAND.

Alexandria, District of Columbia, December 1829.

DEAR SIR—The liberality and loftiness of sentiment by which the following original poem, from the muse of Samuel T. Coleridge, is characterised, give it a claim to the perusal, and its author to the respect and affection of the American people. Hence I request for it a place in your interesting paper, together with the subjoined production of my humble muse in reply to it.

Apprehensive that if she had been consulted, her delicacy might have contravened my wishes on the subject, I transmit the poem for publication without having solicited Miss Barbour's permission to do so, trusting that her kindness, and a suitable appreciation of my motives, will induce her to pardon the liberty I have taken.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE P. MORRIS, Esq.

DANIEL BRYAN.

Lines written in the common-place book of Miss Barbour, daughter of our late minister to England.

Child of my muse! in Barbour's gentle hand
Go cross the main: thou seek'st no foreign land:
'Tis not the clod beneath our feet we name
Our country. Each heaven-sanctioned tie the same,
Laws, manners, language, faith, ancestral blood,
Domestic honour, awe of womanhood;—
With kindling pride thou wilt rejoice to see
Britain with elbow-room and doubly free!
Go seek thy countrymen! and if one scar
Still linger of that fratricidal war,
Look to the maid who brings thee from afar;
Be thou the olive leaf and she the dove,
And say, I greet thee with a brother's love!

Grove, Highgate, August 1829.

Response to the foregoing.

Offspring of genius! welcome to our clime!
We hail thee—messenger of truth sublime!
In countless bosoms here thy generous tone
Shall find high thoughts congenial to thy own;
Shall gladden hearts whose free-born currents glow
With pride that they from British fountains flow.
Go forth where'er Columbia's skies extend,
And thou shalt find her greet thee as a friend;—
Convince her sons thou speak'st Britannia's voice,
And thou shalt hear our hills and plains rejoice.
Throughout the land for passport thou may'st claim
Thy glorious birth—thy rich paternal fame:
For on the rolls of Albion's living bards
No loftier name commands our deep regards,
Than his whose spirit in thy numbers breathes,
And wins from these green shores their fragrant wreaths.
Enlightened thousands here, spell-bound and pale,
Have felt his power in that blood-chilling tale
"The "Mariner," whose wild and wizard "rhyme"
Assures the heart that cruelty is crime!

In visions kindled by the quenchless light
His sun-orbed genius sheds o'er Blanc's proud height,
Their fancies revel on that star-crowned pile,
And see it clothed in heaven's eternal smile;
Behold its peaks of everlasting snow,
Its torrents freezing in their headlong flow,
Its scathed and shattered cliffs begirt with gloom,
Its vales of verdure and perennial bloom;
And, burning with his own adoring fire,
Invoke with him the strains of nature's lyre
To sound th' applause of that Almighty hand
Which formed a world so beautiful and grand.

But whether soaring on Mikonian wing,
His muse disports in light's celestial spring,
Its rainbows and its amaranths interweaves
In vignettes to adorn her "Sybil Leaves,"—
Attunes her harp where stars and seraphs shine,
And sweeps its chords in praise of power divine;—
Or stoops on graceful plumes to lowlier themes,
And sings the charms of landscapes, groves, and streams,
The joys that circle the domestic hearth,
Where love is based on purity and worth,
And passion's wild and tender forms portrays
In simple, glowing, and harmonious lays;—
Still, thousands bask around her pages throng,
To feast on thought, and drink her nectarine song.
Hence, high-souled bard! the task was fity thine,
In beauty's wreath, where kindly emblems twine,

See his poem, entitled Hymn before sun-rise in the vale of Chamoucy.

That hallowed pledge, the olive branch, to blend,
In proof that Albion is Columbia's friend;
Is still, in feeling as she is in name,
A mother—proud to own a daughter's claim.
Henceforth between these kindred lands may wave,—
Broad as the ocean-floods their shores that lave,—
The flag of peace! For ever just and wise,
May all their contests be for virtue's prize!
Bard of exalted heart, and chainless mind!
Fraternal Coleridge! lover of mankind!
Still send abroad the offspring of thy muse
To teach man virtue, and enlarge his views.
Bid her thy soul's rich treasures still explore,—
Bring forth to day and spread the precious ore.
As round the earth her kindling light extends,
May bigots learn to love and live as friends;
May Britons all partake her generous glow,
And learn,—what even tyrant power shall know,—
That here their brethren, happy, proud, and free,
Are lambs in peace, in war a stormy sea!

And thou, Columbia! in thy growing might,
Think on those names enshrined in glorious light,
Of martyrs, sages, bards, and patriot bands,
Britannia's sons! whose fame unwasting stands
In pillared grandeur, beaming to the skies,
And death's and time's oblivious power defies;—
Remember how, with pure and pious zeal,
Through all the varying scenes of wo and weal,
Their noble charities, and works sublime,
Have soothed affliction's pangs, and battled crime.
And should the faults that England's splendours mar,
Or lingering trace of "fratricidal war,"
One hostile passion in thy breast revive—
Be great—and thence the vengeful demon drive;
Bid holier feelings in thy bosom wake,—
Forgive her frailties for her virtues' sake;
And, while thou hold'st thy honour free from stain,
Be neither selfish, arrogant, nor vain.
In proof of friendship, wear the flowery band
By Albion's bard consigned to beauty's hand;
And still advancing in thy high career
May'st thou, by nations loved,—to minstrels dear,—
In glory's star-encircled zenith shine—
The light of earth—the theme of songs divine!

POPULAR TALES.

A QUARTER OF AN HOUR TOO SOON.

BY HORACE SMITH.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER II.

THE sight from Portadown hill, as the morning broke, was incomparable—troops marching, flags streaming on tower and fort, signals flying, guns firing, drums beating, and martial music rising on the gale; the sea, blue as indigo, covered over with volumes of canvases, rolling before the light like floating clouds: life, vivid, bustling, bold, was in every thing I saw, heard, and felt. Heroes were round me: the men who had fought on every sea, the living trophies of St. Vincent, the Nile, and Trafalgar. I was in a blaze of eagerness and expectancy, to the utter astonishment of my pacific fellow-travellers; and the blaze was still more unmanageable, if that could be, when, on jumping from the coach at the door of the hotel, I almost jumped into the middle of the right wing of my regiment, moving down to the water-side. I was on the best terms in the world with the whole corps immediately.

"Fine sight this, sir," said the lieutenant colonel, with his foot on the boat's gunwale: "in another quarter of an hour we shall be off, and then Portsmouth may put on mourning."

"I am afraid you will find it rather dull," said the major, who had just received a war-office letter: "your wing of the regiment, I see, does not arrive this week, and you must wait for the next convoy."

"A week!" said I, in trepidation.

"Or, say a month, if you like," was the reply. "We shall probably have walked over half the peninsula before our light-bobs and grenadiers stand on the same parade again."

"A month!" echoed the captain of grenadiers, a fine, dashing Irish Hercules, to whom I took an instinctive liking. "Say six months, or a year, or, by Jove! the end of the world, or as much further as you like. Whatever happens in the peninsula will be short and sweet. If we beat the French, well and good, the business is done; if they beat us, we come back, and there is an end of the matter. At all events, my young friend, if you see nothing else in the course of the service, you will have it to say that you saw an embarkation."

I did not require the general laugh that rounded this speech to stimulate me; but at once asked the colonel whether I might not embark then. The colonel paused, and had his doubts. But likings and dislikings are chiefly mutual. My rapture with the regiment had made me popular already; and I was tilted on board the transport, across glorious bright billows, that at every heave seemed to throw new life into me.

I enjoyed every thing—the flutter of the sails, the roar of the surge, the brawlings of the shore-boats, the rattle of the cordage, the very smell of the tar; novelty was in every sight and sound; and if I had seven times seven senses they would have been all kept busy and delighted. A handsome dinner made only a pleasant pause in the pleasures of the deck; and when I turned into my dog-hole at night, I would not have exchanged beds with a Sardanapalus.

The day had not done with me yet; it haunted me in my sleep. For what are dreams, but the remnants and fig-ends of the clothing of the mind during the waking hour; a dress made of the same materials, only rendered a little more grotesque and piecemeal; a sort of Monmouth-street toilette, in which the tatters and the finery are tossed together, and the stray stores come forth like an Irish king—cloth of gold over the shoulders, but with neither shoes nor stocking? Recollections full of the pomps and vanities of the last twelve hours thronged round my sleep; caparioned horses, ships flagged and streamered from stern to stern, gold-laced heroes, beauties blushing with charms irresistible and perpetual, banquets celestial, dances on earth, in the clouds, on the billows, that lay down, and covered themselves with all the colours of the rainbow, to make a fitting floor for my luxurious feet. Nothing could be more surprising than the scene—except its change; I had been quadrilling it in vision with an incomparable partner, made for me alone; and all was grace and gaiety, when I suddenly saw the roses fly from her cheek, the floor heave, and the whole host of quadrillers heave with it. The gambols of an earthquake were peaceable to the movements that followed: for every thing lifeless and living round us seemed to be seized with a spirit of sally. The "elements themselves did dance." I felt the buoyancy of a thousand wings. I was whirled, lifted up, carried away, partner in hand, immeasurable spaces. I swept along, revelling with the loveliest of human dancers, like a chain-shot from a gun, cutting the air at the rate of ten thousand miles a minute. At last a thunder bolt burst athwart me; my partner was torn from my arms by a concussion that shook every nerve of my frame, and I opened my eyes, to find myself rolled out of my hammock on the floor, in the midst of a circle of sick and sulky officers, and with my head in the hands of the surgeon trying to stanch the blood from my temple.

The serene day had been succeeded by a gale. The toasing of the transport had inspired my slumbers; and the last tack had rolled me out of my berth.

I did my best to enjoy the practical joke of the new element, whose treachery I had so soon experienced. But the greatest humorist among us was not long proof against its might. The zephyr had become a breeze, the breeze rapidly grew into a brisk gale, and the brisk gale still more rapidly into a storm. To make the matter more sublime, we were still in the channel, a spot evidently intended by nature for seasoning this great naval nation to the perils of salt water; for man may put a girdle round the world without meeting such another teacher. We were rolled, pumpled, and salted into living mummies and stockfish; drenched until the idea of dryness was extinguished among us; frozen till every feeling but that of hunger was gone; and thus, without food, fire, or sleep, hourly startled, wretches as we were, by the chance of being called to account for our folly in tempting an element made only for sailors and other sea-monsters; roused from our miserable experiment to sleep, by a yell of, "Shoals on the larboard!"—"Breakers on the starboard!"—"Pumps choked!"—"Water gaining on the hold!"—we passed three full weeks of "the glorious life of a sailor," rocking like unruly children, in that uneasy cradle, the ocean, over every billow from Plymouth sound to the bottom of the Bay of Biscay.

But our troubles were coming to an end. "Time and the hour run through the roughest day;" and time and the hour drove us back, up the channel, by "abbey-tower and harbour-fort," with a wind hunting our solitary transport at the rate of fifty miles an hour. The land flew behind us, and we stood on a deck naked of spar, mast, and sail, and with a crew as ghastly as ever manned the Flying Dutchman, to see England "leaving us on the lee;" and every man of us expecting to find ourselves under sailing orders for the North Pole, or the other world. Help from shore was hopeless; for no boat could live a moment in the whirlwind of foam that swept round us. Surges that toppled over what was in better times our masts, but now a decrepit semblance of the crutch of a Greenwich pensioner, dallied with us as if our bark were a bauble. Gusts of wind, that ripped up the sea from the bottom, and spread it over us like a huge winding-sheet of spray, salt, and sand, were our only companions. We were not quite drowned yet; but the ocean played with us as a cat would with a mouse; let us slip for a moment, and then was on our backs with a mortal plunge again.

At length execution came. We wheeled, at midnight, into a "profound" of storm, a complication of sea-mischief, shores and shoals that we touched every five minutes, surges more implacable than ever, and darkness made more horrible by the glimmering of wandering lights, that every shivering soul among us could have sworn were dancing up and down the waters in the hands of drowned seamen—our memento mori.

But our horrors were completed by the still deeper gloom of an enormous promontory hanging within half a dozen feet of our bow. Death was inevitable, and we waited for it up to our waist in water. The ship struck with a violence that flung our whole council of war from its centre of gravity. A French battery could not have more effectually laid the élite of the gallant regiment on their faces. But, to my wonder, the blow was given, and we were not yet "full fathoms five" with "those for pearls that were our eyes," nor "of our bones was coral made." But, while the few among us whose tongues could yet move were giving their opinions on the terra incognita which had brought us up at last; some voting for the Fiords of Norway, others for Greenland, others for no land at all, but an iceberg, on whose prongs was struck our hopeless ship, like a fly on a pin; and the only thing in which we agreed was, that we had left the channel some thousand miles to the south—the day broke. We looked round us in astonishment. The iceberg over our heads was a bastion, loaded with guns. Behind us was a sunny island; before us a smiling shore. Along it were military lines, a fort, flags flying, and, to round the landscape, a ridge of hills covered with sheets of red, yellow, and green, ten miles long by five. "Hilsea! Portsmouth! Portsdown!" were the three exclamations from us all, the first fruits of our recovered faculties.

Our ship still lay a hundred yards from the shore; and the waves which had brought her so far were not yet tired of playing the same antics with her as for the last month; she pitched and rolled hideously. Before me lay the pleasant land of the canteen, the coffee-house, and the hotel. A crowd of jovial-looking militaires had already gathered on the beach to welcome us home, and were roaring with laughter at our unwilling manoeuvres.

"Flesh and blood can bear this no longer," said I to the colonel, who, without boots, epaulettes, or stomach, was clinging for his life to the juremast of our dancing ship. The words were no sooner pronounced than I jumped overboard, and was, like Cæsar, "buffeting the waters with fierce controversy." The waters took their revenge; I was the last of their victims, and they determined to make me remember them. The billows did with me just as they liked. When I was within ten yards of the shore on the back of one, the next conveyed me fifty yards to sea. No boat was at hand to determine "the controversy," and, in a few minutes as possible, a huge bill of foam, tumbling back from the beach, carried me with it, insensible, down channel.

I awoke in the hands of a committee of country surgeons, at the critical moment when the men of science were on the point of carrying it against the philanthropists, and I was about to be consigned to the forceps of a fashionable lecturer on the post mortem peculiarities of man. Here perhaps, I began to breathe fifteen minutes too soon; for one quarter of an hour more was the time in which the philanthropists had agreed to give up the experiment of my recovery. Less promptitude on my part would have saved me a good deal of after-trouble.

But I was fated to disappoint every one; and I disappointed the men of science of their prize, jumped into a post-chaise, and flew back to quarters. The first man whom I met in the streets of Portsmouth was my friend Jack, taking a tranquil saunter among the print-shops. He was goodnaturedly glad to see me.

"But you were unlucky," said he, "in venturing to swim from the vessel. The tide was going down; in another quarter of an hour she was lying high and dry, and you might have landed in a cabriolet."

"But the regiment, where is it to be found?"

"You have nothing to do with it now; you were returned drowned, for every ensign in the corps would have pledged every thing but his epaulette, that you were gone to the bottom. Your commission is given away, and now you have only to go to town and fight them out of another, if they will take your own word at the horse-guards for your being alive."

"But what are you doing at Portsmouth, Jack?"

"My duty. I have been gazetted to the regiment; and have the honour to be at this moment lieutenant in the company you left behind, when you were in such a hurry to see service."

I cursed the fifteen minutes in the depths of my soul. Storm, starvation, drowning, and cashiering were their produce. I shook Jack by the hand, saw him embark for glory and the peninsula with a wind that landed him at Lisbon in five days; and sad and sullen, took my way to London. My father had some gambling friends, men of influence everywhere, of course, and able to do every thing on earth but pay their tailors. To one of those I applied, with an indignant refutation of the charge of my being drowned. He sent me to a high functionary, who, from behind his desk, wielded a third of the thunderbolts of Britain's war. A more pacific manipulator of pounds, shillings, and pence, never calculated a discount. But he had the patronage of forty-three battalions, and was to me and five hundred subalterns the living emblem of the god Mars.

I leaved him for a year and a half; and may heaven forgive me for the prayers that I made for his welfare during the time! Ernulphus was clever at those short expressions of opinion; and my uncle Toby says that "our troops swore terribly in Flanders." But my vocabulary during this probation might have furnished Ernulphus with novelty, and eclipsed the exploits of our troops in Flanders. At length hope dawned, and I was ordered to attend. An honest clerk in the office, who had contracted an extra-official compassion for me, whispered as I entered,

"Your commission is made out, in a corps under orders for the peninsula."

My heart danced at the sound. Wellington was there, with the game of glory in his hands, and every packet brought aides-du-camp, eagles, and lists of promotion. Ushered into the waiting-room, the floor seemed to burn under my feet. Every moment was an hour, every hour an eternity. Let no yearning soul charge me with impatience; I underwent four of those eternities this day. I saw long files of the happy and unhappy passing in and passing out, I alone was unsummoned. I thought that time itself stood still. The great man's carriage rolling to the door roused me into action. I burst into his cabinet, his salle de trône, even before a major-general. The great man, when I at last detected him, half buried as he was among petitions, eyed me with a look that might have forewarned any one but the fiery fool that stood within three inches of his tribunal. Our dialogue employed but half a dozen sentences, by no means remarkable for their urbanity on either side. He bowed me out of the room; and, as the door was closing, I heard the words, "impatient puppy!" to burst in upon me a full quarter of an hour before I was at leisure: I shall take care not to be too soon troubled with the fellow again."

In three days I saw my name in the gazette, flew to the office, and was struck blank by the intelligence that my new regiment was in the West Indies. A line of the angry pen had made all the difference between beating the French and broiling under the tropic, being covered with glory and flayed alive by mosquitoes; or, to say all in one, between the peninsula and the pestilence.

SELECTIONS.

THE DRAWING-ROOM ACTRESS.

QUERE. Author—Is it lawful for one in satirizing any particular folly, to make use of real personages of his acquaintance, and even build his sketch upon real facts, such as they were, which happened to come under his observation?

ANSWER. Morality—Yes; perhaps more strictly warrantable than the imagining of both, inasmuch as the more actual truth there is in such exhibitions, the more my interests are consulted and promoted.

Then, my dear Lady Mary, you must excuse me if I take the liberty here to print you at full length, for the benefit of society at large—and for your own in particular. Yes, I will put you into the paper—for, though I risk the loss of your friendship, which I prize dearly—dearly as every man ought to prize the friendship of a lady and talented woman—and though those sunny looks may no longer be sunny for your satirist—yet he is contented to sacrifice even so large a portion as that is of his happiness, for the mere hope of diverting those talents into a more amiable exercise than they are usually applied to.

Lady Mary, gentle reader, is a young, accomplished, kind-hearted, elegant woman; of great natural endowments—perhaps too great—at least, in one peculiar way—she is an admirable drawing-room actress; and, of all the actresses in the world—of all the performers that ever made the boards "discourse" with clatter of their heels—let me see Miss Blank in Lady Bell, Miss Dash in Lady Teazle, Miss Asterisk in Lydia Languish, or Miss Hem-hem in Lady Macbeth;—in short, put the lowest retainer about a theatre on the boards for five hours in a night, and I will endure them; but heaven save me from your drawing-room actress!

By this talent, Lady M. is enabled to season her highly-coloured portraits of her neighbours, as they take leave one after another, with exquisite imitations of the manner, accentuation, voice—nay, personal peculiarities of each, with the cruellest fidelity. For example—

"Ah! my dear Lady Mary, was Mrs. Askaunt with you this morning?"

Lady M.—Running to a lounging-chair, simpering hideously, and ogling the inquirer with what Le Sage or Smollett calls the corner of the eye.—"Oh, 'iss, indeet, she was—and telt uss that it wass a beautiful morning."

"Ha! ha! and her husband?"

Lady M.—In a grumbling bass voice, stooping forward, and shaking the ringlets about her pretty face.—"Aw?" her husband? Oh, oy, aw—aw! He was going to his bawnker's, and left Mrs. A. until he should return."

"Positively you are the drollest creature. Strike me dumb! You have such a fancy, 'pon honour. Well, I've a thousand calls—I must fly—adieu!"—A mutual interchange of farewell nods and smiles.

"Pretty fellow, that, Lady Mary?"

Lady M.—Standing, one hand to her side, her glass raised.—"Think so? Yes—vezzy pretty—strike me dumb! 'pon honour!"

At this moment Dr. A.—, who had been visiting a patient, entered the house with a very grave countenance, the silver head of his cane pressed upon his nether lip, and his left hand placed behind his back. The mad girl waited until he had passed her chair, then rose softly, placed herself behind him, shut her fan, and, laying it against her lip with a face of the archest gravity in the world, followed in his wake until the stifled laughter of the company caught his ear. But, long before his head was turned, the lady's noiseless feet had borne her to her chair, in which she now sat, looking at the expanded fan with the demurest face imaginable.

If Lady Mary knew the conversation that took place immediately after, when an accident compelled her to leave the company for a few minutes, I believe she would not be so willing as she is to entertain them with her capabilities at mimicry.

"'Tis capital fun," said a gentleman.

"I am sure it is any thing but amiable," said a lady.

"I remember," said an elderly lady—and I transcribe the elderly lady's speech for Lady Mary's especial benefit—"I remember only one acquaintance who was as good an actress as Lady Mary. She was quite as beautiful, quite as accomplished, and quite as fond of turning her acquaintances into ridicule. You have heard of Miss G.—, of —?" a nod from several old bodies in the room. "She was greatly admired indeed; and she was not without her own particular admiration in return. She was deeply attached to a young gentleman, whom," with a significant nod, "it is not worth while to name now, and he was most devotedly attached to her in return. He loved her wit, her beauty, her accomplishments,—nay, her very faults; for he took the utmost delight in that very unamiable quality of which we have been speaking, particularly, as he observed, that no being was ever made the subject of her satire in whom he even deemed to take the remotest interest. In a word, they were a most affectionate pair; and nothing was wanting to complete their union, but the arrival in town of the gentleman's mother. (Let me say, in passing, that he was one of the fondest sons that ever breathed.) 'Well, my angel! where have you passed last evening?' said her lover, entering her apartment, one fine morning—'leaving me a poor Castalio, to knock three times to a not at home?' 'I sha'n't tell you—shall I? No—yes—come here and sit down—'I went to Mrs. Metre's. You know Mrs. Metre?' 'Oh! perfectly well.' 'Well, she had a card-party—sit further off, you hideous creature, patting him on the cheek with her fan, and then recalling him with one of the loveliest smiles in the world, as in mock reverence he retired to the very furthest corner of the room. 'So—now remain just as I have placed you—well, there was Mrs. Doucewoman, whom you have seen a thousand times, worrying us, as usual, with all the virtues of her own family. It seems her brother has returned lately from India, and she has already discovered him to be a perfect paragon; positively, he's the stupidest creature that ever—where's that hand creeping to?' as she observed it steal unconsciously along the back of her chair, 'take it away!' slapping it prettily with her own soft and beautiful one,—'horrid wretch!' as in duty bound, he took the little aggressor, and pressed it to his lips.—'Where was I?—Oh! there was also another person in company, a country lady, really the most comical old body I think I ever met. She sat in this manner, erect in her chair the whole night; her long grave face made up into such a prim expression, just turning her eyes, mimicking, 'to one side and to another, to say with a nod, 'Yes'—'No'—'Sir'—'You spoke'—'Exactly'—altogether the most laughable but—with a stare of astonishment, as she observed, now for the first time, that her lover had, while she proceeded with her sketch, withdrawn his hand from her chair, shrunk back in his own, and now sat pale and breathless, his lips compressed, and his eyes sorrowfully bent on the ground.—'Harry, dear Harry, what is the matter? You look frightfully. Are you ill?' He removed her hand from his shoulder with a strange and a new feeling. He was indeed ill—sick to the very heart; for in her thoughtless portraiture he had recognised his poor praise-idolized mother! I hope none of my readers, fair or gallant, may ever be doomed to experience such a fearful sensation as that which agitated the young gentleman at the moment I speak of.—A noble poet (peace to his shade!) has said—

"Love may sink by slow decay;
But by sudden wrench believe not Hearts can thus be torn away!"

I fear he was in error. Love is as mortal in every respect as the human frame, and quite as subject to sudden death. Poor Miss G. did not discover the cause of this extraordinary conduct, until her lover (with his parent) was far from town. It was in vain that several common friends of both remonstrated with him on the cruelty of his conduct; in vain did his amiable mother herself, on being informed of the whole affair as it stood, represent to him that he was yet more in fault than the lady, and that it was, in fact, in an affectionate endeavour to amuse him that she had committed the unintentional offence. All was in vain; the blow was given; love had been struck dead in that fatal moment; dislike had usurped its place within his bosom, and his understanding might (and did) bow to their suggestions: but his heart was stubborn—it was estranged for ever."

It would have been all fair, if ample restitution had been made on both sides; but, unfortunately, there were some trifles belonging to the lady which the gentleman forgot to restore—her young, her ardent, her confident affections. These, notwithstanding all her efforts, she never could recall from him, and, in the effort to do so, struggling between love, pride, and sorrow, she found—quiet.

THE FIRST QUARREL.

Mary Conway was the flower of her father's family. She was young, and well do I remember that she was beautiful—most beautiful. There is no object beneath the sun—nothing in this wide world, full as it is of allurements, that burns in the heart like the fresh visions of young angelic loveliness, in the hey-day of the feelings. There is something pure, and innocent, and holy, in the mild lustre of her eye; and something heavenly in the soft and gentle smile that plays upon her cheek and lips. I look back through a mist of years, but I see no object beyond it more distinctly than Mary Conway.

She married early in youth, advantageously and happy; in age and fortune her partner was entirely suitable for her; their minds too, were similar, above the ordinary cast, finely moulded, full of sensibility, delicacy, and spirit; and the morning of her matrimonial life wore every prospect of a long, and delightful, and quiet day of joy. If it seemed bright to others, it seemed doubly so to them; and, lost in the plenitude of their happiness, they forgot, if it had ever entered their minds, how much care and caution, what watchfulness and forbearance, what kindness and prudence, was necessary to secure the peace and tranquillity they now enjoyed. Love does not burn always with the brightness of its first light, but it often grows more deep, sincere, and unchanging, as time rolls away. The feelings remain as tender and susceptible, after the shield that protected them from every unkind word has been broken.

The occupation in which they engaged was a profitable one; and Henry was a man of business, industrious, attentive, intelligent. Every one who spoke of them prophesied that they would speedily realize a splendid independence. They were the pride of the village. But how small a matter sometimes gives an unexpected direction to the fortunes of kingdoms, cities, and individuals. It happened one afternoon, several months after her marriage, that Mary had a little tea party, at which several matrons of the village were present, and as is often the case, a long and learned dissertation on the manner of managing husbands had been given by one and another; husbands and prudent wives know what such talks amount to, and how much value they are to young house-keepers. Unfortunately Henry returned home fatigued and weary, in both body and mind, with the labours of the day, and took his seat at the table. His favourite dish was not there. He inquired for it in a style that savoured not a little of reproach; it was unintentional. Mary was in the presence of her self-constituted preceptors; she was ashamed to appear too submissive before them, and besides, her feelings were wounded by her husband's manner; she replied, as she thought, spiritedly, but it was really harsh. Henry cast a glance across the table, pushed back the plate, and rising, left the room. It was the first error. They were both sensible of it in a moment. But who should make the first concession, where both were plainly in the wrong?

As Henry walked down the street, engaged in unpleasant meditations and enveloping himself in the gloom, a bright light in the upper window of the village inn attracted his notice; he stepped over; a party of gay young men were about sitting down to supper; they urged him to join the club; the temptation under the circumstances of the case was all-powerful. Supper over, he delayed a little longer, and a little longer, taking his leave; liquor was introduced and he drank; music came next, and cards followed; though he did not partake in the last, he looked on the game without abhorrence; the dread of evil he had been brought up in had been broken.

Returning late at night, his spirits heated with wine, and the recollection of his wife's behaviour before him, he found her retired, and passed the night in another room. The morning brought a cool meeting; the formal interchange of a few words, and a parting without an explanation or complaint. The seed of discontent was sown; it bore the fruit that might be expected. His home was no longer the centre of attraction to Henry. His tavern companions were gay, good-humoured, and attractive, and he left the fire-side of his own mansion, which no longer wooed him as zealously and powerfully as the ale-house club, of which he was very soon the centre and life. The second error was committed.

Though unseen by their friends, a dark cloud now brooded over the fortunes of our young couple. It gathered darkness until perceptible to every eye; and when it burst carried ruin and desolation with it. Driven to the dangerous company of dissipated fashionable men, Henry contracted all their habits; he became a drunkard and a gambler. The domestic circle was deserted, and its obligations forgotten. Mary met her husband's harshness and faithlessness with reproaches and bitterness. They both began in error and continued so. These occasioned loud, and long, and violent collisions; a fearful example was set before their children, who grew up disobedient, violent and passionate. And though for many years the impending bolt of ruin was stayed just above their heads, at last it sped.

Henry died a lingering and awful death. His estate was found to be insolvent; his children grew up to ruin, and Mary, the once beautiful and enchanting Mary Conway, ended her life in poverty and obscurity.—Thus fatal in its direct and natural consequences was an error; a single error; the offspring rather of accident than of intention. I leave the moral for others to trace out and apply.

THE SICILIAN CHARACTER.

Our knowledge of the characters of nations is derived from history; but there are moral features among every people which history never describes. In estimating the character of the Sicilians, this consideration ought to be particularly borne in mind. The island has been so long connected with Naples, that the two countries, in opinion, have become almost inseparably blended; and much of that bloody colouring, which darkens the complexion of their general national character, may, properly, belong only to the Neapolitan. Still, however, the circumstances of the Sicilian government, from an early era, serve to show, that the political attachments of the people have never been lasting, nor have they, in any epoch of their story, evinced that they possessed that resolute courage which has often enabled small communities to acquire immortal renown, in their opposition to superior powers.

The Sicilians are rather a sly than a cunning race; perhaps no nation in Europe possesses so much naïveté. Loquacious and ingenious, they make more use of persuasion in their dealings than any other people. It is not enough that a Sicilian objects to the high price of what he desires to purchase; he expatiates on the inferiority of the quality; recalls to recollection how long he has been a customer; enumerates, one by one, counting them on his fingers, the circumstance of unlucky bargains that he has had; flatteringly contrasts the opulence of the English with the poverty of the Sicilians; animadverts on the politics of the government; magnifies the value of his ready money; insinuates that he may change his merchant; and often retires, and returns several times, before he offers his ultimatum. Nor in selling does he practise less address. There is not a single point of his wares that does not possess something extraordinary, or beautiful: no other shop in the town has any thing like them; so cheap, or so excellent. If the price be high, what will you give? and it is seldom that a Sicilian refuses the offer of an Englishman.

The inhabitants of this island are, in the proper sense of the term, highly superstitious; but the dicta of ignorance are so interwoven with the creeds of popery, that many notions of vulgar superstition are regarded as essentials of religion. The only exception is a belief in the effects of the influence of evil eyes: and even over this the priesthood have acquired jurisdiction. For they persuade the people to buy bits of blessed rags and paper, which, when worn suspended round the neck, have the effect, as they pretend, of neutralizing the malignancy. The influence of an evil look is instantaneous; and the person who happens to glance it, may be unconscious of what he does: it smites the subject with sudden malady, or impresses his mind with lugubrious images, and unfits him for the prosecution of premeditated intentions. It is useless to speculate on the fantasies of the human mind; but, in this case, the constant flickering of electricity in this climate, and the occasional breathing of pestiferous exhalations, from the vegetable corruptions in the bottoms of the valleys, afford a plausible reason for the sudden distempers and dejections which are ascribed to the aspect of ungracious eyes. The same superstition is well known in Scotland; but it is more generally prevalent among the Sicilians than the Scotch. Whether it is, among us, an imported or indigenous belief, cannot now be ascertained. Over all the ancient extent of the papal empire there is a great similarity in the topics of vulgar credulity.

The Sicilians have, certainly, a very keen relish of humour: and, now and then, one may perceive in them a strong trait of peculiarity, not individual but national, which, notwithstanding their ancient proficiency, is an assurance to think that they may yet attain some literary superiority which shall be regarded as original. A description of manners, and customs, by a genuine Sicilian, otherwise properly qualified, would equally surprise and delight.

CHOICE OF OCCUPATION.

When we examine the individuals who compose the various trades and occupations, and find certain classes to present, very commonly, a pale, meagre, and sickly aspect, while others are replete with health, vigour, and strength; we are not to suppose that because the pursuits of the one demand but little, and those of the other considerable bodily strength, the first are best adapted to the weakly, and the latter to the strong; we are rather to ascribe this very difference in their appearance, to the influence their several occupations exert upon the health of the system.

Let the most healthy and vigorous individual exchange his laborious occupation in the open air, for one which requires confinement within doors, and but little exercise, and his florid complexion, well developed muscles, and uninterrupted health, will very speedily give place to paleness, more or less emaciation, and debility, and occasionally to actual disease of the stomach or lungs. On the other hand, the reverse effects will be produced, by the sedentary exchanging, before it is too late, their confinement and inactivity, for some active employment in the open air. These are important considerations, an attention to which, in the choice of a profession, would be the means of saving not a little suffering. In many instances, of passed two young misses, genteely dressed, with drawing materials in their hands. On seeing our friend, the youngest suddenly exclaimed, "Look, Charlotte! See the poundcake in that gentleman's basket!" The other cast a hasty glance at the object of her sister's admiration, and then with a contemptuous curl of her ruby lip, exclaimed, "Gentleman! indeed! carrying home liver for his dinner!" Q.

GRECIAN LITERATURE.

HISTORY.

It cannot have escaped the notice of our readers, while tracing the sources of poetry, that this art, with all its ramifications, was less the fruit of effort, than the natural effusion of a spirit wholly poetical. And, indeed, it is principally to this poetical spirit, that all Grecian productions, even their arts and sciences, and their whole mental development, are to be attributed. The epopee of Homer is an historical representation, or a history, in the wider sense of the term. Its aim was to rouse the people, by a vivid image of the past, to a just appreciation of the present. It is, then, natural to suppose that the epopee of Homer gave rise to history; but the abstract and general pictures of the latter being less analogous to the genius of the Greeks, must have presented infinitely more difficulties to them than poetry. Accordingly we find its development centuries later than that of poetry; its first efforts feeble, its beginnings small. It is in the cyclic traditions and mythological legends that we discover its first traces. These cyclics were in fact nothing more than faint imitations of the mythological traditions embodied in the works of Homer; but one circumstance rendered them important; the authors, in endeavouring to give unity to their representations, felt the necessity of paying regard to chronology. This was an important step towards improving history. The culture of these cyclics was especially attended to in the free and wealthy cities of Asia Minor. There it was that the first attempts at topography originated. The astonishingly faithful descriptions of countries and of towns in the Iliad and Odyssey led the inhabitants of other states to attempt similar descriptions. The most distinguished of these topographers were Aristæus from Procanesus and Acusilaos, and they assimilated their graphic works to the epic and cyclic poetry.

In free commonwealths every thing that relates to the origin and progress of its community becomes important. This truth was soon felt by the Asiatic Greeks, and it became an object of solicitude to have the origin of cities and the foundation of republics faithfully recorded; not only according to tradition, but with reference to existing documents, inscriptions, festivals, &c. Commerce, which began to flourish at this time in Greece, (in the sixth century before Christ) and her growing political importance, but, above all, the numerous colonies which issued from her, began to attract the attention of foreign nations. A lively intercourse with the other known quarters of the world was the consequence, and gave rise to a more intimate knowledge of foreign countries; in other words, to a more correct geography and cosmography. By the aid of these important auxiliaries, history gained another important advantage; and soon after we find several writers, such as Dionysius and Hecateus from Miletus, Charon and Phereclides from Athens, attempting to give histories of their native countries. Their works have been lost to us, but they were used by subsequent writers.

After this Herodotus arose, the father of philosophical history, and with him the series of the classic historians of ancient Greece commences. Herodotus, a Dorian, from Halicarnassus, represented the successful defence of Grecian freedom against the Persians, as Homer represents the heroic deeds of the Greeks before Troy. For the execution of this great object, as we may truly term it, considering the period and circumstances in which it was undertaken, he travelled in the northern parts of Greece, and over a vast extent of Asia and Egypt; searched in Africa after monuments and historical proofs, and brought before the Greeks the whole mass of his collected materials in numerous historical representations, clothed in the epic form. His history is divided into nine books, which the critics characterised by naming them after the muses. They comprehend a period of two hundred and twenty years, beginning with the Lycian king Gyges, and ending with the victory of the Greeks over the Persians at Mycale. Herodotus wrote in the Ionian dialect, and his style is artless and pleasing to a high degree. His evident striving after truth, the glow of moral and patriotic feeling which pervades his picturesque descriptions, and the vividness of his characteristic delineations, render his history highly interesting. It forms the prosaic counter-part of Homer's Iliad, which served him as a model, and it was during the Olympian games that the Grecian nation became acquainted with it. At a later period it was recited in Corinth, and afterwards, during the Panathenæas, at Athens. It received its finish at Thurium, in Italy, whither Herodotus emigrated with a colony of his countrymen.

While the father of history was reciting his masterwork before the delighted Athenians, a youth was observed shedding tears of joy, admiration, and envy. It was Thucydides, the son of Olorus, a disciple of Anaxagoras and Antiphon, celebrated as a statesman and general. He gave to history another direction, and seizing it in a political point of view, rendered the epic form subordinate to it. Having been deprived of his military office, he undertook to write the history of the eventful Peloponnesian war. He collected the materials with infinite care, and examined them with the most minute attention. His great work consists of eight books, in which he represents the events of the twenty-one years of this desperate struggle. His views evince the mature statesman, but the melancholy sight of the calamities under which his native country groaned, and which he inclined to consider as the direful consequences of the Athenian mobocracy, rendered him sometimes unjust in his views of popular governments. His pictures are, in general, well drawn, but his style, from an eagerness after brevity, is not unfrequently obscure.

The third classical historian in whom Greece gloried was Xenophon, the favourite disciple of Socrates, a man of vast knowledge, and possessing the power of writing in the most pleasing, easy, and tasteful style. He lived chiefly at his country seat, where he composed the greater part of his historical, philosophical, and agricultural works. There reigns a calmness, and a love of mankind in his writings, truly attractive to the humane mind. His Cyropædia, in eight books, may be called a master-piece of historico-political romance. In his Anabasis he describes the history of the war of the younger Cyrus against his brother, and the retreat of the ten thousand Greeks, in the happy termination of which he had so distinguished a part. His history of Greece begins where Thucydides leaves it off, comprehending a period of forty-eight years. Of his philosophical works, the Apology of Socrates, and the Agésilæus, are both of them master-pieces of art and taste.

It is unnecessary to pursue the series of Grecian historians down to Ctesias and Polybius. The road having been paved by these three great men, the models having been given, their successors had only to pursue the track, and in this pursuit new ideas, new points of view could not but suggest themselves.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

METAMORA, OR THE LAST OF THE WAMPANOAGS.—This Indian tragedy was performed, for the first time, on Tuesday evening last, for the benefit of Mr. Forrest. A considerable interest having been excited, long before the rising of the curtain the house was completely filled. The prologue, spoken by Mr. Barrett, was received with enthusiastic applause, and every thing indicated, on the part of the audience, a desire to give the author a favourable reception. The actors, both male and female, were eminently successful in their endeavours to do justice to their several parts, and during the progress of the play, received the most unequivocal proofs of the approbation of their delighted spectators. Independent of the undoubted merit of Metamora, the manager had afforded a gratifying exhibition of scenery, dresses, decorations, &c. We cannot at present particularize respecting the excellence of each actor, but must content ourselves with sketching the plot.

At the restoration of Charles the second, all those who had taken an active part in the impeachment and condemnation of the "martyr king," were induced to seek safety in exile and obscurity. Among these is found an individual, who appears in the play, as Guy of Godalmin. During his passage across the Atlantic, his lady becomes the mother of an infant and expires. Godalmin, still alive to conjugal affection, retains the corpse of his beloved wife; and, in consequence of her nautical birth, names the child Oceana. He arrives at the Plymouth settlement, and there resides, unknown, mysterious, and miserable, until Oceana has attained the age of sixteen, at which period the play opens, discovering Godalmin (Mr. Woodhull) at sunset, in mournful meditation over the lonely tomb of his lamented wife. At this moment an English ship arrives, bearing the lord Fitz-Arnold, (Mr. Richings), an English nobleman, high in favour with the reigning monarch, by whose influence Godalmin hopes to be enfranchised and restored to liberty; the reward, his wealth and the hand of Oceana, (Mrs.

Hilson.) Sir Arthur Vaughan, (Mr. Chapman), an English loyalist, after the execution of his royal master, retires also in disgust to the colonies, the patron of a youth by the name of Horatio, (Mr. Barry), whom he has adopted in place of an only son, whose early death he has not ceased to deplore. Horatio and Oceana become strongly attached, and all their hopes are destroyed by the arrival of Fitz-Arnold, and the report that he comes the fair one's suitor with her father's sanction. Sir Arthur Vaughan forbids all farther communication between the young persons, and the haughty and profligate noble finds in Horatio a rival whom no threats can awe, or splendour dazzle. At this period the seeds of hostility had been sown between the colonists and the chief of the Wampanoags, Metamora, (Mr. Forrest), son of Massasoit, who first received the English pilgrims, and entered into friendly alliance with them. This chieftain, known to the English as "Philip of Mount Hope," appears to the enamoured pair the only friend amid their hopelessness. Grateful for Oceana's kindness when a ferocious wolf attacked and severely wounded him, he warns her of the gathering storm of war, promises to shield her from the fury of his nation, and gives her an eagle's plume as a sure protection from the fury of his warriors. She accepts the boon, and, in obedience to her father's command, goes forth to give an assumed welcome to the noble guest, whose follower, Wolfe, (Mr. Nixon), a mysterious and blunt man, acquaints Horatio that his birth and fortune are not unknown to him. A messenger, Tramp, (Mr. Pacey), now arrives with intelligence of Indian conspiracy, and Horatio becomes the bearer of the news to Godalmin, one of the members of the council, and enters the dwelling of his love, while its halls resound with the welcome with which his rival is greeted.

The second act discovers Metamora in his retreat, with his wife Nahmeoke, (Mrs. Sharpe) and his child. Nahmeoke questions him about the singularity of his actions by day, and his restlessness at night; he insinuates that the encroachments of the strangers disturb him, and darkly hints at the approaching strife of blood. A band of musketeers suddenly appears in his territory, and the leader of the confederate troops (Mr. T. Placide) urges his appearance at the council board to renew his former league of peace, and remove from the minds of the settlers the fears they entertain of his hostility. Spite of the entreaties of Nahmeoke he resolves to go, dismisses his train, and departs alone. Meanwhile Oceana has resisted the suit of lord Fitz-Arnold and flies from the banquet. Godalmin, disappointed, and in despair, confides to her for the first time, the events of his past life, denounces himself to her, declaring that

"Civil commotion and a monarch's death
Make up the past, and poison all to come."

and bids her choose between Horatio and her father's life. At this moment Horatio arrives with the despatches. Godalmin, deeming his presence intrusive, and seeing in him the cause of his daughter's disobedience, insults him with a blow. Swords are drawn, and the mediation of Oceana alone prevents the flow of blood. Oceana is dismissed with her father's malediction, and Fitz-Arnold and Godalmin, after having completed the ruin of Horatio, depart for the council, before the members of which Metamora boldly appears, justifying the descriptions formerly given of him:

"Tow'ring o'er the subject earth he strode,
The grandest model of a mighty man."

He manfully and eloquently urges his natural and hereditary rights; reminds them of his father's kindness to the whites in the days of their feebleness, and denies the accusations against him. An Indian is now produced as a witness of his hostile intentions. He is a confidential follower of Metamora, on whom he had heaped benefits. Failing to induce him to retract his words, he stabs him to the heart before the council, asserts his princely power, and utters a prophetic and terrible denunciation on the whole race of whites. They fire upon him; but, by his dexterity, he evades the shot, which penetrates the side of Godalmin, and the chief escapes to his home breathing vengeance against his enemies, and rousing his warriors to unite in dealing against them an overwhelming blow.

A scene, terribly illustrative of the horrors of Indian warfare, in which the savages are triumphant, and Metamora gives an extraordinary proof of his magnanimity of soul, terminates the third act.

The fourth act discovers Wolfe at the stake, and Indian preparations for sacrifice. Horatio, who has been partly induced by the craft of Fitz-Arnold to undertake the dangerous office, enters, bearing a flag of truce, proposing armistice and return of prisoners. Metamora rejects his proposals as injurious to his people. Wolfe, who is prepared for and expects death, proceeds to acquaint Horatio with the secret of his birth; when a scout, wounded and fainting, informs the astonished chieftain that Nahmeoke and her child, who had been sent into the Narraganset country, have been surprised, and are then captives to the English. The furious chief retains Horatio mounts his horse, and rushes to her rescue. He arrives just in time to release her and her infant from the infatuated and brutal mob, into whose hands, by the contrivance of Fitz-Arnold, they had fallen. Metamora now listens to the pacific overtures of the English. Nahmeoke is liberated and departs; and Metamora delivers himself as security for the ratification of the treaty.

The fifth act is one of deep and overpowering interest, and we are able to give but a feeble outline of its incidents. Godalmin has perished of his wound, and lies interred in the solitary tomb. Oceana mourning his fall, and her own utter desolation, is here encountered by Fitz-Arnold, who presses his suit with violence. Metamora, whom the extraordinary events of the past night had drawn to the spot, bursts from the sepulchre, and appears the champion of Oceana, and the avenger of Nahmeoke's wrongs. The encounter is fatal to Fitz-Arnold, and the chieftain bears off the hapless and homeless girl to his own country. Horatio, being liberated by the treaty from the savages, is found by the confederate soldiers, over the body of his fallen rival Fitz-Arnold. Their former animosity is remembered, and the youth is accused of his murder. Wolfe now makes known to Sir Arthur that he (Sir Arthur) is Horatio's father. His release is effected, and the sound of the war echoes through the colony. Oceana is preserved from a horrid death by the arm of Metamora. After the most heroic and desperate efforts, Metamora's force is destroyed, his child slain by the victorious whites, and he retreats with Nahmeoke to his last hiding-place. A Wampanoag betrays the spot to the allies, who on all sides surround him. To save Nahmeoke from slavery and insult, he slays her with her own consent. The English fire upon him—he meets death fearlessly as he had lived, pronounces a terrible curse upon the whites, and falls to the earth made red with the blood of Nahmeoke, and dies the last of the Wampanoags.

We shall conclude this article, which has occupied more space than we had at first intended, with the prologue and epilogue—written, as will be seen, by gentlemen of acknowledged talent, whose effusions have always been favourably received by the public.

PROLOGUE.

Written by Prosper M. Wetmore, Esq.—Spoken by Mr. Barrett.

Not from the records of Imperial Rome,
Or classic Greece, the muses' chosen home—
From no rich legends of the olden day,
Our bard hath drawn the story of his play:
Led by the guiding hand of genius' wing,
He here hath painted nature on her throne;
His eye hath pierced the forest's shadowy gloom,
And read strange lessons from a nation's tomb:
Brief are the annals of that blighted race—
These halls usurp a monarch's resting place—
Tradition's mist-enveloped page, alone,
Tells that an empire was—we know 'tis gone!
From foreign climes full of the muse hath brought,
Her glorious treasures of gigantic thought;
And here, beneath the witchery of her power,
The eye hath poured its tributary shower:
When modern pens have sought the historic page,
To picture forth the deeds of former age—
O'er soft Virginia's sorrows ye have sighed,
And dropt a tear when spotless beauty died;
When Brutus' "cast his cloud aside," to stand
The guardian of the tyrant-trampled land—
When patriot Tell his crime from thralldom freed,
Your bosoms answered with responsive swell,
For freedom triumphed when the oppressors fell!
These were the melodies of humbler lyres,
The lights of Genius, yet without his fires;
But when the master-spirit struck the chords,
And inspiration breathed her burning words—
When passion's self stalked living o'er the stage,
To plead with love, or rouse the soul to rage,
When Shakespeare led his bright creations forth,
And conjured up the mighty dead from earth,
Breathless—entranced—ye've listened to the line,
And felt the minstrel's power, all but divine!
While thus, your plaudits cheer the stranger lay,
Shall native pens in vain the field essay?
To night we test the strength of native powers,
Subject, and bard, and actor, all are ours—
'Tis yours to judge, if worthy of a name,
And bid them live within the halls of fame!

EPILOGUE.

Written by James Lawson, Esq.—Spoken by Mrs. Hilson.

Before this bar of beauty, taste, and wit,
This host of critics too, who throng the pit,
A trembling bard has been this night arraigned,
And I am counsel in the cause retained.
Here come I then, to plead with nature's art
And speak, less to the law, than to the heart.
A native bard—a native actor too,
Have drawn a native picture to your view;
In fancy, this, brave Indian wrongs arise,
While that, embodied all before your eyes—
Inspired by genius, and by judgment led,
Again the Wampanoag fought and bled—
Rich plants are both of our own fruitful land,
Your smiles the sun that made their leaves expand;
Yet, not that they are native do I plead,
'Tis for their worth alone I ask your need.
How shall I ask ye? Singly? Then I will—
But should I fail? Fail! I must try my skill.

Sir, I know you—I've often seen your face,
And always seated in that self-same place,
Now, in my ear—what think you of our play?
That it has merit truly, he did say:
And that the hero, prop'd on genius' wing,
The Indian forest scoured, like Indian king!
See that fair maid, the tear still in her eye,
And hark! hear not you now that gentle sigh?
Ah! these speak more than language could relate,
The wo-frught heart o'er Nahmeoke's fate.
She scans us not by rigid rules of art,
Her text is feeling, and her judge the heart.
What dost thou say, thou bushy whiskered beaver?
He nods approval—whiskers are the go
Who is he sits the fourth bench from the stage?
There, in the pit!—why he looks wondrous sage!
He seems displeased, his lip denotes a sneer—
O! he's a critic that looks so severe!
Why, in his face I see the attic salt—
A critic's merit is to find a fault.
What fault find you, sir? eh? or you, sir? None!
Then, if the critic's mute, my cause is won
Yea, by that burst of loud heart-felt applause,
I feel that I have gained my client's cause.
Thanks, that our strong demerits you forgive,
And bid our bard and Metamora live.

The sprightly and graceful intelligence, so peculiar to Mrs. Hilson, with which this little poem was delivered, were irresistible. Those who were not present can form no idea of the effect which she produced, and she retired amid the most deafening acclamations.

THE TIMES, OR LIFE IN NEW-YORK.—A comedy under this title, which has been for some time in preparation, was performed last week for the first time, to a very numerous and fashionable audience, and went off with great eclat. The piece is very amusing. It makes no pretensions to the title of a regularly constructed or sterling drama, but consists of a dozen or so of scenes thrown cleverly though loosely together, exhibiting the manners and habits of the worthy inhabitants of this city, and the birds of passage that flock to it and through it from every quarter of the globe, and sketches, pleasantly enough, a few of their follies and peculiarities. The character of the individuals brought into collision are strongly opposed to, and of course contrast well with each other. There is a pretended English baronet on his travels, a Frenchman, two Broadway dandies, (a black and a white) a plain merchant and his fashionable wife, a talking speculating Yankee, and a brace of young ladies and young gentlemen. Some of the jokes are old, though without being stale, but as they are adroitly introduced and well-told, they answer just as well as new ones, and there is considerable bustle and knowledge of stage effect displayed throughout. Altogether it appears as if it were the careless off-hand production of an exceedingly clever writer. The actors exerted themselves successfully. Placide, who does every thing as it ought to be done, made an excellent Frenchman, and his younger brother, T. Placide, as the African exquisite, looked and talked as though he had never worn a lighter complexion; the scene where these two take their wine together, was one of the liveliest in the piece. Mr. Simpson and Mrs. Wheatley made the best of two very naturally drawn, (we are afraid) and therefore repulsive! characters, and Richings played a Broadway loungeur to the life. Barry looked and talked like a frank and gentlemanly Englishman, and Mrs. Sharpe made a very pretty and spirited American girl. We think Mrs. Wallack ought to have played the other lady rather than Mrs. Hackett, who is more at home in ladies' maids than young ladies. The main attraction however was Mr. Hackett's Industrious Doolittle, who, contrary to what the latter part of his name imports, did enough to keep the audience in a merry mood from the beginning to end. The piece has been twice repeated, and bids fair to have a run.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Editorial miseries.—The miseries of editors are proverbial. Not to mention bad debts, and the demure countenances of printer's devils, they are compelled to endure others of a more vague, but equally unpleasant description. Among these is the disagreeable necessity of sometimes giving unintentional offence. Readers condemn us for publishing what they think we should not, and authors for not publishing what they think we should. Between these two rocks we have dangerous navigation. If we reject a communication as not sufficiently interesting for the Mirror, monsieur poet gets in a rage—attacks us with all the dignity of newspaper malice, and consigns us and our poor paper to ruin. To candid censure we are always willing to submit, and when we know it springs not from personal feeling, are grateful for it; but against this method which private enemies have of assuming the tone of a public censor, in order to vent their own spleen, we beg leave to protest. We are sorry to have offended any, but cannot alter our habits in consequence of undeserved rebuke. "These quips, the career of our humour," although as many spiteful paragraphs should be spit forth against us as were ever elicited by Sam Patch or the immortal William Morgan.

Waverly Novels.—Twenty-two thousand copies are printed of each volume of the new edition of the Waverly novels. Ten thousand copies are sold in Edinburgh, and twelve thousand are sent to London, of which four thousand are sent to Ireland. Murray has just printed a new edition of the "Life of Napoleon," consisting of ten thousand copies. To this edition a copious index is added, highly advantageous and useful to the readers of the life of that extraordinary personage.

Theatrical Anecdote.—A few weeks ago, Shakspeare's tragedy of Macbeth was enacted in one of our southern cities. The house was crowded in every part in consequence of a celebrated actor personating the ambitious Thane. In the third scene, after the witches had wound up their infernal charm, preparatory to the entrance of Macbeth, instead of the first witch breaking off in the usual manner, exclaiming

"A drum, a drum!"

to which her sister in iniquity has to respond,

"Macbeth doth come,"

was an abrupt pause, and for a very good and sufficient reason, namely, that no sound proceeding from a drum met either the listening ears of the first witch or the audience. Macbeth surprised, as well he might be, at thus being ushered on the stage in solemn silence, turned round to inquire for the martial music. "No drum in the theatre, sir," whispered a supernumerary, in the guise of a Scottish soldier. "The devil!" exclaimed the thane of Glamis, "have you anything that will make a noise?" "Nothing but a trumpet, sir." "Sound the trumpet then," exclaimed Macbeth in a phrenzy, and utterly regardless of consequences. The trumpeter sounded, according to orders, and the first witch, being thus taken "all aback," substituted, on the spur of the moment, her own language for that of the immortal bard's, and cried out, to which the other, observing Macbeth stumble in consequence of his perturbation, instantly replied,

"A trumpet, a trumpet!"

"Macbeth doth stump it!"

to the no small amusement of the audience, who were highly delighted at this unexpected transmutation of the sublime into the ridiculous. The cause which led to this novel piece of stage effect, was a militia muster having been held that day, and not a drum was to be had for love or money; and thus it came to pass that the royal army of the "gracious Duncan" was left destitute of this indispensable military appendage.

The Weather.—Perhaps on the whole surface of the globe there is no climate so variable and fickle as that of these United States. Two or three months ago, and it was as cold and chilly as December or January; now in December, it is actually as mild as May, and the ladies are to be seen fluttering along Broadway as gay as butterflies, and as brilliant and many-coloured as the rainbow. But this is not all: the south and the north appear to have changed places, for we find a St. Louis editor complaining of the frost being so severe in that latitude that "a house on the edge of a volcano would be no bad thing." If our climate continues changing as rapidly for ten years to come, as it has done for the ten last past, we should not be surprised to find skating in June, and green peas in January.

Penmanship.—Among the useful and polite accomplishments that are indispensable in female education, that of penmanship is certainly not of minor importance; and yet how few, comparatively speaking, how very few females write a good hand. This ought not to be so. Parents and instructors should be more particular on this subject, if they wish the tender plants committed to their charge, to become useful and ornamental members of society. To such as have not already acquired the practice of writing a neat hand we would recommend an application to Mrs. Dodge, who teaches this elegant art. This lady has been very successful in her vocation, as we can testify by specimens exhibited by several of her pupils.

Clara Fisher's New Song.—Firth and Hall have just published one of Miss Clara Fisher's most favourite boudoir songs, called "Come, let us trip it lightly, love." The words are by S. Woodworth, Esq. and adapted to the harp and piano-forte, from a much-admired Italian air, with accompaniments, by Taylor. It is a very pretty and agreeable melody, and the poetry, which most ad-

MISCELLANY.

PERSEVERANCE UNDER DIFFICULTIES.—The late professor Heyne, of Göttingen, was one of the greatest classical scholars of his own or any other age; yet he had spent the first thirty-three years of his life not only in obscurity, but in almost incessant struggle with the most depressing poverty. He had been born indeed amidst the miseries of the lowest indigence, his father being a poor weaver, with a large family, for whom his best exertions were often unable to provide bread. In the memoirs of his own life, Heyne says, "Want was the earliest companion of my childhood. I well remember the painful impression made on my mind by witnessing the distress of my mother when without food for her children. How often have I seen her, on a Saturday evening, weeping and wringing her hands, as she returned from an unsuccessful effort to sell the goods which the daily and nightly toils of my father had manufactured!" His parents sent him to a child's school. Having learnt every thing comprised in the usual course of the school, he felt a desire to learn latin. A son of the school-master was willing to teach him at the rate of four pence a week, but the difficulty of paying so large a sum seemed insurmountable. One day he was sent to his god-father, who was a baker, in pretty good circumstances, for a loaf; as he went along, he pondered sorrowfully on this great object of his wishes, and entered the shop in tears. The good-tempered baker, on learning the cause of his grief, undertook to pay the required fee for him—at which Heyne tells us, he was perfectly intoxicated with joy, and as he ran, all ragged and bare-foot, through the streets, tossing the loaf in the air, it slipped from his hands and rolled into the gutter. This accident, and a sharp reprimand from his parents, who could ill afford such a loss, brought him to his senses. What sustained his courage in these circumstances (we here use his own words) was neither ambition nor presumption, nor even the hope of one day taking his place among the learned. The stimulus that incessantly spurred him on was the feeling of the humiliation of his condition—the shame with which he shrunk from the thought of that degradation which the want of a good education would impose upon him—above all, the determined resolution of battling courageously with fortune. He was resolved to try, he said, whether, although she had thrown him among the dust, he would not be able to rise by his own efforts. His ardour for study only allowed himself two nights' sleep in the week; and all the while his god-father (not the good-tempered baker, but another, a well endowed but parsimonious churchman) scarcely ever wrote to him but to inveigh against his indolence—often actually addressing his letters on the outside, "To M. Heyne, idler, at Leipsic."

I AM ENGAGED.—As a sufficient answer to the charge of fickleness brought by Cobbett, in a late article, against the American fair, we insert the following short extract from Levasseur's journal of the tour of La Fayette in America.

"The American ladies are not more remarkable for their severe conjugal fidelity than the girls are for their constancy to their engagements. At parties I have often had young ladies pointed out to me of eighteen or nineteen, who had been engaged, and of whose future husbands, one was in Europe, pursuing his studies, another in China, attending his commercial business, and a third dangerously employed in the whale fishery, in the most distant seas. Young girls thus engaged, hold the middle place in society between their still disengaged companions and the married ladies. They have already lost some of the thoughtless gaiety of the former, and assumed a slight tinge of the other. The numerous aspirants, designated here by the name of beaux, which at first surrounded them, and were received until a choice was made, still bestow upon them delicate attentions, but by no means so particular as formerly, and should one of them, either from ignorance or obstinate hopes, persist in offering his heart and hand, the answer "I am engaged," given with a sweet frankness and an indulgent smile, soon destroys all his illusions, without wounding his pride. Engagements of this sort preceding marriage are very common, not only in New-York, but throughout the United States; and it is exceedingly rare that they are not fulfilled with religious fidelity. Public opinion is very severe on this point, and does not spare either of the parties which may dispose of themselves without the consent of the other."

SENSIBILITY OF GENIUS.—When Burns resided in Edinburgh, his company was eagerly sought after by the bon-vivants, who yet continue to hold their meetings in their old retreat at the Canongate; they claimed him as the choicest spirit in their revels, and held out all the temptations that pleasant society and a deep carousal could afford, to induce him to remain amongst them. But Burns's temperament was as full of vicissitude as his life. He was sensitive to the first approach of the disagreeable, and shrunk even from convivial intercourse, unless his companions were congenial to his taste. When they found him "in the vein," therefore, they knew his value, and cherished him. On one occasion he dined with a confidential friend, who, finding him in a most sparkling and jovial mood, induced him to accompany him in the evening to the meeting of their companions at the Canongate. Burns's vivacity promised a rich fund of humour and glee, and his friend, our informant, auguring from the delightful temper in which he had caught the poet, promised the members an enjoyment of the highest order. Burns entered the room, and took his seat beside his friend. The chair was called, and festivity began. An hour passed away, and poor Burns was silent; several attempts to excite his hilarity were made in vain, and during the remainder of the evening he could not be roused even to a smile. At last the disappointed assembly broke up, and the poet forming a little coterie of four or five of his own immediate and attached friends, repaired to that little sanctum, known by the name of Burns's Coffin—which, we are sorry to say, is on the point of being sacrificed to some modern street improvements. Here the repressed enthusiasm shone out—his heart was on his lips in a moment—and, forgetting the gloom of the preceding scene, he charmed his own little circle with songs and recitations, until the "peep o' dawn." When his friend inquired the cause of his silence in the club, his answer was characteristic of the susceptibility of his mind, "I didna like the face o' the carl who sat in the chair!"

DON'T BE DISCOURAGED.—Don't be discouraged, if in the outset of life, things do not go so smoothly. It seldom happens that the hopes we cherish of the future are realized. The path of life, in the prospect, appears smooth and level enough, but when we come to travel it, we find it all up hill, and generally rough. The journey is a laborious one, and whether poor or wealthy, high or low, we shall find it so to our disappointment, if we have built on any other calculation. To endure cheerfully what must be, and to elbow our way as easily as we can, hoping for little, yet striving for much, is perhaps the true plan.—But don't be discouraged, if occasionally you slip by the way, and your neighbours tread over you a little; in other words, don't let a failure or two dishearten you—accidents happen; miscalculations will sometimes be made; things will often turn out differently from our expectations, and we may be sufferers. It is worth while to remember that fortune is like the skies in April, sometimes clouded, and sometimes clear and favourable, and it would be folly to despair of again seeing the sun, because to-day is stormy; so it is equally unwise to sink into despondency, when fortune frowns, since, in the common course of things, she may be surely expected to smile again. And again. Don't be discouraged, if you are deceived in the people of the world: it often happens that men wear borrowed characters as well as borrowed clothes, and sometimes those who have long stood fair before the world, are very rotten at the core. From sources such as these, you may be most unexpectedly deceived; and you will naturally feel sore under such deceptions; but to those you must become used; if you fare as most people do, they will lose their novelty before you grow gray and you will learn to trust men, cautiously, and examine their characters closely, before you allow them great opportunities to injure you. Don't be discouraged under any circumstances. Go steadily forward. Rather consult your own conscience than the opinions of men, though the last is not to be disregarded. Be industrious—be frugal—be honest: deal in perfect kindness with all who come in your way, exercising a neighbourly and obliging spirit in your whole intercourse, and if you do not prosper as rapidly as any of your neighbours, depend upon it you will be as happy.

SICILIAN NOBILITY.—Of the character and condition of the Sicilian nobles—says Mr. Galt—I have uniformly received but one opinion. The time of by far the greater number is spent in the pursuit of amusement, and of any other object than the public good. The most of them are in debt, and the incomes of but few are adequate to their wants; many are in a state of absolute beggary.

One evening, as I happened to be returning home, I fell in with a procession of monks and soldiers bearing an image of St. Francis; and not having seen any thing of the kind before, I went with the crowd into a church towards which the procession was moving. While reckoning the number of the friars as they entered, and having reached a hundred and seventy, all excellent subjects for soldiers, a well-dressed gentleman came up to me, and, bowing, pointed to some of the ornaments as objects worthy of a stranger's curiosity; but, perceiving me shy of entering into conversation with him, and the procession entering the church at the same time, he walked, or was forced by the current of the crowd, away.

The idol being placed near the high altar, the crowd began to chant a hymn. As they all fell on their knees, and my tight prejudices and pantaloon would not permit me to do the same, I turned into one of the side chapels, and, leaning against the railing of the altar, began to speculate on the spectacle before me, when the stranger again accosted me. Somewhat disconcerted by the interruption, and by the forwardness of the man, I abruptly quitted my place. But, before I had moved two steps, he approached, and bowing, said, "I am the Baron M., and my palace is just opposite." At this instant the worshippers rose, and the procession turning to go out at one of the side doors near where we were standing, before I could retreat, I found myself involved in the crowd, and obliged to go with the stream. When I reached the street, I found the stranger again at my side. This is very extraordinary, thought I; and, without seeming to notice him, walked away. He followed; and when we had got out of the nucleus of the throng, he seized me firmly by the arm, and drew me aside. Enraged and alarmed at this mysterious treatment, I shook him fiercely from me. For about the time that one might count twenty, he seemed to hesitate; and then, suddenly coming back, repeated in Italian, with considerable energy, "I—I am the Baron M. This is my palace; but I have nothing to eat!" I looked at the building, near the gate of which we were then standing; it was old and ruinous; there was no lamp in the court-yard, and only a faint light glimmering in one of the windows.

Mistaking my silence and astonishment, he pulled out his watch, and, placing it in my hand, entreated me to give him some money. As I had no disposition to become a pawn-broker, I returned it with some expression of surprise, and took out my purse with the intention of giving it to him, for it only contained two or three small pieces. But here all the solemnity of the adventure terminated. He snatched it out of my hand, and emptying the contents into his own, returned it; and wishing me good night, ran into the gateway.

CONSTANTINE.—The following anecdote will illustrate his character a little, under the double aspect of bigot and of tyrant. A young nobleman, during service in a church at Warsaw, at which Constantine was present, happened, most likely unconsciously, to put his hand to his head, and turn his hair back, by passing his fingers through it. The grand duke observing the action, as soon as the service was concluded, ordered him into custody, and had the hair on one side of his head, from front to back, shaved off. In this condition the young nobleman was paraded, bareheaded, through the streets; Constantine exclaiming, "I'll teach you to play the dandy in church," or words to that effect. This anecdote, which we relate on good authority, will remind many of our readers of the "fantastic tricks" of his father, the Emperor Paul, whom indeed, he is said strongly to resemble, both in mind and person.

CHINESE JEST.—A man sent a note to a rich neighbour he was on friendly terms with, to borrow an ox for a few hours. The worthy old man was no scholar, and happened to have a guest sitting with him at the time, that he did not wish to expose his ignorance to. Opening the note, and pretending to read it, after reflecting a moment, turning to the servant, "Very good," says he, "tell your master I'll come myself presently." A story is told of a magistrate in England, who got out of a predicament of nearly the same kind, rather more adroitly. He happened to have a note brought him by a servant, who took the liberty of telling his superior that he had the wrong end of the note to him, on observing him attempt to read it in that position. "What, sir?" retorted the dignitary, "do you suppose that I am a magistrate in this city, and cannot read a letter with any end to me I please?"

ALL RULES HAVE EXCEPTIONS.—Two whiskered dandies, with hair enough upon their upper lips to make a grenadier's cap, went the other day to the academy of fine arts. On reading the inscription over the door, "No dogs admitted," the foremost turned to his friend and wittily observed, "You must go back, Fred, you see they don't admit you." "Oh don't be frightened, gentlemen," said the door-keeper, "you may both come in;" adding, while pocketing the cash, "the regulation does not extend to puppies."

A Yankee and an English captain, each in a schooner, tried their speed in Gibraltar bay, when our countryman beat John Bull all hollow. They met on shore, the next day, and the Englishman swore that he had never been outsailed before. "Just like me," said Jonathan, "my Jemima never beat nothing afore."

RUTH AND NAOMI.

THE morn was breaking—night had passed away;
And flashing streaks of light, far spread along
Th' illuminated east, gave token fair
Of the bright sun's approach: the golden wheat
Hung heavily and ripe—the full leaved trees
Were waving gladly in the morning air—
And little birds, just waking from repose,
Were carolling to heaven their tuneful songs.
It was a time for gladness—nature seemed
Alive with joy, and breathing of delight.
Yet mid this scene so redolent of bliss,
Naomi's heart was sad; into this land,
A few short years before, with husband, sons,
And all to bless her, had she come—had fled
A country frowned on by the Lord—and here
Had made her happy home.

Alas! alas!

The change how sad! the future how forlorn!
Alone—bereft—deserted—desolate—
Motherless—widow—she—

No marvel then

If amid nature's joy her heart were sad.
She rose to leave the land. Why should she stay?
What was there now that she should linger there?
Could it, with all its rich luxuriance,
Again restore to her those lovely ones
That now, in cold unconsciousness, lay dark
Beneath its sod? Ah no! ah no! upon
The earth she ne'er shall see them more! The thought,
Like sudden violent death, struck with fierce
Agony upon her inmost heart. Starting,
With fearful groan, she fled in haste, as though
Rapidity of motion could o'ercome
Excess of grief.

But Ruth had watched her—she,
Naomi's youngest son had called his own!
She too was written widow; and she knew
The awful desolation of the name.
She caught Naomi's robe, and, kneeling down,
Looked up with streaming eyes into her face.
Naomi paused. "Return, my child, to those Who loved and cherished thee, ere thou became
The wife of the departed—Let me go!"
Then, as a flash, over the heart of Ruth
Rushed the fond thought of home, in all the warmth
Of sweet affection, and the kindred ties
That bound her closely to the dear ones there;
The well remembered faces, and the tones
That sank within her soul, like richest music.
Shall she for ever part with these? She paused—
"Twas but a moment—as she gazed at her—
The aged and stricken one—the desolate—
She who in this wide world now stood alone!
She who had been the mother of her love—
Her young and buried love—and as the thought
Of their well-remembered affection, in its strength
And undecaying freshness, which not death
Itself could wither, rushed upon her mind,
Her high resolve was fixed—and her young heart
Was firm in holy purpose, as she spake:
"I will not leave thee nor forsake thee—no.
Entreat me not, my mother! wheresoe'er
Thy footsteps wander, there I'll follow thee.
Thy people shall be mine—thy God, my God!
I'll live and die with thee, and the same grave
Shall cover both! Thy hand, my mother!"

MEMORY.

Joy's recollection is no longer joy,
While sorrow's memory is a sorrow still.—Byron.

'Thou com'st in gloom and sorrow back,
'Thou of the lightning wing!
Over what dark and sterile track
Hast thou been wandering?

"O'er thy past life's deserted path,"
The pensive spirit said,
"Where many a pallid phantom hath My lingering steps delayed."

If from the spectre-peopled past
'Thou com'st, I ask not now
Why grief hath dimmed thine eye, and cast
Her shadows o'er thy brow.

Yet still to me 'tis charmed ground,
Then say, O memory, what
Of sad or joyous hast thou found
In that dim haunted spot?

And, memory answered, "I have met
Full many a mournful shade,
Dark grief, pale fear, and vain regret,
And love by scorn repaid.

"The ghost of many a blighted joy,
Of hopes too soon decayed,
Of pleasures mixed with grief's alloy,
And prospects doomed to fade.

"Of pain, and suffering, and woe,
Fresh feelings by the chill
Of cold neglect checked in their flow,
And others darker still:

"The shades of many a misspent hour
Arose upbraidingly,
And time and talents wasted, wore
An aspect stern to me.

"And evermore a darker shape
Still closely followed me,
Remorse, I vainly strove to 'scape,
Or from the spectre flee."

Sad is thy tale, O memory:
But in thy weary flight
Didst thou no gentler phantoms see,
Nor aught of fair and bright?

"Yes! ever and anon bright forms,
Though indistinctly seen,
Arose in mildly beaming charms
Those spectres dark between;

"Bright dreams, sweet visions, moments pure
Of unalloyed delight,
Yet ere my eye could scan them o'er,
They faded from my sight."

Sad spirit! thine's the only eye
That brighter sees through tears;
All that looks smiling, unto thee
A faded aspect wears.

Away! I'd woo the lethean stream
To free me from thy power,
Did it exist in aught save dream
Of fancy's fevered hour.

The only boon which thou couldst give
I never may call mine;
Thou in my heart dost ever live,
I ne'er shall live in thine.

POPULAR TALES.

A QUARTER OF AN HOUR TOO SOON.

BY HORACE SMITH.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER THE LAST.

I SAILED for the land of rum and sugar, leaving behind me the land of glory and gazettes; was scorched to a beefsteak by the sun; was drenched by dews that drop like ice upon the boiling pores; feasted without appetite; idled without ease; danced without gaiety; rambed without amusement, and made love without liking. The soul and body of man are melted under the eternal rage of the bluest sky that ever looked lovely in romance and terrible in reality. I had many a moralizing evening upon the subject, when I lay on the floor of my barrack-room, wooing the tardy rising of the sea-breeze, and envying the life of a glass-blower, an iron-founder, a mouse in an exhausted receiver, or even a chancellor of the exchequer, budget in hand, proving at midnight, in a "full house," debt to be credit, and expenditure to be income.

However, even in the West Indies there are events. The cannon of Kingston began to roar, and the whole island of Jamaica was on the alert to welcome the governor on his return from England. The frigate, with her flags, lay glowing in the offing like a colossal show-box. The harbour was all bustle, the streets were all holiday, and every creature that called itself christian was flourishing in all its finery. But the day waned, and the breeze disappointed our loyalty, and defrauded the governor of his dinner on shore. I was gazing on the pageant from my window, when the orderly came in to announce a full-dress parade for six o'clock, the expected hour of the sea-breeze and the governor. I put on my harness at my leisure, and, seeing preparations making for the landing, wandered down to the water's edge. A boatful of females was just arriving from the frigate. The populace were too much charmed with the novelty of fair faces to consider what became of the bodies; and, in the course of a general rush to receive the passengers, the boat was plunged under the surf. The danger was little, and the damage nothing, except to Bond-street hats and bonnets, caps from Paris, and a superb lavender silk pelisse utterly ruined on the person of the first dame d'autour of the lady in command of the commander of the forces. As I happened to be the only red coat present, I bustled through the mulatto crowd, and took charge of the rescued fair, in their wet drapery costume, to the first hotel.

The clock struck six as I entered. The rescue and march had occupied just fifteen minutes; fatal fifteen minutes!

My protégée was the prettiest creature that had visited these truant eyes since they saw the shores of Devon sink into the Atlantic blue. Alarm, gratitude, and novelty, were in their loveliest shapes, sounds, and colours, in the young beauty. The cheek, the lip, the voice, the foot, the figure, all seemed to me made by a spell, and made to touch every other human being with a spell. When she disappeared within the door, I could have sworn that the sun was extinguished, or have sat, like Cesario, and all night "called upon my soul within the house."
No Romeo was ever more completely "stabbed by a white wench's black eye." I made speeches to the winds; blundered my company into the particular observation of our deputy-assistant-adjutant-general, a martinet of twenty, red-hot from Bagshot; committed the etourderie of asking half the regiment what they thought of my Venus; and set every man down for a fool or blind who did not pronounce her "made to enchant all hearts and charm all eyes."

The governor landed in pomp; but, for me, he might as well have been landing at Tower stairs; I saw but the boat which had conveyed the loveliest freight that ever enriched the shores of Jamaica. The town was in a blaze of lamps, candles, and fireworks; but I abjured the glory of them all, to take possession of a hen-coop, overlooking the garden of the hotel from which I watched the marches of a solitary taper across the windows of a chamber containing, in my judgment, the "one entire and perfect chrysolite," for which the governor and council, with all their adjuncts, would have been a cheap sacrifice.

I paid my respects at the hotel next day with the devotedness of a Persian to the rising sun; but my sun shone not;
her cold bath in the surf had made her ill; and for three whole days—let lovers judge their length—I lingered rather than lived; watching the ominous faces of the physicians. In the mean time, I received many a laughing congratulation upon the wisdom of my choice. The lovely Adeline was the niece of the major-general; and promotion, the staff, and all kinds of military good fortune, were in the relationship. I loftily scoffed at the thought of any possession but the brightest eyes and most bewitching smile at that hour within sight of the Blue Mountains. At length my permission came from the doctor; his patient was convalescent. I was admitted; and, in the recess of a shaded room, saw Adeline looking prettier than ever. The heat, or the surprise, or, as I delighted to think, some recollection of our adventure, heightened the colour in her cheek; but I had scarcely heard the tones of a voice

"Sweet as the shepherd's pipe upon the mountains,
When all his little flock's at feed before him," when the door was solemnly thrown open, and in stalked the major-general. I saw ruin in the glance that he shared between my idol and myself. But he was shrewd enough to avoid coming to extremities at once. Politeness, the stern politeness of fifty-five and a commander of the forces, was upon his lips; and after speaking, in the commendatory style of an order that might have figured in the regimental book, of my services on the landing, of my regiment, and so forth, he congratulated me on the promptitude of my visit, which he took entirely to himself. "Rely on the experience of an old soldier, young man," said he, "promptitude is every thing in this world: fifteen minutes later, you would not have found me here; and ten to one if I should have ever heard of your attention in the multitude of things and persons that I have to do with. The consequence would have been, that you would have been left to the aide-du-camp, or perhaps to a titre-à-titre with my niece, when you expected to meet me." I bowed to the forces. But now I am going to visit the ments; my horses are at the door, and you shall be my captain of guides, and show me the way. You see what may be done by fifteen minutes."

I envied a galley-slave: but the die was cast. We mounted, rode for half a dozen hours, and ended the day twenty miles from the spot that held my enchantress. I could have wished this confounded fellow in the bottom of every pond in the twenty miles. But he condescended to express himself amused by my talk, and talked in turn. He was clever and well-informed, had seen a vast deal of service, and known a crowd of the people that the world talk about. The wine exhilarated him; and, except for the recollection of the black eyes and coral lips of my pretty Adeline, I could not have passed a pleasant evening. But the wine, his fluent and fashionable pleasantries, and my own rash brains, laid me at his mercy; and by supper-time he was master of every fragment of my story, every circumstance of my family, and every thought of my heart. We parted next day at the entrance of Kingston, the best friends on earth, and with the general's promise, that "merits and talents like mine should not be long confined to the regimental routine."

He kept his word religiously. On that very evening's parade, the colonel informed me that I was appointed to the quarter-master-general's department in—Honduras! I was thunderstruck: I would have as soon heard—Siberia. I felt myself completely banished; and in my wrath that night I doubly eclipsed the exploits of our troops in Flanders. To shoot the general, elope with the niece, and declare war against mankind, were my first resolves. But I was under eyes that knew the ways of subalterns in love. An aide-du-camp waited on me in half an hour with the major-general's compliments and congratulations on "an appointment in which I might have so many valuable opportunities of distinction; and, to enhance the favour, as I was of course anxious to enter upon my career as soon as possible, a passage was provided for me in a vessel which sailed at midnight."

I tried to extract some intelligence about Adeline, but the aide-de-camp was prepared upon that point too; and with the true nonchalance of the staff, let out that she was infinitely admired, perfectly disposed to enjoy admiration, and would probably be opening the ball at government-house about the time I was embarking.

The last news was more consoling than my friend of the silver epaulette intended. In a burst of rage I gave the whole heartless sex to the winds, abandoned my purpose of shooting myself for that night, and, plucking Cupid's quiver from my soul, sullenly packed up my baggage, wrote a supercilious letter to the general, and went forth to battle the mosquitoes in their own kingdom.

My fifteen minutes were the price of three years of this warfare; in which nothing but a miracle, and my acquiring the skin and colour of an Indian, prevented me from being picked to the bone. While a white particle remained upon my person, I was the prey of "legion, for they were many." But I at length became undistinguishable from a savage or a sweep; and, by the close of my banishment, even the mosquitoes could scarcely pierce a cuticle tanned as mine was, by sand, sun, and salt-water.

In the mean time the world was going round. While my campaigns were limited to the demolition of English porter and sangaree, rat-shooting, and sanguinary encounters with a race of skirmishers who would have had the better of Bonaparte himself, the peninsula was ringing with the exploits of my countrymen; Wellington was hunting down the marshals of France as fast as he started them; my old regiment made a flourishing figure in the despatches; and, to my surprise and immortal envy, I saw my lazy friend Jack gazetted major.

The quarter of an hour had done this. Had I lingered but till the last boat had carried the last man of the regiment on board, I should have worn Jack's two epaulettes in the field of glory, instead of sitting in a West Indian hovel, broiling, bitten, naked, miserable, and a subaltern.

But changes nearer home had occurred. The major-general was dead of the yellow fever, and Adeline was gone in the universal scattering of his household. Inquiries were profitless; for in the blessed climate of the sugar islands society passes away as fast as the cane crop; and no one troubles himself about the will of fortune. General, staff, and niece, were as much wiped out of the public mind as the last year's almanac.

I adopted a desperate resolution. A handsome Spanish Creole, of a certain age, a widow, with a plantation, a hundred thousand dollars, and a very obvious inclination for a second husband, had for some time flattered me with her peculiar notice. Europe, Adeline, and glory, had hitherto eclipsed the solid fascinations of the gay Creole. But my mistress was gone, Europe was still three thousand miles off, and glory would probably terminate in the marsh fever, if I remained through another autumn. I determined to take compassion on the Spaniard; went through the regular process without delay; gave a serenade under her window from the midst of a blooming tobacco-field; made her a present of cigars from the Casa Reale of the Havana; swore that English cheeks were contemptible beside her olive beauties; and found that the grand captivation of the soul lay in diamond eyes of the exact size and setting of her own.

For this I was honoured with the most gracious smiles of the really handsome widow; and the honour was not without its price; for, on the very evening of my proposing for her, by the light of a moon to which our best English moon is but a watchman's lantern, and in the midst of a thousand flowers mixing ten thousand perfumes with my vows, with showers of fire-flies striking the light like little topazes and emeralds from their wings, and millions of conscious stars twinkling above in vain emulation, as I swore, of my Spaniard's sparkling eyes; I received, on my return through a lane of vines and mangoes, two stabs of a dirk, which laid me on my bed for a month, and which, but for the thickness of my cloak, or the presence of the cherub that protects true lovers, would have ended my courtships on this earth. Who my rival was, turned out a hopeless question, where every sallow idler in the settlement was longing for the hundred thousand dollars. My suspicions fell upon the lady's father confessor, who had objected to the match on a religious scruple. But I recovered in spite of his holy zeal: the lady was, of course, only the more bent on her purpose by discovering that it displeased the world, and the day for the ceremony was fixed.

I had hitherto followed up the affair with something of the indigenous languor of the climate. But an Englishman, an officer, and on his wedding-day too! I galloped in full caparison to my jocund bride, to anticipate, by at least a few minutes, the creole crowd. My bride was unluckily not yet ready; for she was clearing her conscience to her confessor. I had just fifteen minutes to spare; and, thinking myself entitled to the secrets of the house, strolled away to examine my property. The day was burning; and, half strangled with the heat, I opened the door of a recess which looked into the gardens. I was overwhelmed with surprise. Before me were painted in a large mirror the form, the countenance, the matchless grace, of Adeline!

I dreaded to break the illusion by a word, and stood in mystic silence at the door, gazing with delight and wonder. The figure was busy about some embroidery: at length I saw its head raised, and heard a cry of astonishment, as our shapes stood in the mirror together. I sprang into the room, and caught—Adeline in my arms. What was the shortness of our acquaintance to me? I had loved her three long years. She blushed, was full of confusion, and I had the rashness, the folly, the cruelty, to force her to acknowledge that there was no one whom she liked better. Those were mad moments!—Adeline looked lovelier than ever. She attempted to tell me some of her story, of which I did not give myself time to comprehend one word. I attempted to explain on my part, and succeeded only to the extent of making the whole matter unintelligible. What smiles, what charming sighs, what bewitching confusion, were hers! My whole being was in a tumult of fondness and amazement. I could have mercilessly gazed for ever, raising perpetual blushes on the cheek of the overwhelmed and exquisite creature before me, when a slight noise made me glance in the mirror. There stood a third figure to finish the group, very handsome, superbly dressed, and with every fire of wronged woman flashing from her immense eyes. My bride had been more expeditious with her confession than I had with mine. A fourth figure next presented itself to fill up the back-ground—the father confessor, whose countenance bore neither wrath nor wonder, but the most sanctified complacency. Not a syllable passed on the occasion: the whole was pantomime, but as expressive as ever was performed on the stage.

The lady and the confessor retired. The pendule struck the quarter, and I recognised the hand of destiny. But I resolved to snatch something from fortune, and if I must fall, fall like Cæsar. I importuned Adeline to take her chance with me, telling her that "she would be sacrificed by the Creole or her spiritual guide: she must be separated, probably for ever, from one who loved her beyond the earth besides: and he too felt so miserable with this hope deferred that he could scarcely wish to live."

Adeline was not easily wrought upon by my eloquence; but she was wrought upon at last. She gave me a sketch of her story. The major-general had brought her with him to Jamaica, in the idea of completing a match long arranged between her and the opulent son of a government civil officer. But, for some reason or other, which even I could not prevail on her to assign, immediately on her arrival in the island, she had declared her determination to live and die single. Matches of a still higher rank were proposed, but she grew more inveterate, until the major-general gave up the project. Claret, company, and a hot autumn, soon deprived the service of that clever and companionable officer; and Adeline found herself without a shilling, a home, or a connexion. The orphan girl was now on her rather circuitous way to England, having been consigned to the protection of the Spaniard, until a frigate should touch at Honduras on its return from conveying an expedition. The quarter of an hour had robbed me of a hundred thousand dollars, and given me love and beggary in exchange!

To remain under the Creole's roof was dangerous; and to acquaint her with our resolution would make the danger certain. I proposed that at midnight I should be in waiting with a barge to convey us to the first island where we could find a British chaplain. The eventful hour came. I landed, left my negroes with the oars in their hands ready to fly swift as a dolphin, reached the house, made the signal, and was instantly covered over head and ears with a huge sackcloth. I struggled like a lion; but the more I struggled the more tightly I was tied. I roared, and the roaring was answered by peals of negro laughter, and by a ligature round my throat, that gave me the nearest conception of being hanged. The laughter died, struggle ceased, and I felt myself sweeping along with the smoothness of a bird. I heard a roaring of waves; was dashed by water, whose taste told me that I was at sea, and by whose motion I was unquestionably rolling through the surf that borders every island. I raved, I howled, I tore, and all equally in vain; till, utterly exhausted, and in as much misery as a man can feel, who knows death to be close to him without the slightest power of helping himself, I either fainted or fell asleep; to awake in the cabin of his majesty's frigate, the Warspite, in a tumbling sea, in the full sunshine of noon, and out of sight of land.

I had been found tossing on the water ten leagues from shore, and now had no alternative but to follow the frigate. The first fifteen minutes had lost me a wife and fortune, the next had cheated me with the sight of a bride whom I would not have lost for the royalty of the Windward and Leeward Islands together, and it now brought me in for a share in the ill luck of the New Orleans campaign. There I found my regiment, however, and received my captain's commission time enough to lead my company up head-foremost against General Jackson's cotton bags, be shot in the thigh by an invisible enemy, and be laid in the ditch until the combatants on both sides became weary. An American surgeon cured me of my wound, and the campaign very nearly cured me of a passion for glory.

After an unsuccessful search for Adeline, I returned on half-pay to England, landed at Portsmouth, under the identical bastion that had wrecked our transport, and had scarcely set my foot on land, when I saw, standing with his back to the moving world and his face to a print-shop, my friend Jack. He was now lieutenant-colonel. At our tavern dinner he told me the story of his late promotion. "He had been disappointed of his passage to the West Indies by a 'little business' at a public dinner, by which the mail left him behind. The result was his remaining in England; and, by being on the spot where interest could be brought into play, his appointment to the majority of a regiment under orders for New Orleans. There his regiment did not arrive till the business was over; but the American rifles had made promotion speedy; and Jack became lieutenant-colonel."

I sincerely shook hands with this lucky son of laziness, and sadly proceeded to London to ascertain the state of my own prospects. Nothing could be more simple. My family mansion had been mortgaged to its last shilling's worth. I found the guardsman transmuted from the showy lounge of St. James's street into the gouty appendage to the fireside—the man, nay, the moustaches, gone; my mamma, still battling against time by the aid of a French milliner; and, notwithstanding some touches of human nature in her at the sight of me, palpably mortified at the death-blow which my bronzed face, and the five and twenty years written in it, gave to her hopes of being mistaken for a youthful belle. A kiss, a few tears, and a ticket to her opera box, to which "she was not going that evening," were the tribute to my life of ill fortune.

Before I had descended from the most elegant of boudoirs into the street, my mind was made up. The African corps was in want of recruits. The Bulam fever was certain ferment in either this or the other world: and what had I to leave behind? I instantly marched to the house of a Sierra Leone director. He was busy a hundred deep with applications from heroes of all ranks, emulous to fight the swamps for the glory of their country and the difference between half-pay and full. The hour of twelve next day was appointed for offering myself up on this altar of national avarice and absurdity. I grew impatient as the hour approached, sallied from my hotel, and was rapidly at the door of the lordly director's lordly mansion in Hanover-square. My hand was on the knocker, when I accidentally glanced at St. George's clock. It wanted a quarter of the time fixed. I remembered the results of precipitancy so many years before, gently let down the knocker, and retired to wait my time. The resolution once made became less difficult. Memory cowed me; and I lingered, like a philosopher or a slave, until a full quarter past the time; then made my approach, was admitted, quarrelled with the man of patronage, who "did not choose to be at leisure for gentlemen at their own hours," and, in wrath immeasurable, chiefly at myself for my procrastination, was rushing from the cabinet, when I heard—heavens, with what emotion!—the sound of a voice that could have raised me from the edge of the grave. I stopped, distrustful of my senses; a female figure came gliding along the hall, wrapt in silks and furs, that would have eluded any eye but mine. I pronounced the word "Adeline!"—I could scarcely pronounce more. She started with almost a scream, threw up her veil, and showed me a countenance all sincerity, sweetness, and beauty, made more beautiful by joy. I was all but frantic with delight and surprise. She had come upon some business connected with "her estate," which she instantly postponed, and desired me to finish my story in the drive to "her villa."

Her story was as brief as mine, but of more importance. On the night of my seizure by the Spaniard's negroes, in punishment of the affront to her matron charms, the frigate arrived, and Adeline was hurried on board, that she might disconcert no more matches. The English shore received her, as forlorn a being as ever trod its sands. She wept for her orphanage much, and, as she blushing acknowledged, a little for her lover. In another month she was the heiress of five thousand a-year, dropt into her lap by an old relative, who after making a fortune by penuriousness, and quarrelling with every soul belonging to him for wishing him to die when he was not fit to live, died at last, leaving the lawyers to find an heir for him. Adeline established her claim; and, when she called on the director, was within twenty-four hours of embarking for, not Paris, nor Rome, nor any of the pleasant places of our wealthy wanderers, but—for the West Indies; with what purpose a sigh and a smile, that reddened even her red lips, told me without a syllable.

One tardy quarter of an hour had intervened between me and fate. Fifteen minutes sooner, I should have been dispatched to fight the Ashantes and the alligators. I should have missed Adeline, and she would have been tossing on the ocean, roving through the native land of pestilence, and perishing of the pursuit and climate. Philosophy and fifteen minutes too late had wrought the change for both, from anxiety to ease, from dreary solitude to delightful companionship, from despair to happiness. We married; and such was my fear of over-haste, that I shrank from the lover-like rapidity of a special licence, and postponed my raptures for three mortal weeks of banns. I altered the family motto to "Festina lente;" and offered, upon the spot, to new-gild the decayed brilliancy of St. George's clock, on condition of its being regularly put back a quarter of an hour, for the eternal benefit of the hurriers of this precipitate world.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE WORD OF AN INDIAN.

There is no class of human beings on earth, who hold a pledge more sacred and binding than do the North American Indians. A sample of this was witnessed during the Winnebago war of 1827, in the person of Dek-ker-re, a celebrated chief of that nation, who, among four other Indians of his tribe, was taken prisoner at Prairie du Chien. Colonel Snelling, of the fifth regiment of infantry, who then commanded that garrison, despatched an Indian into the nation with orders to inform the other chiefs of Dek-ker-re's band, that unless those Indians who were the perpetrators of the horrid murders of some of our citizens, were brought to the fort and given up within ten days, Dek-ker-re and the other four Indians who were retained as hostages, would be shot at the end of that time. This awful sentence was pronounced in the presence of Dek-ker-re, who, though proclaiming his own innocence of the outrages which had been committed by others of his nation, exclaimed, that he feared not death, though it would be attended with serious consequences, inasmuch as he had two affectionate wives, and a large family of small children who were entirely dependent on him for their support; but if necessary he was willing to die for the honour of his nation. The young Indian had been gone several days, and no intelligence was yet received from the murderers. The dreadful day being near at hand, and Dek-ker-re being in a bad state of health, asked permission of the colonel to go to the river to indulge in his long accustomed habit of bathing, in order to improve his health. Upon which Colonel Snelling told him, that if he would promise on the honour of a chief that he would not leave the town, he might have his liberty, and enjoy all his privileges, until the day of the appointed execution. Accordingly he gave his hand to the colonel, thanked him for his friendly offer, promised that he would not leave the bounds prescribed, and said, "If I had a hundred lives, I would sooner lose them all than forfeit my word." He was then set at liberty. He was advised to flee to the wilderness, and make his escape. But "No," said he, "do you think I prize life above honour? or that I would betray a confidence reposed in me, for the sake of saving my life?" He then complacently remained until nine days which he had to live had elapsed, and nothing being heard from the nation with regard to the apprehension of the murderers, his immediate death became apparent, but no alteration could be seen in the countenance of the chief. He gave himself into custody; but it so happened that on that day General Atkinson arrived with his troops from Jefferson barracks, and the order for the execution was countermanded, and the Indians permitted to repair to their homes.

SINGULAR OLD SONNET.

AUTHOR UNKNOWN.

The longer life, the more offence;
The more offence, the greater pain;
The greater pain, the less defence;
The less defence, the lesser gain;
The loss of gain, long ill doth try;
Wherefore come, death, and let me die.
The shorter life, less count I find;
The less account, the sooner made;
The count soon made, the merrier mind;
The merrier mind doth thought invade;
Short life in truth this thing doth try;
Wherefore come, death, and let me die.
Come, gentle death, the ebb of care;
The ebb of care, the flood of life;
The flood of life, the joyful fare;
The joyful fare, the end of strife;
The end of strife, that thing wish I;
Wherefore come, death, and let me die.

MUSIC AND PAINTING.

There are, perhaps, no accomplishments which a female can acquire, that are so interesting or fascinating as those of painting and music. They serve to beguile the tedium of solitude, to embellish the circles of society, and to throw around their possessor a charm and witchery which few can resist, and with which all must be delighted. In rural retirement nothing can be more gratifying than the agreeable employment of copying the beauties of nature as they are unfolded to the eye of taste, and transferring the rich and varied tints of the landscape, or the more gaudy and flaunting beauties of the vegetable kingdom. To the female florist or botanist it is not only a delightful but a useful occupation, to sketch the outlines and to give the likenesses of those plants which it may be inconvenient to remove or preserve. The herbarium, though very useful, is but a poor substitute for painting; for, however carefully the plants may be preserved, they soon lose their greatest charm; the richness and beauty of their colours, become the prey of insects, and, like every thing perishable, moulder into dust. But the pencil rescues them from death, and preserves their beauties from decay. The female who has cultivated this fine art is never at a loss for amusement or occupation. Every thing around her furnishes a model, and after exhausting all "the old," she can still imagine "new worlds" for the display of her pictorial skill, and by the magic power of her pencil give to "airy nothings a local habitation and a name." At one moment you may see her calling up the "forms of things unknown," and transfusing upon the spotless sheet before her the most splendid tints and variegated hues; and at the next she is, perhaps, seated in the calm twilight of evening, catching the living landscape, "blue fading into mist," and endeavouring to imitate those beauties which nature seems to throw around her in wantonness and sport. If tired with this delightful occupation, she has but to resort to one equally charming, to call up the most exquisite associations, and to produce those sounds which fall upon the ear "like the sweet south upon a bank of violets, stealing and giving odour." There is a charm in music that few can resist, and when produced by beauty, it is still more irresistible. Every well educated female ought to possess those accomplishments, in no ordinary perfection, if she wishes to render herself agreeable and attractive. It is difficult to conceive the fascination which surrounds a woman to whom nature has given a finetoned voice, and art and skill in music. It indeed "softens rocks, and bends the knarled oak;" and the heart forgets its hatreds, and the feelings lose their asperity under the influence of its harmony. Beauty itself is lost in the charm which music infuses, and the senses are taken captive by the "melody of sweet sounds." Evelina is a female of great sprightliness, though not distinguished for her beauty. She sings and plays delightfully on the piano, and she is always listened to with rapture. We lose sight of her countenance while drinking in the streams of melody she sends forth; and we feel at the moment, that she is the most beautiful creature in the universe. Amelia, on the contrary, is almost perfectly beautiful. Nothing can exceed the perfection of her face and form—yet Amelia has "no music in her soul;" and, although she attempts to thrum on the instrument, she never fails to produce discord instead of harmony, and every one listens with pain, and wishes she would cease. They gaze on her face, and wonder why she is not more musical. Wash. City Gaz.

EXCERPTS.

Though the whole world is crowded with scenes of calamity we look upon the general mass of wretchedness with very little regard, and fix our eyes upon the state of particular persons, whom the eminence of their qualities marks out from the multitude; as in reading an account of a battle, we seldom reflect upon the vulgar heaps of slaughter, but follow the hero with our whole attention, without a thought of the thousands that are falling around him.

In matters of great concern, and which must be done, there is no surer argument of a weak mind, than irresolution; to be undetermined where the case is so plain, and the necessity so urgent. To be always intending to live a new life, but never to find time to set about it, this is as if a man should put off eating, and drinking, and sleeping from one day and night to another, till he is starved and destroyed.

The shallowest understanding, the rudest hand, is equal to the task of destroying and pulling down. Folly or rage can overturn and demolish more in an hour, than prudence, deliberation, and foresight, can build up in a hundred years.

It is the fate of mankind, too often, to seem insensible of what they may enjoy at the easiest rate.

Fenelon had all that was good in his heart, and all that was fine in his head, and never made use of the latter but to advance the former. This character was given of the archbishop by a very sensible Swiss, and probably no one ever deserved so high a character better.

THE ADVANTAGE OF A SQUINT.

A gentleman in the south of Ireland received a visit lately from a party of Rockites, who were armed with sticks. He had just time to seize a pistol, which he cocked, and presented towards the party. "Be off," said he, "you set of villains, or I'll shoot one of you, at all events. I have my eye upon him this moment." Luckily for himself, he was blessed with that happy and pictorial obliquity of vision which caused each particular ruffian to fancy himself to be the marked man, and they withdrew, without obtaining the spoil they had come for.

THE BARBER AND SAILOR.

A sailor went into a barber's shop, to have his beard taken off. The barber happened to have but one razor, and that, for want of a proper intimacy with the hone and strop, was rather dull. The sailor took his seat, and the barber began to execute his office, and at every scrape, which gave the sailor extreme pain, he would cry, "Do I shave easy, sir? Do I shave easy, sir?" The sailor bore the scratching with a good deal of patience for some time; however, the barber taking him by the nose, and, after several scrapes, which made Jack think skin and all had gone by the board, continuing to repeat the question, "Do I shave easy, sir?" Jack gravely replied—"Honest friend, to answer your question, you must inform me what you are about; if you call it skinning, it is tolerably easy; but if you call it shaving, it is devilish hard."

Why are snuffers like matrimony? Because they often extinguish the flame they are intended to brighten.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES—NUMBER I.

I WAS, the other evening, bent over a volume of "Philips's Evidence," and stumbling slowly along through its misty world of wills, affidavits, declarations, and records. "A decree in the court of chancery," says the author, "may be proved by an exemplification under seal of the court, or by a sworn copy." "But in Wilson and Gibbs vs. Conine, 2. Johns. Rep. 280," adds a note, "an exemplification under seal of the court of chancery, of a decretal order, awarding execution on a prior decree, and reciting the substance of a decree of the court for the trial of impeachments and the correction of errors, which affirmed the prior decree of the court of chancery, and ordered it to be carried into execution, was held inadmissible evidence."

I arose from my seat to reach down Johnson that I might read the case to which the learned author had alluded, when, instead of the little library, enriched with the erudite labours of Dunlap, Tidd, Blake, Cowan, and Anthon, I beheld the magic glass spread out brilliantly before me. By its side stood the spirit who has so often presided over the fancies of my solitary hours, and peopled my poor chamber with the beings of the world.

"A merry night to thee, good youth," he said, "and success to thy labours."

"I am climbing," I answered, "with slow and weary steps, the steep ascent upon whose summit a wish of thine could place me."

"But I visit thee not to accomplish thy task, but to cheer thee in the performance. It is steep indeed, and sorely beset with difficulties."

"I am sometimes," added I, "perplexed among a multiplicity of paths, and sometimes bewildered upon trackless wastes. At one time fatigue overcomes me; and, at another, despondency whispers 'you toil in vain.' If a profession could be acquired by impulses, my endeavours would be easily achieved; but the necessity of uniform and unremitting labour, tries perseverance severely. The mind must be bent down by powerful resolution to one point; attention must be withdrawn from all other subjects. I must sacrifice the enjoyment of society, shun the delightful amusements of the times, surrender the social pleasures and inspiring exercises which youth loves, and consign myself alive to a kind of grave, that I may pursue, with an uninterrupted progress, the silent and gloomy windings of learning."

"If thou shouldst do so," said the Genius, "thou wouldst make thyself a profound fool. It is not necessary for thee to fly society nor abandon cheerful recreation. Thy mind will rust like an old sword in a scabbard, unless drawn forth and used in the struggles of the world. Too much study is as dangerous as too much food. Thy reading should be measured and adapted to thy experience and understanding, that it may have a ready application to the practical purposes of life. I am not here at present, however, to weary thy faculties with abstruse reasoning, but to animate them on the consideration of livelier subjects. A truce to "Philips's Evidence" and the assiduous Johnson. Leave for a time Wilson, Gibbs, Conine, and the court of chancery, and let us take a peep into the world of shadows. Thy industry deserves reward, and I will refresh thee with the company of choicer friends than Dunlap or even Anthon, when he appears in the form of an octavo. What shall I conjure up for thee? Wilt thou converse with Nero? Or behold the lofty form of Caesar? Shall we walk through the streets of ancient Greece? Wilt thou exchange a word with Homer? Or shall Shakspeare call up his charming world and lead thee through its wild and varied scenery?"

"I will speak to Shakspeare," said I. "He is the prince of poets. I know all his characters at sight—and—"

Before I had finished speaking a dim shadow passed across the glass, and the bard of Avon stood before me.

"Shakspeare," said the Genius, "this is a poor student, worn down with confinement, pale with study, and banished from the world by brooding care. He haunts solitary places. He walks in the middle night, and his mind is something warped over old musty volumes, and in the exercise of dull and tedious calculations. Shall we bear him to your unreal creations, that he may be inspired with the rich imagery of fancy, and converse with the phantoms over whose destiny thou hast control?"

"Give me thy hand, student," said the poet. "Come, I free thee from the thralldom of time and place. See the obedient mirror parts like the waters of a noiseless stream, and the woods and fields are rising. Let us step upon this outstretched meadow."

"Farewell, world," said I. "Farewell, good mortal people. Farewell, thou narrow chamber in which my soul has been all day imprisoned, and now, sweet Shakspeare, and generous spirit, I roam with thee."

We had scarcely entered, when a tall and stately figure stalked through a shady grove. His face was grim and pale. His eyes glared with dark feeling, and upon his lips sat illimitable pride, recklessness, and ambition. He paid no attention to us, but as he strided along I could hear his sepulchral tones.

"Why, what care I! if thou canst nod—Speak too—Bring me no more reports—Liar and slave; if thou sayest false, upon the next tree thou shalt hang alive till famine cling thee: if thy speech be true, I care not as thou doth as much for me."

I shuddered and shrunk from his ghastly countenance and agitated form; but he faded back into the forest shadow, and I was turning to address the poet, when the sky, overcast suddenly, echoed with crashing thunder. The sweet light passed from the air; the giant oaks heaved their outspread and twisted branches to the violent winds, and pitchy darkness came over the scene, except when the lightning launched its dazzling and repeated streaks through the heavens. As the noises of the tempest subsided, the wind sometimes gradually dying away as if to gather force for the subsequent agitation, the feeble and tremulous voice of a wretched old man reached my ears faintly, and as the light blazed again, I beheld, leaning against a rugged tree that rocked like a ship in the tempest, a venerable form; his clenched fist directed towards the black tumultuous sky, his white hair and beard streaming in the wind, and the madness of despair flashing from his eyes.

"And yet," he said, "I call you servile ministers, that have with two pernicious daughters joined your high engendered battles against a head so old and white as this—oh, tis foul!"

"Dear Shakspeare," said I, "this is indeed an image of thine own creation. Human malice never saw the like."

"Thou art young indeed, gentle youth," answered Shakspeare, with a sweet voice, "if thou hast not often known similar victims to error and passion. Take away his neglected locks and snowy beard, and thou wilt meet him often in the common walks of life. Hast thou not beheld men blindly affectionate, and ruined by confidence? Hast thou not seen age trampled down by rebellious and impatient youth? And doth not the reckless rage of disappointed affections in this world of civilized men and strong laws, even yet drive forth many choice and noble spirits to brave the vast and sleepless elements of life?"

"Shakspeare is right," said the Genius. "I have even seen thee, master student, yielding to thy unregulated and irresistible impulses, when they urged thee from reason and duty, into scenes of temptation and danger."

"But, Macbeth," said I; "who would trust a fiend?"

"Tush, man," said Shakspeare, "who would not, when he presented gold—rank—power? This city is full of Macbeths, except that the witches who delude them take a greater variety of shapes."

But now the enlightened clouds rolled away like the dashing and billowy waters of a sea, and the beautiful light came down with its glorious and many coloured tinges. The old forest had disappeared, a silver stream glided on peacefully to the sea, and a wide and magnificent city lay before me. Temples, arches, splendid columns, rows of gorgeous buildings, stood around, as if time itself should strive in vain to overthrow them, and millions of human beings moved to and fro, intent upon their various occupations. Among the rest, stood one who seemed formed to command; lofty, elegant, and dignified; he moved like a superior, and looked as if his nod could sway the world. The people gathered around him, and were about to bestow upon him some office of importance; but the bluntness of his manner destroyed their good wishes, and enraged his patrons. He stooped not to alleviate their anger, and, like a condemned criminal, he was driven forth to banishment.

"There," said the Genius, "is one whom you may seldom meet. The spirit of the times is against it. Seek in the walks of business and fame for daring passion, endless guilt, and blind folly; but honest and unbending pride, that cowers not for fear, nor stoops for gain, that sacrifices worldly interest for the gratification of a noble and untrammelled independence, seek for such not in broad daylight and high places, but, in obscurity, or the grave."

The scene changed. We stood in London, and were now joined by two characters whom I recognised with little hesitation.

"Why out upon thee, Bardolph," said the one, whose capacious body could not be mistaken, "out upon thee, Bardolph; showest thou thy red nose to this gentleman mortal? Get behind a tree, man; but get not too near, or thou wilt set it on fire, and we shall have all London burnt."

"Let my nose alone, Sir John. I wish thou wouldst. It never injured thee."

"Ha! ha! ha!" roared Sir John, "that indeed, for I always walk behind thee, Bardolph. Thou lightest me on my way. Put thy hand before it, friend; and say no more about it, for what can't be helped, must be borne."

"Thou art a knave and a coward, Sir John. Thou hast no innocence."

"Innocence! sayest thou—by my life, I would rather be the veriest knave in christendom, with a nose of reasonable whiteness, than as innocent as a dove with that exorbitant salamander of thine."

"I say, Sir John," said I, "excuse the liberty; but wherefore hast thou deserted the mortal world? We miss thee, Jack, honest Jack, most lamentably."

"In truth," quoth Sir John, "I have sometimes gone out by especial permission; but my friend Bardolph here, is every day on earth."

"I think," said I, perusing his face with attention, "I have seen him."

"Ay," said Sir John, "if it were the darkest night in December. He hath a visible face. He sneaks about taverns and oyster-cellars."

"I have seen him," said I, "often."

"I am sometimes sent as a warning," said Bardolph, "to all intemperate gentry."

"He stands," said Sir John, "in the dark corner of a street, or by a tavern, like a beacon light, and says to the endangered traveller, 'come not here.'"

It seemed to me that even as I talked a light breeze wafted away these amusing phantoms, and I found myself standing in one of the most beautiful and fairy spots that ever graced the earth. The sun faded away, and the spotted moon dispensed her gentle light through the soft dim air. Strains of heavenly music came from the odour-breathing woods, floating over rich swelling meadows, and glassy streams, and Shakspeare, his face glowing with pleasure, exclaimed, "Oberon, gentle spirit, sweet Titania, merry Puck, come forth;" and the light images of his imagination floated up from the beds of dew-washed flowers and winding brooks.

"My gentle Puck," said Oberon, "come hither. Thou remember'st
Since once I sat upon a promontory,
And heard a mermaid, on a dolphin's back,
Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath,
That the rude sea grew civil at her song;
And certain stars shot madly from their spheres,
To hear the sea-maid's music."

"I remember," said the fairy,
"That very time I saw (but thou couldst not)
Flying between the cold moon and the earth,
Cupid all armed: a certain aim he took
At a fair vestal, throned by the west;
And loosed his love-shaft smartly from his bow,
As it should pierce a hundred thousand hearts;
But I might see young Cupid's fiery shaft
Quenched in the chaste beams of the watery moon;
And the imperial votress passed on,
In maiden meditation, fancy free."

Yet marked I where the bolt of Cupid fell:
It fell upon a little western flower,—
Before milk-white; now purple with love's wound,—
Fetch me that flower; the herb I showed thee once;
The juice of it on sleeping eye-lids laid,
Will make or man or woman madly dote
Upon the next live creature that it sees.
Fetch me this herb; and be thou here again,
Ere the Leviathan can swim a league."

"My fairy lord," said Puck, "this must be done with haste,
For night's swift dragons cut the clouds full fast,
And yonder shines Aurora's harbinger:
At whose approach, ghosts, wandering here and there,
Troop home to church-yards: damned spirits all,
That in cross-ways and floods have burial,
Already to their wormy beds are gone,
For fear lest day should look their shame upon,
They willfully themselves exile from light,
And must for aye consort with black-browed night."

"But we," said Oberon, "are spirits of another sort:
I with the Morning's Love have oft made sport;
And, like a forester, the groves may tread,
Even to the eastern gate, all fiery red,
Opening on Neptune with fair blown beams,
Turning to yellow gold, his salt-green streams."

As this lively dialogue went on between the king of the fairies and his companion, I could behold, in the distance, the philosophic Hamlet musing in the shade. Othello rushed hastily by. The cunning Shylock glided along after the pale and unhappy Antonio, and the noble Brutus shook his blood-stained sword over the body of the prostrate Caesar; but I was tempted irresistibly to exchange a word with the agreeable but mischievous Puck, and I was considering the most appropriate manner in which to address him, when he anticipated my intention, and approached me without ceremony.

"Aha!" said he with a smile, "my old acquaintance! What, hast thou visited my abode at length?"

"Old acquaintance!" said I. "I confess that I have long known you by reputation; but I was not aware that your spirit-ship had any intimacy with me."

"Oh," said he, "I have been with thee a thousand times. Hast thou never seen the time when all thy affairs went wrong? when, at every step, thou hast met with some unaccountable disappointment? when thy debtors failed, and thy duns thickened?"

"I do remember such unlucky days," said I; "but have attributed them to chance."

"Oh, no," said Puck, with a mischievous smile, "I am the —"

"Upon my soul, Mr. Puck," said I, "I am very much obliged to thee."

"Season thine admiration for a while," said he. "Thou art not my only victim. I am every where: in the families of thy fellow citizens—in the streets of thy native town—I peep into the courts and the corporation—I am behind the scenes of the theatre, and in the halls of the legislature!"

"Really, in the name of the nation," said I, "I present thee with the thanks of —"

"Oh spare compliments," said he. "I could tell thee a thousand jokes. I could make thee hold thy sides with laughter. Thou heard'st but now our gracious king Oberon, speaking of his magic flower. 'Tis not the first time I have been sent for it, and hast thou not seen its effects upon the eye-lids of many a fair lady, and honest and sensible gentleman?"

"I have known many happy and honourable matches," said I; "but thy spells have had little share in them."

"Tut, foolish youth; thou art blind as a rock not to see it. When thou returnest to earth, use thine under my influence. If his mistress be brown, he swears she is white. She shall sing as unmusically as a cracked fiddle, and he will melt into raptures, and beg the strain once more. If she be saucy, he bids thee note her sweet wit—if shallow, he swears she is still bashful and superior like the modest moon."

"And wherefore, thou mischief-making varlet," said I, "playest thou these naughty tricks?"

"For Hymen, my friend, that they may run into the trap, and be married."

"And what then?" said I.

"I take off the charm. Why, thou dull mortal, hast ever seen a married man and not perceived the transformation? Where are his lingering glances and frequent sighs? Where the airy oaths with which he bound his soul? He sours like a dish of standing milk. I will show thee an example——"

But we were interrupted by a sudden darkness. The rich fields and woods, with their fantastic people, passed away from before me. I heard the light laughter of Puck, as he vanished in the mist, and the Genius cried,

"Farewell, student; we will meet again."

Astonished and grieved at the transition, I rubbed my eyes to look around me, and found myself sitting by my desk, with the open volume of Phillips's Evidence stretched before me. The candle had just expired in its socket, and the dim red fire-light discovered nothing but the familiar furniture of my room, and their giant shadows upon the wall.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

KOSCUISKO.

THERE is between the city of Basle, in Switzerland, and the French village of Chapelle, a narrow defile, that winds for a considerable distance through under-wood and copse, till, as the road advances towards the French frontier, it gradually rises and terminates in a broad level plateau, the frontier between France and Switzerland. It was on a frosty morning, in the month of January, in the year 1818, that a regiment of Polish lancers wound up through the oak and elm trees, with which these passes are lined. The vanguard had already disappeared behind a mountain, and the main body was just arriving at the height which separates the two countries. The sight of fair France seemed to startle the soldiers; they stopped for a moment, and the band struck up the national song of their country, greeting the land of the enemy they were to combat. The melancholy tones of the music, rising gradually on the breeze, awoke the strain of the sonateer.* A lively sensation was produced throughout the regiment, and the very horses seemed to feel a new impulse, as officers and men joined the noble song, and chaunted the sweet "Czarna Minka," when, all of a sudden, the report of a dozen muskets and the whistling of balls were heard, and one of the officers received his death wound. There was a halt for a moment; the music ceased; and the horses pointed their ears; but "forwards" resounded through the column, and the first files were soon galloping towards the thicket, from whence a veil of smoke was just melting into the air. "Vive l'empereur!" shouted a hundred voices. "Vive l'empereur!" re-echoed the Poles in their own language, forcing their horses onwards. But the wary Frenchmen had chosen their ground with their usual foresight; had barricaded the spot; dug holes, into which the first of the Poles plunged; while they, secure behind hastily thrown up breastworks, fired without missing their mark. Ten of the invaders had already fallen, and as many were wounded. A young man, glittering with gold, rushed forward, and with him the soldiers. "Voilà le chef

* It is not perhaps generally known, that many regiments of cavalry belonging to the Russian army, have vocal as well as instrumental bands, consisting of thirty-two singers each. A more imposing and soul-stirring effect can scarcely be imagined, than that produced by the song

"d'escadron!" cried one of the Frenchmen, and at that moment the young colonel touched his breast and fell to the ground. Two of the privates sprang from their saddles to assist their dying chief, while others advanced to revenge him. Sabre in hand they leaped over ditches and barricades; and, after a short and obstinate fight, the ambuscade was taken, and the enemy put to flight. The enraged Poles had again thrown themselves upon their horses, burning with a desire for bloody vengeance, when the trumpet sounded a retreat. Men and officers then glanced an impatient look towards the major, who had halted on the hill, and was calmly eyeing the retreating Frenchmen through his glass. "Why not pursue?" demanded one of the captains. "Look," said the commander, pointing towards the hills, behind which Chapelle rises, with its white-washed houses. A blue narrow mist that wound round the hills, was seen waxing broader and larger, and the quickness with which line after line emerged from the bottom, betrayed the Frenchmen. Presently, in the opposite direction, there was observed a similar cloud, at first almost imperceptible to the eye, but increasing steadily as it drew along the outskirts of the village. The Poles stood motionless; their very animals seemed to partake of their intense anxiety. "Hark!" cried one of the officers, "a shot!" "A shot!" shouted the rest. The horses began a merry dance; the sabres clattered; and the men poised their lances fast in their stirrups. "Halt!" cried the major, before a dozen shots were fired, and a long green column was seen hastening from behind the hills towards the blue mist and the flying Frenchmen. "Now is the time!" exclaimed the major. The trumpets sounded amidst the soul-stirring "hurrah!" and the men galloped onwards. A column of Russians had moved on the southern road towards Chapelle. They had been attracted by the firing, and the French posted there were now taken in front and rear. The fight was short but bloody. The French, unable to stand the shock in front and flank retreated into the town; fought from street to street, from house to house; till, unable to contend any longer, they threw down their arms. The end of the desperate struggle was the signal for the work of destruction, which now commenced in its utmost fury. Like blood hounds, the infuriated Russians broke into private dwellings, and destroyed the defenceless inhabitants. The shouts of men, and the cries of women and children, were heard amidst the sound of trumpets and the clattering of sabres. But were heard in vain. The fury of the Russians and Poles knew no bounds; and, in less than half an hour, the little town presented a scene of utter desolation. In the midst of this confusion, a man was seen galloping on horseback from the road that leads from the interior of France towards Switzerland. He was dressed in a simple brown coat; his brow was wrinkled, but there was an air of calm dignity in his face. A throng of soldiers with the wealth of the inhabitants rushed towards him; while others were engaged in kindling fires and unroofing the houses. The stranger had ridden into the midst of the soldiers, and one of them laid his hand on the croup of his saddle, and ordered him to dismount. But the unknown sat unmoved; when, casting a glance of inexpressible kindness at those around him, he said, in the Polish language, "My children, is it you?" The Poles started at the sound of their own language from the lips of the stranger; they gathered around him; and the hand of the audacious soldier involuntarily quitted his hold. "And do I find you thus employed, my children?" said the old man. There was something so paternal and yet so authoritative, so kind and yet so melancholy, in the tone of his voice, that the blood-stained soldiers looked up to the horseman with trembling anxiety. "Who are you, father?" cried one of them, pressing close to his side, and taking his hand. The old man made no answer.

crowd. The old man paused, and looking the young officers steadily in the face, said: "And you do not know your father? not know Kos—Kosciusko," exclaimed both officers and soldiers simultaneously, and, leaping from their horses, they lifted Kosciusko from his saddle, fell before him on their knees, and begged his blessings. The booty dropped from the hands of the soldiers, and they pressed forward to kiss the hem of his garments: the major and the rest of the officers and soldiers followed, and the great republican blessed his friends and wept with them.

It was a noble sight to behold Kosciusko in the midst of his people, enjoying the triumph of his virtue and patriotism, and it was not until after many struggles that the last of the Poles could tear himself from the embraces of his countrymen, in whose hearts he will live as long as they continue to beat. To him La Chapelle owed its preservation. S.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

PATENT STEAM CARRIAGE.—The following remarks respecting the patent steam carriage, lately invented by Sir James C. Anderson and H. W. James, Vauxhall, are from the Register of Arts:

"Having been professionally engaged, from time to time, in making drawings for the above mentioned house, frequent opportunities have been afforded us of witnessing their experiments in locomotion, which are chiefly made within their own premises, round a circle of one hundred and sixty feet in diameter; and it affords us sincere pleasure to acquaint our readers, that every thing which is essential towards perfectly safe and rapid travelling by the power of steam, is on the eve of accomplishment. In some trips recently made on the Croydon road, the speed of the carriage averaged full twelve miles per hour; and, although arrangements have been made for increasing the speed to twenty or more miles, it is not the wish of the proprietors to go beyond twelve, considering that velocity to be as great as is consistent with personal safety on the thronged public roads. It would be an easy matter to run twenty or thirty miles per hour on the common road, or even one hundred miles per hour on a good rail-way, by the introduction of a blast to the fuel; a blowing machine is, however, not only unnecessary, but very injurious in its effects upon the metal of which the boiler is composed. The total weight of the carriage, including the water and fuel, is not more than twenty-six hundred weight. The supply of fuel carried is sufficient for fifty miles, and of water for about twenty miles."

A NIGHT TELEGRAPH.—An invention, of commercial importance, has recently been made by Captain Kerveguen, of the French navy. It is a night telegraph, which, by the motion and position of the illuminated radii of several circles, is capable of representing no fewer than twenty-nine thousand two hundred and forty-five signs. By a single illuminated radius, eight thousand six hundred and forty-nine telegraphic signs can be produced. The invention is under the consideration of the French minister of marine.

CRYSTALLIZED SUGAR FROM POTATOS.—The proprietor of the chemical works at Pouilly-sur-Saône, has shown lately to the strangers and merchants who have visited his establishment, sugar from the potato, in well defined crystals, exactly like those of sugar candy.

STATUE OF PITT.—Chantrey, says a late English publication, has just completed his colossal statue of Pitt, for London. It is full twelve feet high, and in modern costume, over which is thrown an ample robe, fastened round one shoulder, leaving the right arm free, and reaching down to the pedestal. By the skilful disposition of the robe, much that is beautiful in the proportions of the figure is shown, and much that is ungraceful in the dress concealed; were it placed at a great distance from the eye, still the looks of Pitt would be recognised, for the natural outline of the man is preserved. It is equal, at least, to any other work from the same hand; and its chief excellencies are, unaffected ease and manly dignity. It is of bronze, a fine, clear, solid cast; the second work of the sculptor in that material. His third work is the colossal statue of his majesty, for Scotland.

STATUE OF POMPEY.—The statue of Pompey, at the foot of which great Cæsar fell, and which has for many years stood in the Spada palace, at Rome, was, some time ago, reported to have been purchased by the Marquess of Hertford, when he was last in Italy. It is a pity that it should be removed from the "eternal city," where it can alone be fairly appreciated. This celebrated statue was found in the Strada de Leutari, near the Cancelleria, during the reign of Julius II.; and as the head lay under one house, and the rest of the body under another, the two proprietors were on the point of dividing the statue, when the pope interposed, and rescued it from this misfortune.

THE LIQUOR OF LIFE.—When the art of distilling spirits, generally attributed to Raymond Lully, was discovered, the secret of longevity was supposed to have been brought to light, the mercurius volatilis to be at length fixed, and the pernicious product received the name of aqua vite—the liquor of life. A discovery concerning which, says a learned physician, it would be difficult to determine whether it has tended most to diminish the happiness, or shorten the duration of life. In one sense it may be considered as the elixir of life, for it speedily introduces a man to immortality.

PICTURE OF THE CONVENTION.—Mr. Catlin, a distinguished painter of this city, whose fine exhibition of De Witt Clinton graces the city hall, is now in Richmond, taking a picture of the Virginia convention, in the style of Trumbull's declaration of American independence. Mr. C. proposes to give a likeness of each of the ninety-six members, with Mr. Monroe in the chair, and Mr. Madison on the floor, presenting also a coup d'œil view of the delegate hall, &c. Mr. C. is proceeding with as much rapidity as possible in the execution of his picture; and it is hoped that the members of the convention will second his plan, and give him every facility in their power. He proposes to have it engraved by the first artist in New-York; and to hand down to posterity the representation of a body, which has excited the profoundest interest through the United States, and whose labours, it is hoped, will redound to the benefit of their country.

NEW PREPARATION OF WOOLLEN CLOTH.—A French paper states, that the manufacturers of Elbeuf and Louviers have discovered and adopted a mode of preparing woollen cloths without oil, or any description of grease; thus rendering the manufacture more cleanly, wholesome, and economical. The cloth prepared according to the new process, is as soft, and in every respect as good as that made upon the old system.

CAST-IRON PAVEMENT.—A cast iron-pavement is now being laid down in Drury-lane. The experiment has been frequently attempted in different parts of London, and failed.

NATURAL HISTORY.

ZOOLOGICAL WEATHER GLASS.—At Schwitzengen, in the post-house, say the editors of the Magazine of Natural History, we witnessed, for the first time, what we have since seen frequently, an amusing application of zoological knowledge, for the purpose of prognosticating the weather. Two frogs, of the species rana arborea, are kept in a glass jar, about eighteen inches in height and six inches in diameter, with the depth of three or four inches of water at the bottom, and a small ladder reaching to the top of the jar. On the approach of dry weather the frogs mount the ladder, but when wet weather is expected, they descend into the water. These animals are of a bright green, and in their wild state here climb the trees in search of insects, and make a peculiar singing noise before rain. In the jar they get no other food than now and then a fly, one of which, we were assured, would serve a frog for a week, though it will eat from six to twelve in a day if it can get them. In catching the flies, put alive into the jars, the frogs display great adroitness.

A CURIOUS FACT.—In July, 1828, J. Swarbrick, Esq. of Sowerby, had a live toad put into a flower pot, without any sustenance whatever, which he covered with a slate, and buried eighteen inches deep in his garden. Last month he caused it to be disinterred, and found it to be as healthy, to all appearance, as when first put in, and of a beautiful gold colour; but, on its exposure to the air, it resumed its usual dusky hue. Mr. S. has again consigned it to its dark abode for another year.

CHICKENS FOSTERED BY A HAWK.—There is a tame hawk at an inn in Uxbridge, England, supposed to be twenty years of age, which lately hatched four chickens. The unnatural parent fosters them with much seeming care; and, what is still more curious, the rapacious bird maintains its natural desire to destroy and feed upon all other fowl which may happen to come within its reach.

FOREIGN LITERATURE.

HISTORY AND ANTIQUITY OF THE VEIL.

THE following interesting article is copied from the Washington City Chronicle, for which journal it was translated from "Voyage Literari de la Grèce."

The use of the veil is very ancient, since it was found established in times the most remote. The veil, the symbol of modesty, removes from the curious eye certain defects, and renders beauty at the same time more touching; it seems to announce modesty, and conceal the innocent blush of youthful timidity. The veil was always the ornament of beauty and grace. The Romans were not less severe than the Greeks in enforcing the obligation imposed upon women not to appear publicly unveiled. Sulpicius divorced his wife because she ventured to go out unveiled. This veil covered, as it now does, the head and part of the body; it was consequently very long, and it was on that account that the Greeks named it macrama, from the Arabic word mahrma, which signifies a handkerchief and a veil. This veil in the east appears almost as ancient as the world itself. Abimelech said to Sarah, the wife of Abraham, "Here are a thousand pieces of silver, with which you may purchase a veil suitable to a woman of your rank, and to apprise strangers that you are married." Plato says that there were two provinces in Persia, one of which was called the zone, and the other the veil of the queen, because the revenues they yielded were applied to the purchase of zones and veils. When Rebecca was going to marry Isaac, she covered herself with her veil, from respect, as soon as she saw him. It was about the middle of the third century that young women in the east began to take the veil, which among the ancients was that of a priestess; and which has remained ever since with our religion. Pausanias says that at thirty stadia from Sparta there is a statue of modesty, which had been placed there by Icarus, for the following reason: Icarus having married his daughter to Ulysses, wished to engage his son-in-law to fix his residence at Sparta, but to no effect. Disappointed in his hopes, he directed his efforts to his daughter, conjuring her not to abandon him. At the moment when he saw her depart for Ithaca he redoubled his entreaties, and began to follow her car. Ulysses, fatigued by his importunities, said to his wife that she might choose between her father and her husband, and that he left it entirely to her to go with him to Ithaca, or to return with her father to Sparta. It is said that the beautiful Penelope then blushed, and answered only by putting a veil over her face. Icarus understood what she wished to say, and let her proceed with her husband; but touched with the embarrassment in which he had seen his daughter, he consecrated a statue to modesty, on the spot on which Penelope had covered her face with a veil, which, in imitation of her, every woman continued afterwards to wear. Conformably to this tradition, Homer represents Penelope followed by two women, and her face covered with a magnificent veil. While Amana, daughter of the shepherd Sanbad, was drawing water from the well of Adail, a caravan coming from the desert halted there to water their camels. Amana seeing them approach, covered herself with her veil; one of the servants of Nouraddin, the richest merchant of the caravan, excited by curiosity, attempted to seize her. The young woman, irritated at this affront, struck him with a staff which she used in carrying her pail. The insolent servant was about to avenge himself by new violence, when his master appeared, and suspended by his presence the brutality of his servant. Amana, in defending herself, had dropped her veil. Nouraddin was smitten with her beauty, and requested Amana of her parents, after chastising with his own hand the wretch who had attempted to injure her. A Greek woman, before she goes out, ties up her hair and adjusts her veil. In this manner Claudian paints Venus quitting her toilet. Hermione, daughter of Helen, finding that her mother had been carried off by Paris, plucked out her hair with grief, and tore into pieces her veil interwoven with gold. The veil of the Grecian ladies is of muslin interwoven with gold to the extremities; that of servants and common women is plain and without gold. It is always white, such as Homer and the ancient monuments represent the veils of Helen and Hermione. Anciently the veil was an ornament of the divinities. The graces were veiled; witness the figures which Bupalus, Appelles, and Pythagoras of Samos have left. If the veil is in the hand of the graces the ornament of innocence and beauty, it is, also, in the hands of modesty, used to conceal shame and grief. The picture of the fete in which the lovely Proxana triumphs over Alexander, is not more touching than the festivity at which Alexander desired the Persian women and captives in his suit to approach and sing for him; he remarked one among them more beautiful and melancholy than the rest, who repulsed those who wished her to approach. Her modesty added a new charm to her beauty; she remained with her eyes modestly cast down, and covered her face with her veil. The king interrogated her, and having learned that she was a princess royal, he restored her fortune and her liberty. Euripides often mentions the Grecian veil, and accurately distinguishes the veil of the captives, which is much longer than the others, in order that the young female slaves whom they wish to sell may be readily distinguished by this mark. They anciently shaved the heads of female captives to distinguish them. At Lacedemonia the married women only wore veils, because, says Charclaus, the young women ought to show themselves to obtain a husband; but the married women ought to be covered to preserve theirs. The modern Greeks wore around their necks a kind of scarf, which was used as a veil to cover the head when they wished to secure it from wind and rain. The Macedonians also wore this scarf or veil.* The women have the same scarf, but much finer than that of the men, which, in bad weather, they put under the veil.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

To our subscribers.—We had made arrangements to adorn the present number with a splendid copperplate engraving, representing one of the most beautiful sections of this city, situated near the Battery, and including the Bowling-green. We find, however, that by delaying its appearance, this additional embellishment to the Mirror will be very much improved; and we have, therefore, concluded upon deferring its publication two or three weeks. This being the first time, during the long and arduous period of our editorial career, that we have ever been compelled to ask the indulgence of our friends, and our motive in doing so being an exclusive desire to add to their gratification, we sincerely cherish the hope that it will be cheerfully accorded. Several other drawings, illustrative of our local architecture and scenery, are in the hands of eminent artists, and will be speedily forthcoming. A new and elegant font of music type has been purchased, at great expense, which will enable us hereafter to augment the attractions and value of this periodical, and to publish the most select and popular melodies in every successive number. The cause of the late occasional omissions of music has been the worn-out condition of our former type. It is our ardent desire, and it shall ever be our primary and determined aim to present nothing to the public, in the pages of this work, that is not of the highest order. To this object, we are more and more attached by the unexampled and flattering increase of patronage by which we have been recently encouraged. We are proud to rank among the subscribers who have lately been added to our list, many of the first individuals in the country; and we, once for all, assure our readers, that while thus extensively supported, the Mirror shall retain a rank beyond the reach of competition.

The Holidays.—We should be wanting in those feelings which are supposed to actuate the conductors of the public press in general, did we not cheerfully comply with the custom of renewing our felicitations on the return of this auspicious season of festivity, and our wishes for many happy returns. Recreation and gaiety, friendly interchanges of kind feelings, a few sad and tender retrospections, many bright and eventful anticipations, constitute the employment of all ranks and conditions. In every thing that is fair and bright, may our friends richly and uncloudedly participate. Let them not forget, however, the impressive claims of the poor, whose sufferings are ever most keen at this very period. So, commending our readers to an excellent article, from the pen of our admirable correspondent C., which will be found on the last page, we briefly take our leave.

Association for the relief of respectable and aged indigent females.—Sixteen years have elapsed since this unpretending, but efficient charity, commenced its laudable operations. Not obnoxious to the objections which an enlightened and discriminating spirit of benevolence may, with too much justice, allege against many similar institutions, as creating the very evil they would fain remedy, encouraging the indolent and the improvident to rely upon external support, instead of inciting them to honourable industry, and a love of independence, this association selects for the objects of its commiseration helpless old age, and decrepid, but virtuous poverty. Commenced under the most auspicious circumstances, directed by the fostering care of the most intelligent and high-hearted females, it early made a favourable impression, by the success and the palpable benefit which attended its first efforts. During its progress, it has at no period relaxed in its solicitude, or in its anxiety to seek out proper objects of relief, and to bestow on them all the attention, sympathy, and ministering care, which their destitute and deplorable condition too often require. Many such objects does a wise but inscrutable Providence offer to the contemplation of those who will thread the remote and narrow alleys of this great city, and they would all be doomed to abject misery and inevitable destruction, but for the working of that amiable spirit which animates the bosom and gives energy to the hand of this association. There are evils which no sagacity can foresee, no prudence obviate, no virtue counteract or mitigate. These evils it is the object of this society to alleviate, and, if possible, remove. Their claims come, then, recommended to the most cordial support of the public, and are more especially worthy of attention at the present time, when the severest rigors of the season daily, nay hourly, threaten to visit the old and the destitute.

Revised Statutes.—The code altered with so much care, and adapted to the increasing wants and modified condition of the population of this state, will go into operation on the ensuing first of January. From a hasty glance over its most prominent features, we feel satisfied that its influence will be salutary and widely felt. Among its numerous provisions is one concerning drunkards, which we take great pleasure in making extensively known, hoping it may serve, in some degree, to check the headlong progress of many a worthy citizen to ruin and infamy. The revised statute ordains, that upon complaint made to any magistrate against an habitual drunkard, a warrant shall be issued for his apprehension, and if convicted of the offence alleged against him, he shall be bound over to preserve order, and abstain from his criminal indulgences for one year; in case of default of sureties, he shall be committed to jail. If the offender is a minor, he may be bound out to work, and, if an adult, he shall be confined to hard labour, and his diet shall be bread and water. By another provision, any person convicted of selling an habitual drunkard, knowing him to be such, any quantity whatever of spirituous liquor, he shall incur the penalty of ten dollars for every conviction.

Theatrical benefits.—It is a source of deep mortification to us, as citizens of New-York, to observe the lamentable fact that the genius and worth of our dramatic corps too often meet with the most unmerited and cold neglect. In their respective walks, there are few performers equal in original talent, untiring industry, and private worth, to Mr. and Mrs. Hilson, Placide, or Mrs. Wheatley. And yet it is a fact, inexplicable and discreditable, that the benefits of these individuals are seldom profitable to themselves, or honourable to the taste and liberality of the public. Paltry buffo-singers and mimics, attract full houses to witness their grimaces and antic gestures, while genius and virtue are left to languish in the shade, and pine at their untoward fate. What avail their unceasing exertions, their oft applauded demonstrations of nature, judgment, taste, humour, or pathos? It is all forgotten when a claim to the general bounty is made in their behalf. We have been led to make these reflections by witnessing the almost empty benches which were the sole reward of one of the most meritorious of the above named performers on a late occasion. Talent of the highest order was enlisted, attraction of the most popular character offered, and yet, scarcely money enough was received to pay the expenses of the evening.

Introductory Lecture delivered before the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New-York. By John B. Beck, M. D. professor of materia medica, &c.—It is no unequivocal evidence of the very powerful impression which this address must have made, that although prepared and delivered in the discharge of an ordinary duty, it should have been selected by the trustees and students of the college for publication. Breathing a lofty and impassioned tone in favour of the cause of education, and written in a manly and impressive style, adorned with the graces of classic allusion and illustrative imagery, it reflects equal credit on the head and heart of the gifted author.

Fatal effects of passion.—Recently a woman in Northwich, displeased with a little girl, her step-daughter, attempted to strike her with a brush, which she had in her hand; but, instead of the meditated blow falling on the object of her vengeance, it alighted on the head of her own baby, which she carried on her arm, and that with such violence, as to cause almost instantaneous death.

Welsh theatricals.—It appears from the following notice in a provincial journal, that an overflowing house is not, at all times, a desideratum: "It will be impossible to open the Cardiff theatre this season, the late rains having inundated it to the depth of nearly six feet, and the water being at present above the stage."

Miss Milford.—This lady has two tragedies on the tapis—one of which is nearly completed. In the tragedy of "Otho" Mr. Young will sustain the leading character: and it is expected to be ready for representation before Christmas. The title of the other tragedy is, we have heard, "Igne da Castro" in which a part is reserved for Miss Kemble.

Madame Malibran.—A Paris paper, of the twentieth of November, says that the theatre has been recently crowded from the floor to the ceiling with the admirers of Madame Malibran, to hail the return of their favourite. She appeared in "La Gazza Ladra," and has since played Desdemona. Her excellence in both are too well known to require further notice, except to observe that neither the fatigue of the waltz, or the clouded atmosphere at Birmingham, seem to have affected her genius or vivacity, which continue to shine with all their wonted lustre.

Sons of the Emperor of Austria.—All the sons of the Emperor of Austria have been taught some trade, the hereditary prince being an excellent weaver, and his brothers good carpenters and joiners.

Beau Brummell.—This king of the dandies appears to have got into the royal favour again. The London Sun states, "that he has obtained, through the highest influence, the appointment of British consul to Ostend."

France.—In France, last year, there were four thousand eight hundred and fifty-five accidental deaths, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four suicides, and eighty-six duels—twenty-nine of the latter were fatal.

Ladies' Riding-dress.—The riding-dress of the London ladies tolerates half-boots of black kid, and pantaloons, exactly like those worn by gentlemen, and fastened under the foot.

Mourning.—The Greeks, it is said, wear mourning, especially if it be for a husband, wife, or child, never less than three years, and not unfrequently for seven.

History of Ireland.—Thomas Moore, the poet, has undertaken a history of Ireland, from the earliest authentic records to the emancipation of the Catholics.

A German discovery.—It is formally announced in the Paris papers, as a German discovery, that onions, being planted near rose-trees, give a most exquisite scent to the roses.

Methodism.—It is stated that methodism is making rapid progress in the protestant cantons of Switzerland.

Son of Madame de Stael.—The young son of Madame de Stael, sole heir of that name, died recently at Paris.

Domestic wine.—Mr. Charles Hughes, of Orange county, North Carolina, has made, the present season, sixty-three barrels of excellent wine, from native grapes, growing in the woods and old fields.

The land of plenty.—Indian corn is selling in the state of Ohio at twelve and a half cents per bushel, and a bushel will support a family for a week.

The Triglote.—The first number of a semi-weekly paper has appeared in this city, published in Spanish, French, and English, called the Triglote.

The Frugal Housewife.—Mrs. Child, the author of Hobomock, has published a work under this title. It is ironically dedicated "to those who are ashamed of economy."

Landing of the Pilgrims.—The two hundred and ninth anniversary of the landing of the pilgrims at Plymouth, was celebrated by the New-England society of this city, on Tuesday last, with the usual demonstrations of gratitude and joy.

Chatham theatre.—Barrett and Young opened this establishment on Wednesday evening, with a tolerable good company of comedians.

Mr. Booth.—This fine tragedian performed Octavian at the Baltimore theatre on Monday.

Cider.—Seven years ago cider was seven dollars per barrel in Ohio; it is now selling there at ten shillings.

Society for gossips.—An "anti-talk-about-your-neighbour's-business-society," is recommended to gossips by the editor of the Raleigh Register.

* The classical readers will recollect the celebrated picture executed by Timanthes, who, after exhausting all his powers in delineating the grief of the attendants at the immolation of Iphigenia, threw a scarf or veil over the countenance of Agamemnon, thus leaving the deep agony and inexpressible grief of the father to be conceived by the spectator.

CHRISTMAS.

Heap on more wood!—the wind blows chill;
But let it whistle as it will,
We'll keep our Christmas merry still.—Scott.

"A HAPPY Christmas and a merry new-year!"—How many million times will this good-natured salutation be interchanged, wherever the English language is spoken, before the present and following weeks pass over. It is, to be sure, a mere matter of course, a compliment of the season; but yet, methinks, there is more right-good will in the delivery of it than in the generality of compliments: the hearty and jovial animation of the countenance, the frank and cheerful tone of the voice, and the rough and friendly pressure of the hand, go along with the words as a commentary, the obvious import of which is—contrary to the ordinary practice of society—"I mean what I say." There is less selfishness at Christmas than at any other time. Men appear to pay somewhat more attention to that much-neglected scriptural injunction, "love thy neighbour as thyself;" and the carking cares and over-reaching schemes of those who struggle for existence in great cities, are suffered to lie dormant for a brief, a very brief space. The stomach is more thought of than the purse; and when a man thinks seriously of his stomach, with a fair prospect of having his delectable visions realized, his natural disposition dies within him, and he becomes a generous, meek, and equitable animal.—Whatever is thought of the poetry, there may be reasonable doubts entertained of the policy of Lear's advice,

Take physic, pomp;
Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel,
That thou mayst shake the superflux to them,
And show the heavens more just;

for it is exactly at the time when a man feels most uncomfortable himself, that he thinks least of the discomforts of others; and many a one, who before breakfast on a cold morning, with no prospect of the fire burning, would not give sixpence to save half the human race from starvation, will, after a satisfactory dinner, talk with unction of the miseries of the poor, and subscribe his dollar without thinking himself guilty of an extravagance. When he is cold and comfortless himself, he is a piece of concentrated selfishness—his sympathies are as frozen as his fingers, and he has no superfluous benevolence to bestow on any one; but as his stomach becomes literally closed his heart is figuratively opened, and he parts with his money with fewer pangs than naturally accompanies that disagreeable operation.

There is one essential difference between the Christmas of the present times and those of a few years ago, namely the weather. The fine, clear, cold weather that used to accompany this season accompanies it no longer, and in its place have come mild, sickly, drizzly days, that properly belong to no one season of the year. It is a pity that fog and civilization should go hand in hand, and that the clearing away of the immense forests of the west should be one main cause of our having this pestiferous weather as a substitute for the healthy, hardy frosts of former times. It is a great drawback; for with what face can any one wish his friend joy, when he can scarcely discern his lineaments through the fog; or ask him to be merry, when saturated through and through with villanous vapour? And then the women! What a pleasant sight it was, on a clear, frosty Christmas morning, with the snow crackling beneath your feet, and the sleigh-bells tinkling merrily in your ears, to see some comfortably-clad and comfortable-looking damsel tripping cheerfully yet carefully over the slippery side-walk, with cheeks into which the cold and exercise had sent a glow more deep and rich than the most brilliant carnation!—with eyes sparkling and dancing in liquid splendour, and her warm breath playing back upon her face, seeking, as it were, shelter from the sharp air amidst her clustering curls—smiling and laughing, she knew not why, and cared not wherefore. Now, the scene is changed—they "walk in silk attire," with artificial flowers on their heads, and soleless shoes on their feet; picking their steps so as to steer clear of the multitudinous small pools which the street-inspector leaves for the accommodation of pedestrians, with faces of a neutral tint, alike different from the ruddy glow of winter and the sunny bloom of summer. But even this change, like every other, bad as it is upon the whole, is not without its advantages:

There is a soul of goodness in things evil,
Would men observingly distil it out, and those who are admirers of, and connoisseurs in, delicately turned ankles, have now a better opportunity for more particular and impartial observation. But then, again, the chances are taken away of the occurrence of interesting incidents, such as a charming young woman stepping incautiously on a deceitful slide, formed by the law-despising little boys, and then falling gently back into the arms of some lucky person who may happen to be just behind, and whom she may gratefully repay with her own sweet self in consideration for the preservation of her pelisse. No,

I ever lov'd the seasons like themselves:
Let summer have its fruits, and spring its flowers,
But give me winter with a hearty frown.

Poultry is the only thing which does not seem to share in the general joy on the approach of this happy period; and all who have entered deeply into the study of the science of ornithology in general, and domestic foolology in particular, must have observed, in the eyes of turkeys more especially, a sort of melancholy presentiment, as if "coming events" had actually "cast their shadows before," and chickens look as if they already beheld the delicate pies, of which they are to form a part. The goose, that most incorrigible bird, it is true, is a goose to the last, turning up a lacklustre eye at the hand preparing to twist its neck about, and it never occurs to it to flap its wings or offer any resistance, until the head is detached from the body, which, according to the immutable laws of nature, is a little too late. These speculations may appear fanciful, but many ingenious theories have been constructed on as slim a foundation.

How many good things have been said and sung of Christmas, from the old poets of Elizabeth's time down to Washington Irving. Indeed, it is the appropriate season for good things. For mirth and music—friendship and flummery—love and liquor—poetry and poultry—gaiety and gormandizing—dancing and dinner-parties, there is no time like Christmas. A spirit of enjoyment—a universal freedom from restraint prevails; the most prudent relax, the most frigid melt; even that anomalous class of bipeds denominated "serious young men," are guilty of merriment, and sip their wine and lisp their joke with impunity. A jovial farewell is taken of the parting year, and as jovial a welcome given to its successor. No man attends to his business, unless he be a publican or a pastry-cook; and all sorts of profitable employments are looked upon as nuisances. Merchant meets merchant, and the price of stocks are not inquired after—tradesman meets tradesman, and the shop is unthought of. Friend dines with friend, old intimacies are renewed, differences forgotten, and a spirit of good-will and kindly feeling, well befitting the season, "reigns in all bosoms."

"Merry Christmas!" even now thy influence, like a charm, is over all. Now are parties projected in the parlour, while through the kitchen rings the din of merciless preparation—now do black cooks rise ten per cent. in the scale of creation, and those who can withstand a hot fire are not to be treated with coolness—now do serenaders take their stand in the damp streets, and, like frogs in a fog, their voices are heard through the thick atmosphere, croaking of love and music, in imitation of Spain and Italy, while the noise of neighbouring taverns mingles with their melody; and now do young ladies throw open the windows to testify their grateful acceptance of the homage of those weather-contemning swains, and many catch quineys by this sacrifice of prudence to passion—now do superlatively witty jokes pass between young ladies and gentlemen concerning their prospects of matrimony before another Christmas—now do men eat more than the "Journal of Health" deems necessary for the support of nature; apoplexies are prevalent, and the heirs of fat old men look forward with pleasing anticipations—now is the air laden with monotonous yet pleasing interrogations of "What will you take to drink?" and no answers are heard in the negative—now, as the glass circles quickly round, friendships become stronger as the brains become weaker, and more promises are made than will be kept—now are several men seen reposing in the streets, with the pavement for a bed and the curbstone for a pillow; peacefully do they slumber! having that within them which makes their flinty couch "soft as the thrice-driven down"—and now do the Journal of Commerce editors sharpen their pens, and prepare to narrate manifold instances of the "fatal effects of intemperance," in their very best style—now do inveterate moralists indite long essays, stating that there have been many changes in the year that is past, and likewise, the probability that there will be many more in the year that is to come—now do the respectable members of the "calliothumpian band" prepare to disturb the peace and quiet of the republic, and the New-York Dogberrys hold consultation concerning the powers vested in them by the constitution; and now, also, is the constabulary force of the city held in less respect by the juvenile citizens than is due to constituted authorities—now do young aspirants to "Tom and Jerry" fame get well kicked, bruised, beaten, and carried to the watch-house, all which they term "sport," and sober, sensible people begin to entertain doubts concerning the meaning of the word—now do many more things take place than are "dreamt of in philosophy"—and now do I put a period to the apprehensions of the reader by prudently coming to a conclusion. VARIETIES.

WASHINGTON IRVING.—A letter has been received in Albany from this gentleman, dated in London, stating that he "had returned, after a long absence, to enter upon his official duties, and that he entertained a fond recollection of the works and institutions of his native state.

In speaking of De Witt Clinton, he uses the following language: "As a citizen of New-York, proud of my native city and state, I cannot express how much I feel indebted to one who has so largely contributed to the advancement of their prosperity and greatness. But of what avail is my feeble tribute of applause? The name of De Witt Clinton will go down to posterity, connected with the admirable institutions and illustrious works of which he has been the founder; and commanding a pure and increasing tribute of veneration, long after the names of contemporary political and rival statesmen are forgotten. In the great canal alone, he has left behind him a monument of fame more enduring than the pyramids, and one that has the merit also of being as useful as stupendous."

TRUE REPARATION.—If thou hast wronged thy brother in thought, reconcile thee to him in thought; if thou hast offended him in words, let thy reconciliation be in words; if thou hast trespassed against him in deeds, by deeds be reconciled to him: that reconciliation is most kindly, which is most in kind.

THE GUNPOWDER PLOT.—A person who had a most resplendent red face, was angry with his son for having gunpowder. "Having gunpowder!" said he; "I will set my face against it." "For heaven's sake, consider what you are about," answered the boy, "for if you do, we shall be blown up."

SACRED MELODY.

And thou, Bethlehem, in the land of Judea, art not the least among the princes of Juda, for out of thee shall come a governor, that shall rule my people Israel.—MATT. ch. ii. v. 6.

He cometh in mercy! the promise of years,
The Saviour foretold by the prophets appears!
Call the seer from his craft and the king from his crown,
And before the meek child of salvation kneel down.

Shout, shout! through the highways of Bethlehem, shout!
Let the joy of our hearts through Judea go out!
For the ocean of time, that for ages has roll'd
With those who believed, has left us to behold!

Blow! blow the loud trumpets, through Bethlehem, blow!
Till the angels above hear our gladness below;
Till the mountains be gifted with tongues to rejoice,
And answer to ours with their many-toned voice.

Spread, spread the bright banner by vale and by cliff!
From the mast of each galley and prow of each skiff!
That where'er o'er the waters the breezes may blow,
The hour of redemption the nations may know!

Bring couches of ivory and wine-cups of gold,
And garments of purple his limbs to unfold.
Bring silks like the snow that's untouch'd and untrod,
To clothe the pure virgin that nurses a God!

What! are ye still silent? is Bethlehem dead?
No trumpet is sounded—no banner is spread!
Awake, ye deep sleepers! awake and arise!
The God of our fathers is come from the skies!

Is no voice to adore, but the voice of the storm?
Is the snow-sheet alone to encircle His form?
Is the night-dew the wine that our bounty bestows?
Is that manger the couch for a Saviour's repose?

But stay! even now hath His mission began!
He teaches his first glorious lesson to man:
That earth's glories are fading—its splendors are dim!
And that we should be patient and humble like Him!

Not the ingots of Ophir, nor Babylon's pride—
Nor the treasures Euphrates rolls down on his tide—
Nor the armies that add the proud cities to Rome—
Nor the navies that crown her the queen of the foam—

Not these doth he value—they glitter in vain—
Ay, even the blaze of the conqueror's train!
He cometh, not strengthened by sceptre or sword—
He cometh, a child, with the might of the Lord!

The hearts that would feed on philosophy's flowers,
Whether cull'd from the warm Epicurean bowers—
From the stoic's, eternally circled with snows—
Or where Plato's more mingled disciples repose—

These hearts shall be gather'd from bower and hall,
The pagan shall weep and the idol shall fall:
Generations unborn shall rejoice in His birth,
And the glory of God shall encircle the earth!

He breatheth—the wings of the tempest are furl'd—
He speaketh—the ocean binds down its vast world—
He looketh—the seraphs are dazzled above—
And man, when he smileth, grows bright with his love!

Be all glory to God through eternity given!
And peace upon earth to the children of heaven!
That when time shall expire, and his wanderings cease,
The trumpet of judgment may wake us to peace!

And when in that valley of nations display'd—
And thou com'st in the power of thy Godhead arrayed,
Oh grant we be better prepar'd in thy sight,
Than the faithless who dream through Judea to-night!

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

A LADY'S DREAM.

BY JAMES LAWSON.

I grant that dreams are idle things,
Yet I have known a few,
To which my faithful memory clings,
They seemed so sweet and true.—Barton.

THE gay and thoughtless prize woman more for the beauty of face and elegance of figure, than for intelligence of mind, or refinement of education; so that if a lady be acknowledged a fashionable belle, the strength of her mind and the polish of her education are accounted nought.

With men of genius, external beauty is but a second dary consideration; "that within which passeth show," has the first claim on their admiration. Beauty fades, time steals the roses from the cheek, and age leaves but a shadow, the beautiful and fashionable belle. With the lady of talent and refinement, the charm of conversation, and the flow of wit, cast a veil over withered loveliness, and render her as interesting, when robbed of personal charms, as in her day of power and pride. But to the intelligent eye, a lady of mind and education is always beautiful; though her features, when at rest, are not as lovely as a cherished flower, nor as regular as a painter's fancy-line, yet, when her mind warms with conversation, or burns with the poetic imagery of her fancy-thoughts, a brightness and a witchery dwell in every expression, which unconsciously hold in thrall the dullest of mankind.

When, however, to intelligence of mind is added the spell of beauty, that lady holds a masterdom over every heart, and man bows in silent adoration before her physical and intellectual perfection. Her presence commands respect, her actions admiration. The idle and the fashionable bow in subjection before her very gaze. The educated and talented stand before her with awe and admiration; and with conscious pride count themselves in the society of one, whose very word makes them feel a presence that instructs and exalts. There is no creation of nature more beautiful than a lovely woman—nothing more dignified, more respect-commanding, than a female of genius and education. She gives man an exalted opinion of his race, and would make the veriest misanthrope renounce his mistaken faith, and exclaim with exultation, "she, like myself, is of the race of man!"

Now to the subject of my story.

I knew Mary Rosabel when she was a young and lovely girl; day by day I marked her mind unfolding its precious gems, and shining brighter and brighter, by the most approved course of education. I saw her verge from youth to womanhood, and even overstep her early promise. I saw her in the day of gladness, and in the night of sorrow; in the time of merriment, and in the hour of affliction. I saw her mind acted on by almost every tone of feeling, yet in all she manifested the same dignity and gracefulness; the same strength and resignation. In all she was herself.

One summer, while she was on a visit to a friend in the country, I took the opportunity of spending a few days with her. In our morning walks through the blooming fields and shady forests, I was instructed and delighted by the correctness of her observations, and the justness of her remarks on the mineral and vegetable kingdoms, and the similes which she drew therefrom to illustrate and adorn conversation. One beautiful evening we were seated on the green sward, under a lofty cypress tree, enjoying the freshness of the southern breeze; the sky was of a beautiful azure; we gazed with exquisite silence upon the pale and full rounded moon, coursing in her aerial path, attended by her countless train of stars; the scene convinced us that she was well named by poets, "night's peerless queen," and they, "the gems of night," "the poetry of heaven."

It was a beautiful evening; the cool breeze invigorated both the mind and body, and having in its viewless flight strayed over flowers and blossoms, its wings were fraught with delicious fragrance. The scene above, the landscape around, raised our thoughts on wings of imagination, above the prosaic realities of this world. After a long silence Mary Rosabel addressed me.

"The beautiful moon," she said, "sailing along the unsullied sky, reminds me of my dream last night. Do you believe in dreams?"

"I have often thought upon them. I have dreamed myself, and heard others relate theirs, and afterwards a circumstance has taken place bearing a strong analogy to the dream. Such things are; and to say the least, a strange combination of events—a remarkable coincidence, for which, I know not how to account, but I have come to approve of the maxim adopted by Dr. Johnson, 'do not wholly believe them, because they may be false; do not wholly discredit them, because they may be true.'"

"This I think a liberal conclusion."

"Not more liberal than just."

"The old adage says, regard not dreams, since they are but the images of our hopes and fears."

"Though I confess that old adages are the wisdom of nations proved by the experience of ages, and winnowed from all the chaff of words, so that nothing but the healthy grain remains, still I am resolved in my former opinion. May I not be informed of the particulars of your dream?"

"I shall tell you with pleasure. My dream was inconsistent as a very dream. Methought I was asleep in such a place, and in such a scene as this, when, suddenly, as if by some wild convulsion of nature, I awoke. The sky, which, when I fell into my slumber, was as beautiful and cloudless as this on which now we gaze, was gloomily overcast, and the moon was shrouded by a total eclipse. I was in terror; I wished to arise, but lacked the power of volition, and was constrained against my will to remain, as spell-bound, fixed upon the spot. Suddenly, a ray of hope, a thought of pleasure, flashed across my mind; gradually the scene became lighter and brighter; a semi-circular line of mellow light beamed upon the face of the heavens—it was the first glimpse of the moon darting from beneath the envious body that shrouded it in eclipse. Imperceptibly, and by slow degrees, she emerged from her obscurity; the clouds passed gradually away, till at length, the queen of night shone in the heavens with all the stars in her train, as bright and beautiful as the sanguine brain of poet in fancy's boldest flight ever pictured to his imagination, and the landscape smiled with a loveliness equalled only by the brilliancy of fabled fairy-land. It was too bright, I thought, for my eyes to look upon, and its dazzling blaze seemed to sear them; yet still I gazed upon the scene in inexpressible delight. I felt a thrill of calm and unalloyed pleasure—a composure unknown before—a sensation undefinable. You see, it was as I said, inconsistent as a very dream. At length, in reality, I awoke; and when I could collect my thoughts, which were scattered by my dream, I saw the sun, high in the east, darting his fierce beams through my lattice. The sky was cloudless, the birds sang merrily their matin songs, nature looked sweet and smiling—all creation wore a life and freshness, which, never to my mind, seemed so cheering and so lovely on any former day. My heart partook of the composure and pleasure of the morning; I felt a sweet presentiment of something yet to come—it was a happy feeling, wherefore I knew not—it was a composure, for which I could not account."

"That was a beautiful dream, and, if I may be permitted to express my thoughts, brilliantly narrated."

"You praise my description above its merit; can you give an interpretation?"

"I have no ability at expounding dreams."

"What may you guess? I have a strange curiosity to hear it unriddled."

"Were I to hazard a conjecture, I should say, madam, that it denotes some good fortune about to befall you. Have you not in your heart a wish, a fond and cherished anticipation, to which you look forward with anxious uncertainty for its fulfilment?"

"To you, reserve were ungenerous. I have a hope, which, were it realized, would make me the happiest of my sex."

"To such a conclusion did your dream lead me. I will not be too inquisitive and ask particulars; but, believe me, your dream foretells, if it foretells anything, that the gloomy uncertainty of your mind will soon be resolved to certainty, and all your fondest hopes realized to an extent even happier than your mind conceives; and you will lead a life of joy, rich in the esteem of the world, in the affection of friends, and in the love of one who will be worthy of your dearest regards. Your youth will be like a lovely morning in spring, all perfume, all fragrance; your prime, like a brilliant summer day, all sunshine and loveliness; and your age, like the mellow autumn eve; and your sun of being will set, far in the west, in peace, and in the hope of a glorious immortality; leaving to your family and friends, a name as pure and as dearly cherished as a gold-tinged evening sky."

"This is a pleasing interpretation: if the reality equal the promise, I shall be most happy."

The pursuit of my travels soon after this removed me from the pleasing society and the beautiful scenes which I enjoyed with my young friend, Mary Rosabel. Though the happy days I spent in her company were not forgotten, yet the dream and my interpretation, slumbered in my memory. It was a year or more afterwards I put up at an inn in Kent, over the door of which some ambitious country artist had immortalized himself by daubing, "as large as life," England's emblem of St. George and the dragon. Seated one evening in the traveller's parlour, which fronted the street, I saw an elegant equipage stop at the door. Two servants, in rich liveries, leaped from the dicky and stood in humble attendance to assist a lady and gentleman to alight. The lady was robed in a travelling dress, displaying more taste than show; there was a queen-like bearing in her step that caught my attention—a dignity in her actions which commanded respect. I felt an anxious desire to see her face; it must be a lovely face, I thought, but an envious veil shrouded each feature from my view. The gentleman was nearly six feet in height, of handsome shape, and manly feature, and a soul of intelligence beamed through an eye of uncommon lustre. He looked as if both friends and fortune smiled with richest favour on him. With much politeness, and evident affection, he gave the lady his arm, and led her into the George and Dragon. As he entered his features recalled to my memory the likeness of an old friend.

"Can it be Henry Wellworth?" I involuntarily said to myself; "he is so like him, though I little dreamt to see him in this part of the country, that it is at least worthy my attention, to have my doubts removed or confirmed; I should for ever accuse myself of unkindness were I in the same inn with so good a friend as Wellworth, and omitted the opportunity of seeing him."

Without a moment's further hesitation, I rang the bell, and when the waiter appeared, I requested him to inform me of the name of the travellers who had just arrived. He retired to learn it at the bar, immediately returned, and announced him to be Mr. Wellworth.

"Wellworth!" I exclaimed; "my old and trusty friend! Give him my card, and say I wait his leisure."

The waiter retired, and in a few moments returned again with the compliments of Mr. Wellworth that he would be happy to see me in his private apartments. I was instantly shown to his parlour; my friend was really as glad as I was at the unexpected meeting. When the usual courtesies were interchanged, I inquired, "Who is the fair dame that came in your company?"

"Do you not know her?"

"I do not—at least her veil so covered her face that I could not recognise a single feature. Who is she?"

"My wife."

"Your wife! Are you married? To whom?"

"To my wife, to be sure."

"What is her name?"

"Mrs. Wellworth."

"Tut, tut, I know that is now her name; but what is her patronymic?"

"Here she comes to answer for herself. My love," said Wellworth to his wife as she entered the apartment, "can you inform my friend who you are?"

"Surely," she replied, "one whom I have known so long need not require such information."

"Mary Rosabel!" I exclaimed, "is this so?"

"Even so," she replied; "you see, sir dream-exponent, your interpretation has become realized."

"And you are happy then?"

"Ay, as the day is long."

"For six months' past," said the husband, "she has told me so, and I believe her, and for sixty years to come, she shall be, live she so long."

"You have my warmest wishes. Heaven bless you!"

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE PEARL FISHERY.*

WE are not Hottentots, but civilized critics; and will not, therefore, receive the accounts of the gallant author of these travels in the rude manner recorded in the note at the bottom of another page; though, like Mr. Waterton, in his "Wanderings," we confess he has somewhat staggered us with the strange facts he relates. Being a commissioner for the company formed to fish for pearls and coral in the Gulf of California, the worthy lieutenant certainly proceeded on an errand that was likely to produce unexpected and extraordinary results; but we were not prepared for the very unexpected and extraordinary results stated in this volume. As an example, we will begin with a sub-marine tale, founded on descents to drag the pearly treasure from the deep.

"The oyster secures itself so firmly to the rocks by its beard, that it requires no little force to tear it away; and as its external surface is full of sharp points, the hands are soon severely cut by them. The effect of the buoyancy of the water is also curious. At the depth of seven or eight fathoms, it requires exertion to keep down; and if you then attempt to lay hold on a rock with the hands, you find yourself as it were suspended, so that if you let go your hold you will immediately tumble upwards! I remember, the first oyster I ever met with was at the depth of four fathoms only; my head was almost touching it; and forgetting, in my pleasure, to strike out with my legs, as I stretched forward my hand to catch hold of the prize, to my astonishment, the oyster slipped from my grasp, and I found myself nearly at the surface of the water the next instant; so that I had all my labour for nothing. So firmly does the oyster fix himself to the rock, that, in order to tear him away, it is necessary to get "a purchase" upon him, by placing the feet at the bottom. The excessive difficulty of doing this is incredible; it requires the muscular strength of the whole body to overcome the resistance of the water's buoyancy. I have no doubt that, by means of its long beard, the oyster has the power of locomotion, and that it changes its situation according to its pleasure or convenience. One principal object of inquiry, however, was obtained; namely, the true situation of the shells under water. I found that I had been in a complete error in supposing them formed in beds; that is, in heaps, as the word bed would seem to indicate. With this impression I left England, and continued in it till I had now convinced myself, by actual investigation, of the error into which I had been led by every body with whom I had conversed on the subject. Indeed, a moment's reflection would have pointed out the impossibility of the oysters being piled in heaps together in this gulf. This fish always seeks for tranquillity, which it could never find in situations exposed to currents, and motion occasioned by the undulations of the water. I always found them in sheltered bays, the bottoms of which were covered with large rocks. This brings me to consider the reason why a diving-bell, at least in the Gulf of California, can never be profitably employed. —After reaching the bottom, if the greater surface be considered bottom, there are frequently found chasms in the rock below, which extend from one to two, or even three fathoms lower. It is down these apertures that the diver most generally expects to meet with oysters, which even here conceal themselves in the cavities of the rock; and as the power of vision fails in so dense a medium, particularly if the depth be considerable, and the surface rough, the diver is obliged to insert not his hand only, but even his head, into every hole and corner, like a person groping about in the dark; holding on, the while, by the points of the rock, to prevent his rising to the top, in consequence of the water's buoyancy, at the depth, for example, of seven or eight fathoms, beyond which I cannot speak from experience. The perception of objects under water at this depth is very indistinct, and their magnitude is augmented, so that a very small shell appears of large dimensions, and the diver is frequently mortified by the discovery of the mistake when he rises. It is strange that the deception should not be detected by the touch; but it would appear, that in the same way as the eyes measure the capacity of the stomach, so also do they convey to the hands a sort of conviction that the apparent is the true size; so that these organs take pleasure in mutually deluding each other! The fissures in the rocks, in these submarine situations, do not frequently exceed ten inches or a foot; so that in descending, the back, chest, knees, and heels, are sometimes dreadfully lacerated. If, then, not even a shark could follow a diver in these situations, how is it possible that a diving-bell, which is considerably broader, should be able to do so? The idea that it could, is only to be entertained by a person as grossly ignorant of the circumstance as I was before I convinced myself of the truth. In fact, it might be said that the men in a diving-bell would remain suspended half way between hopes and realization, and would feel, as I sometimes did when I was crawling about the bottom, "like a fish out of water;"—an odd expression, by the by, for a fellow eight fathoms deep! I am convinced that there is no stimulant so great as hope. Under its influence, the diver is insensible to danger, although he see himself surrounded by sharks of prodigious magnitude. Armed with his short stick,* he considers the invasion of so formidable an enemy's domains as unworthy of a moment's hesitation. Anxious to grasp the prize, he pays little regard to the price of its attainment, which he no sooner possesses than he is ready to fight the stoutest of the finny race. I have myself descended when the horizon was filled with the projecting fins of sharks rising above the surface of the water; and although armed only in the way I have described, I thought myself perfectly secure from molestation; notwithstanding they were swimming round me in all directions, at not a greater distance than a few fathoms, I continued my pursuits with the greatest sang froid. I should no more be capable, in my cool moments of reflection, of braving this inconceivably horrible danger, where I might have been mangled and torn to pieces by one of these implacable monsters, than of entering the tiger's den before his breakfast, at Exeter Change. But when the passions are concentrated into one point, though that point be on the verge of eternity, hope still attends us. On these occasions how sensibly have I felt, and how often repeated, the beautiful lines of the enraptured poet!—

"'Tis Methinks, it were an easy leap
To pluck bright honour from the pale-faced moon."

Don Pablo Ochou, who was for many years a superintendent of the fishery, and himself a most expert diver, gave me the following account of one of his watery adventures:—The Placer de la Piedra negada, which is near Loretto, was supposed to have quantities of very large pearl-oysters round it—a supposition which was at once confirmed by the great difficulty of finding this sunken rock. Don Pablo, however, succeeded in sounding it, and, in search of specimens of the largest and oldest shells, dived down in eleven fathoms water. The rock is not above one hundred and fifty or two hundred yards in circumference, and our adventurer swam round and examined it in all directions, but without meeting with any inducement to prolong his stay. Accordingly, being satisfied that there were no oysters, he thought of ascending to the surface of the water; but first he cast a look upwards, as all divers are obliged to do who hope to avoid the hungry jaws of a monster. If the coast is clear, they may then rise without apprehension. Don Pablo, however, when he cast a hasty glance upwards, found that a tinterero had taken a station about three or four yards immediately above him, and, most probably, had been watching the whole time that he had been down. A double-pointed stick is a useless weapon against a tinterero, as its mouth is of such enormous dimensions that both man and stick would be swallowed together. He therefore felt himself rather nervous, as his retreat was now completely intercepted. But, under water, time is too great an object to be spent in reflection; and therefore he swam round to another part of the rock, hoping by this means to avoid the vigilance of his persecutor. What was his dismay when he again looked up, to find the pertinacious tinterero still hovering over him, as a hawk would follow a bird. He described him as having large, round, and inflamed eyes, apparently just ready to dart from their sockets with eagerness, and a mouth, (at the recollection of which he still shuddered,) that was continually opening and shutting, as if the monster was already, in imagination, devouring his victim, or, at least, that the contemplation of his prey imparted a foretaste of the gout. Two alternatives now presented themselves to the mind of Don Pablo: one to suffer himself to be drowned—the other to be eaten. He had already been under water so considerable a time, that he found it impossible any longer to retain his breath, and was on the point of giving himself up for lost, with as much philosophy as he possessed. But what is dearer than life? The invention of man is seldom at a loss to find expedients for its preservation in cases of great extremity.—On a sudden he recollected, that on one side of the rock he had observed a sandy spot, and to this he swam with all imaginable speed; his attentive friend still watching his movements, and keeping a measured pace with him. As soon as he reached the spot, he commenced stirring it with his pointed stick, and in such a way that the fine particles rose and rendered the water perfectly turbid, so that he could not see the monster, nor the monster him. Availing himself of the cloud, by which himself and the tinterero were enveloped, he swam very far out in a transversal direction, and reached the surface in safety, although completely exhausted. Fortunately he rose close to one of the boats; and those who were within, seeing him in such a state, and knowing that an enemy must have been persecuting him, and that, by some artifice he had saved his life, jumped overboard, as is their common practice in such cases, to frighten the creature away by splashing in the water; and Don Pablo was taken into the boat more dead than alive."

* "This stick is about nine inches long, and is pointed at both ends. The diver grasps it in the middle, and when attacked by a shark, he thrusts it into the monster's expanded jaws, in such a position, that, in attempting to seize his victim, the jaws close upon the two sharp points; thus secured, he can do no mischief, but swims away with his martyrdom; the diver rises, and seeks a new weapon of defence."

As one such story is as good as a hundred to illustrate a work, we shall content ourselves with this extract. Lit. Gaz.

FRIENDSHIP OF WOMAN.

The science of anatomy informs us that there are in the human heart, (we mean the corporeal seat of life,) two principal channels, through which the vital current flows; both as it leaps joyously from the fountain, and as it sluggishly returns from the discharge of its appropriate function. The peculiar construction of these organical features, technically styled the auricles and ventricles, we are not competent to unfold. It is our wish only to call attention to the analogy which here exists between the physical and the intellectual nature of our race; and to speak of love and friendship as the two principal channels through which the current of the feelings flows with a fixed and steady course. Nature has denied to woman the physical strength and muscular power which she has generously conferred upon man; but in conformity with her general equitable economy, she has compensated the denial by a larger share of feeling and sensibility. Hence we find in a woman, a susceptibility to emotions seldom possessed by the other sex, rendering her the obedient agent of the passions and feelings inseparable from our common nature. The purposes subserved by the general economy of nature, (a term which we here use only as another name for Providence,) are wise and benevolent; and we can clearly trace the marks of that wisdom and benevolence, in the peculiar favoritism shown to woman in the disposal of those feelings of the heart, upon which love, friendship, delicacy, and sensibility are founded. The shell-fish that grows upon the rocks, is conscious of its helplessness, and the means of defence from external dangers, is abundantly furnished by a singular and almost invincible tenacity. So also with woman. She was not formed for independence; but endowed with those peculiar properties which enable her firmly but steadfastly to adhere to her natural protector, and these properties peculiarly active in love, do not remain inoperative in friendship. From the peculiar constitution of women, therefore, we see more ardency of feeling, greater strength of attachment, and superior purity of affection, than that which characterizes the other sex. Instances undoubtedly have occurred, and may again occur, where both in man and in woman have been found the same fervour, the same zeal, the same warmth of affection, the same indissoluble connections both in love and in friendship. And so, also, instances have not been wanting of the same delicacy of manner, the same effeminacy of habit, the same constitutional weakness, and the same ardent temperament in both. But isolated facts are not to be mistaken for general principles, nor individual instances for general rules. The effects of a perverted or an injudicious education are to be suspected; when general experience is contradicted by solitary examples; or at least we are to endeavour to trace the occasional deviations from an established theory, to clear, adequate causes, before we become willing to give up a maxim which accords with the usual experience of mankind. It is not from solitary instances that we infer the susceptibility of woman to the tender and generous affections. Wherever her history is portrayed, we find the same prominent features, differing only in direction. Such, however, is the natural suspiciousness of mankind, that we cannot concede to woman any feelings of regard for the other sex, independent of those of love. But towards her own race, her affection, as it kindles into an enthusiastic glow, is marked with all the warmth of love and all the purity of charity. The natural traits of her character are congenial with the emotions of friendship.—Open, ardent, unsuspicious, the connections which she forms from feeling, are nurtured by fidelity; and as she is not drawn aside by the temptations of business, the envy of superiority, and the silly struggle for honours and preferments, the attachments which she forms are unalloyed by those base feelings which are too apt to corrode the pleasures of the heart. It is true, that she does partake so much of our common nature, as to share the common fatalities of the world. It is true, also, that even in the friendship of woman, the base passions will sometimes mix their poison and blast the fair prospects of the harvest of hope. The jealousy of love, the rivalry of beauty, the pride of accomplishments, or the fancies of fashion, will sometimes take possession of the heart to the exclusion of all the better feelings. But when reason resumes her seat, and the bitterness of controversy has subsided, there is not that tempest of contending emotions, pride struggling with principle, a haughty spirit with the consciousness of error, an indisposition for concession with the desire of reconciliation. Woman has no struggles like those with which to contend. Errors involuntarily or unconsciously committed, are willingly atoned for. The indiscretions of the moment are deeply regretted, and when once she is persuaded of her faults or follies, we know not which the most to admire, the good sense which disposes her to confess her errors, or the candour, openness, and good will with which the confession is made. From these considerations it will readily be seen, that her sex is constitutionally fitted for the enjoyment of friendship in its highest and most exalted degree. And here, too, we may advert to the wisdom of Providence in the disposition of the moral as well as the physical world. The pleasures of man are frequently of that isolated character which renders them independent of external objects. The ingenuities of art, the speculations of science, the flowers of rhetoric, or the subtleties of casuistical and cabalistic lore will frequently wean him from the prosecution of other pleasures, and engross his undivided attention. But not so with woman. She has few pleasures of an isolated or solitary character. Her enjoyments are of that generous kind which invite others to their participation. Her thoughts are of that untravelled nature that confine themselves to domestic scenes of quiet and contentment; and hence when her affections are bestowed, they go with an intensity which amply compensates for their limited extent.—It is the electric spark which impetuously leaps from the philosophic jar, not the silent current drawn quietly from the sky by pointed conductors. It is the joyous burst of the waterfall as it precipitously plunges from the highlands into the lake beneath, not the quiet return of the river as it disembogues into the sea. For the confirmation of these remarks, we point not to the pages of history, but to the world around us; for history is doubly unjust to woman. While she trumpets to the world the vices of the sex, and holds up to reprobation the turgid catalogue of crimes and enormities of some monsters, she casts the shades of oblivion over the thousands who have shown in all their native modesty, the pride and the ornaments of their little circle. But we will not blame the injustice of story, for history was not made for women. The tulip and the sunflower, the gaudy peony and the patrician marigold may adorn the public square; but the rose and the lily of the valley prefer the silent walk, or secret bower, where they may pour their perfume on the air, and waste away in their own sweetness. The loveliest scenes of nature are those which she seems to dress solely for her own amusement; where the gaze of man is least likely to intrude. And thus it is that woman, as she consumes away in her own loveliness, shrinks from the gaze of the world and buries herself in the affections of her friends. Ladies' Mag.

A MODERN BLUE BEARD.

We give to-day—from the "Petit Courier des Dames," of the fifteenth of November—one of the most extraordinary accounts of the manner in which a fond husband contrived in Paris, to amuse himself with his wives—for he tickled two to death—that has ever fallen under our notice. Those who have had the experiment of tickling their feet tried upon them, can easily imagine the refinement of that torture which a person must endure, when so bound as to be unable to resist. What pleasure the demon could have taken in the extatic agonies of a lovely woman, no human mind can fancy; but that he did revel in them the narrative renders but too certain.

EFFECTS OF TICKLING.

Mrs. de L mixed much with the fashionable world last winter, accompanied with her daughter Emily. Young and handsome, the latter was the object of general attention. Although without fortune, she received many advantageous proposals for her hand—but as her heart remained unaffected, she selected from the crowd of her admirers Mr. de V. He was about forty, rich, and respected—he adored her and would thus make her happy. Emily made a confidante of her mother, who could not avoid expressing her surprise at the selection. Mr. de V. had already lost two wives—there was a disparity in their ages, and she felt an invincible repugnance, for which she could not account, to the union. Emily thought so good an opportunity of securing a rich establishment, might not again present itself—her mother yielded, and she was married to Mr. de V. Some months after, Emily's brother urged her to frankly confess to him, whether she had realized the happiness which she had anticipated from the union. "I have, indeed," said she: "my husband anticipates my every wish, and would render me fully happy, but for a singular request which he has made, and which, as I cannot understand the object, troubles me." "It must be very serious," said Edward. "Oh, no, it is very silly," replied his sister; "you would never imagine what. Only think of a request to bind myself with linen bandages—in a word to be a living copy of an Egyptian mummy." So extraordinary a caprice surprised Edward full as much as it had his sister. His curiosity was too strongly excited to be spent in imaginings, and he urged his sister to yield, but with the condition that he should, unknown to the husband, be stationed during the operation in an adjoining room. Thus placed, his sister informed her husband that she had determined to yield to his request. Wild with joy at this information, the husband found not words to express his gratitude, yet promptly commenced his operations. Edward listened attentively. Profound silence reigned for some minutes in the room; his sister broke it by saying in a trembling tone, "And the arms too?" He involuntarily trembled as if they were to be the last words of his sister. "Yes, my dear," replied the husband gaily, "I beg you—head and feet only free; just like a mummy you know." All was again quiet. The silence lasted so long as again to frighten Edward, and he was upon the point of entering the room, when his sister commenced laughing immoderately. He felt assured and listened. Emily stopped and all was again silent. Again she laughed, and more immoderately than before, and again all was silent. This tomb-like repose, broken by loud and immoderate laughter and succeeding the silence, was alarming—he knew not what to think of it, and burst into the room. At his appearance Mr. de V. fled, and Edward found his unfortunate sister stretched on the floor, cold and inanimate. Her husband had bound her, that he might freely tickle her feet. Another fit of laughing, and Emily would have followed the two other wives of Mr. de V. The best attendance has but recalled her to existence a perfect idiot—the nervous system being entirely destroyed. This adventure, known to all Paris for some days, is too well proved to be doubted. We suppress the names, solely out of regard to a highly respected family. Mercantile Advertiser.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES—NUMBER XI.

THE pleasant sunset beams were fading from the air, and street-side and steeple-top lost their rosy colouring. The faint and drowsy twilight deepened into darkness; the lamp-lighter stole hastily along with his ladder and glimmering lantern; the multitudinous noises of the town sunk into silence, and night usurped the empire of the earth and heavens. But while the realities of the day had ceased, its shifting shadows yet filled my imagination. The faces of the crowd, angry, malignant, kind, or passionless, came and went uncontrolled through my mind; the shuffling and noisy motions of the streets yet rung in my ears, like the rushing of restless waves, and I could not shake myself free from the lingering fragments of vile disputes or paltry and pedantic learning. It is no mean talent to banish these phantoms of fancy, to direct the mind immediately from one subject to another, to enter the circles of gaiety freed from the ill-timed gravity of business, and to return to the exercises of labour unaccompanied by the dear intrusive images of pleasure. How often, even while basking in the light of happy eyes, will some form of gloom steal in, like Banquo's ghost, and break the spell; and even in the times of serious and peremptory duty, with what frequent facility do the unguarded portals of the mind admit what had much better be excluded?

Perhaps it was the secret influence of the Genius which suddenly dispersed all my weary memories, and inspired me with the thoughts of our approaching festivals. "And so," thought I, "the happy new-year is here at last, and the summer has fled with its golden promises; the teeming and rich autumn has also gone, and the last of the forest leaves has floated gradually down the eddying air. The country looks like misfortune: the naked trees tell of poverty, and ingratitude whispers in the winds and appears in the frozen brooks."

One of the pleasantest customs prevailing among our good citizens, and I believe peculiar to New-York, is that which converts every fair damsel into a queen, and throngs her levee with admiring subjects. It is probable that many of my readers, residing in distant parts of the Union, may be ignorant of the universality which this practice has obtained. They must therefore be informed that the ladies, lovely of course as art and nature can make them, on the first day of every year remain at home, in order to receive the calls of the whole circle of their male acquaintance. Choice wines and dainty delicacies greet every welcome adventurer on this gay career of love and beauty, and each offering to Bacchus or Cupid, or any of the other divinities which preside over the jovial thoughts of mortals, is marked with light and agreeable ceremonies. No kissing, for that dangerous operation is exploded from the refined walks of city life; but well-turned compliments—understood glances. In this way the gentlemen manage to amuse themselves during the day, fling business to the wind, and threading the labyrinths of our crooked city, find an Ariadne at every turn. Many circumstances concur to free their minds from restraint, and by the time the distant sun touches the western hills, what with bright eyes, sweet voices, and innumerable sips of whiskey-punch, they are pretty tolerably—but that's no affair of mine.

I am a friend to whatever promotes lively and rational pleasure. Notwithstanding the lessons of wisdom so often read to the world, I am sure it cannot be beneath the dignity of a man to be happy. They welcome "new-year." Merry festival! Thou comest through the snows and winds of winter, with joyful smiles, independent of the warring elements of this unhappy earth. Let the darkness brood, and tempests whistle, the spirit of love blesses every cheerful parlour with the morning gladness of spring. If I could but sway the course of human events, what warm and deep happiness I would send into the bosom of every family. I would make this era a threshold, upon which all bad passions and unkind recollections should be laid down. I would make it an altar. It should burn with the pure essence of reason, and at its shrine I would cause each wandering pilgrim to place all the withering diseases which prey upon the body, all the ungentle feelings which rankle in the heart. What a deep joy there is in bestowing a blessing. There is a secret and inspiring pleasure in making the lowest wretch happy; in rescuing a nameless beggar from some impending calamity, in relieving the pain of a dog, or in assisting even a struggling fly from the treacherous stream, and beholding it spread out its transparent wings, and rise gladly upon the air; but to bless those whom we love, there is no triumph more pure and holy. Revenge has been called sweet. There is a certain joy in it; an allaying of the gnawing thirst of the heart; but it is a fierce and savage flame, which burns out with its own fires. It resembles some wild conflagration, which paints the surrounding world with red and lured colouring, and presently leaves it in redoubled darkness; but the bliss of creating happiness in those dear to us is like the beams of a brilliant star, for ever cheering the shades of night.

"Very pretty and very poetical," said a well-known voice, and the Genius was again by my side. "It is a fine thing to be on good terms with one's self, my good student; but to form schemes of virtue in the closet is much easier than to bring them to operate in society. If the bliss of bestowing bliss be so exquisite, why is it not more eagerly sought?"

"It is sought," answered I, "by all who are not strangely lost in guilt. How eager are all to increase the sum of human happiness! What sermons are preached for it; what books are written. Do not poets and orators paint the blessing with all the liveliness of eloquence and song? Look at our charitable institutions, our—"

"Yea," interrupted he, "thou sayest right. Books, orations, sermons abound; but can you measure the tenderness of the heart by these? Does hypocrisy never lurk under a sanctified face? Do ambition and avarice never disguise themselves in the image of meekness and virtue?"

"But how," said I, "can we distinguish between the cunning and the sincere?"

"Let men's actions," said my companion, "speak for them. Watch the tenor of their lives. Away with their sermons, speeches, and pamphlets. Put no faith in newspaper honour. Trust not modest words and moral denunciations. Be deceived neither by boisterous sects nor rigid doctrines. Look at the heart of your friend. Compare his actions. Follow him through his private dealings. Ask not his character among the rich and the happy, whose opinions it is his interest to purchase with affected manners and book-morality; but let the obscure and unfortunate, who have been in his power, speak for him."

"But," said I, "I cannot be deceived in regard to the joy I myself feel in relieving the pain of others."

"It is a joy," answered the Genius; "but what sacrifice is made to obtain it. It is an easy matter for you to take the drowning fly from a goblet; to assist any one without personal loss; and if they possessed the power to heal the sick and reform the wicked at pleasure, all men would, doubtless, practise so agreeable an avocation. But this is empty virtue. It is children's benevolence, imbibed from romantic impossibilities, unadapted to the exigencies of life. But go forth into the distress and ruin of cities. You are encompassed by innumerable miseries, which can be relieved. There are occasions where your influence becomes a duty. You will have opportunities to waive gain which would be legally, though cruelly grasped. I cannot gift you with the wand of a fairy, to bring back the strength and life of exhausted nature, to quell angry desires with a word, to disentangle the weary from the perplexities of care, to shed over the roof of the young, the innocent, and the beautiful, the light of pure and lasting bliss, by any miraculous interposition. These are not for earth. The laws of mind and matter are fixed. I cannot violate them; but few as your powers are in this respect, are they all applied which you do possess? How often do the most paltry interests, the meanest passions, interfere with the holy duty of diminishing human anguish? What little jealousies, what petty profits, what low and brutal pleasures, act upon your minds, and quench the feeble flame of feeling. Look in the mirror."

There was a happy family. The aged father sat with silvered hairs, by his beloved wife, and sweet gay children were grouped around, like some rich and studied painting. There is a charm about fine children. To me it is irresistible. There was one lovely boy. Unshadowed spirits, warm, confiding affections, resolutions bright, high, glowing, beautiful ignorance of evil, unchecked yearnings towards every thing great and good, were there; and, as I watched the unconscious loveliness of his face, and mournfully numbered the dangers and distresses through which he must inevitably pass; how those soft hopes must be deceived, how those graceful affections must be chilled, gloom stole to my heart, and dimness over my eyes.

But now they were full of pleasure; and, as the light of day dawned more fully upon them, the old man went forth to his labours. A trifling difference occurred with a friend, relative to the payment of a small sum of money. Warm words followed; the breach was widened; and a lawyer was appealed to. He was smooth, polite, specious, and crafty. He held the power to end it, at once, by his advice, to terminate it by a speedy suit, or to carry it into a court where he could accumulate enormous costs. "I am not rich," quoth he. "I have a family to support. My rent is due. I have two notes to take up. I would not for the world suffer the dishonour of having them protested. It would ruin my reputation." So the latter course was adopted.

Suddenly the prospect changed from the confusion of a court to a foreign land. Strange beings and objects appeared around, and the accents of an unknown language fell upon my ear. There was a riotous and scoffing crowd assembled, to witness the execution of a criminal. A tall and commanding figure moved on in chains. His pale face told much of desperate anguish, but his tongue reviled the gentle truths of religion; and, instead of repentance, his scornful lip expressed revenge, hate, cruel and reckless passions; and from his eyes, which, a moment before, I had beheld shining with the innocent and happy gaze of boyhood, flashed fiercely, and bent their wild glances in blasphemy to heaven!

"You behold," said the Genius, "the modest child of your recent admiration. His parents have departed from the earth. His gentle sisters—he knows not of them. The peaceful family are wrecked, and scattered in fragments over the boisterous and unrelenting world. The lawyer who, to gain his own designs, urged on this ruin, could have yet spread over them the mantle of peace and joy. Perchance there would have been less splendid decoration in his dwelling. Some golden ornaments might be wanting, some expensive luxuries, some refined sensualities; but he would have been a guardian angel to this little paradise. He held the privilege of shutting against them the flood-gates of wretchedness and sin. He could have kept dear hearts together. Surely, surely he might have spared some superfluous splendour for such a feeling. But you see, to him at least, there are delights superior to that of making others happy."

Remember, master student, the perpetration of one dishonourable action subjects you to unlimited responsibilities. The curses of cruelty and dishonour come vaguely, and from unseen quarters, when once you have bidden them welcome; while feeling and honesty roll on their radiant courses, gathering around them unlooked for rewards, and beaming with the inherent blessings of nature. ORIGINAL MORAL ESSAYS.

THINGS THAT ARE.

"Hast thou ne'er heard of time's omnipotence,
For or against? what wonders he can do?"

"Thought wanders up and down surprised, aghast,
And wondering at her own."—Young.

THE science which teaches us the laws of the earth's motion, the nature of its materials, and the regularity with which it has kept, for ages, its relative situation in the universe, affords, to the reflecting student, a source of singular interest. How perfect is the order of nature! Day after day does the sun rise, dispensing light and heat over immeasurable space; and, while he blesses with his cheering influence the greatest and most powerful of earth, he despises not the little flower which the meanest might crush in his path. How beautiful is he at his rising. Darkness and silence have been over the earth. The glimmering twilight is the herald of his approach. Slowly he disperses, with his piercing rays, the shadowy gloom of night; and bursting, at length, into splendour, awakes nature from repose. The hum of men is again heard. The slumbering tyrant shakes off his lethargy, to invent new schemes of wickedness. The slave resumes his chains, which, in his visions, may have been loosed for ever. The labourer returns to his occupation; perhaps with the merry song of content, perhaps with murmurs of wretchedness. Youth welcomes the light of day, as suited to its own joyous spirit. Manhood, as anxious to pursue its plans of ambition. Age, because it clings to life with a tenacity proportioned to the frailness of its tenure. The ungrateful think not in welcoming it, of the power that created them. With the thoughtless, it is the idea of a moment. But the pious spirit pours itself out in thanksgiving, if it awake to happiness; in resignation, if it anticipate a renewal of sorrow. What numberless and various scenes are passing at the same moment of time in different parts of this vast globe? What strange events does the short space of one single day bring forth? Here are assembled a few chosen men; their brows are contracted with thought. Brooding over unforgiven injuries, they frown with indignation; but hopes of redress excite the smile of joy, and their words breathe resolution and vengeance. They are conspirators. Their object is the overthrow of government. Every feeling is absorbed in that one wild desire, and they contemplate, without shuddering, the horrors of civil war. The open massacre, the secret murder; the abandonment of friends; the loss of fortune; perhaps, of life to themselves, even if successful. The certainty of death and dishonour, in case of failure. All, all are canvassed, but their purpose remains unshaken. May the light of the sun never witness the prosecution of their plans. For ever be the words of the traitor scattered to the idle winds. But see! another assemblage of chosen men. But how selected? From among the discontented, the idle, and the dissolute, for the purpose of stirring up sedition and encouraging rebellion? No; they are the elect of a nation, the pride of a fair and distinguished land. Their object is the good of their country, the extension of her commerce, the improvement of her laws, the encouragement of the genius and industry of her people. These are the subjects of their debates. Does heaven smile upon their efforts? Who can doubt it. Is she not increasing in wealth and in power? Power, not acquired by extortion and rapacity, nor by the cruelties of war; but by resolution, industry, and perseverance? One glorious struggle, and the little band that fought for liberty were free. Scarce half a century has elapsed, and their descendants are citizens of one of the most flourishing nations in the world. Strange are the revolutions of earth. Shall America ever become the land of slaves? Shall the increasing prosperity of our nation render her sons effeminate, luxurious, and indolent? Forbid it heaven. While the earth turns on her axis, and the sun continues his daily round, may simplicity, integrity, and a generous love of country, be the characteristics of every American. May his spirit be as buoyant, and his step as light and free as that of the deer of his own native hills.

I have sometimes wished that I had lived at that era when our country threw off its yoke, and declared itself free. I have pictured to myself Washington, the great and the good, the father of his country, a warrior, a statesman, and a virtuous man. Man, as he was meant to be, "noble in reason, infinite in faculties, in action like an angel, in apprehension like a god."

Around him were spirits devoted to the common cause, emulous of his approbation, waiting but for his slightest command to rush to battle and to death. And the young, the noble foreigner, the brave Lafayette; how strong must have been his love of freedom, who could forsake friends, home, and country, and risk his fortune in a stranger land. He was not unrequited, for he was the companion, the friend of Washington.

I have sometimes thought it were worth a life to see and know such spirits. But years have passed away, and the blessings of peace are with us and around us. Are we ungrateful? The memory of Washington is hallowed in the heart of every child of America, and time has but rendered brighter the unquenchable flame of gratitude and love which burns in each bosom. And that foreigner, we of the present generation have seen him return, full of years, to the land of his adoption. The blessings of millions followed him in his path; the aged thronged to meet him who, in youth, they had known and loved; the young greeted him as the object of reverence; and, even childhood lisped out the name to which the full heart of the mother could not give utterance, though it was treasured in its inmost depths. In the pride of youth and strength, he could never have known such pure and holy joy. His is the greatest triumph recorded in the annals of earth; and that I have seen it, is to me a source of pleasure. I would not transport myself to other years. It was a thoughtless wish. These are events in the history of nations. The world knows them, and millions lament the evil, and rejoice at the good. Let us narrow the circle of observation; let us speak of families, of individuals. In the small compass of our acquaintance, of what strange reverses of fortune are we not the witnesses. Each little moment, as it rushes to oblivion, bears on its wing the last sighs of many a broken heart, and the groans of bereaved spirits, mingled with songs of joy, expressions of happiness, murmurs of regret, and thanks of rapturous delight. It could tell a tale of deep successful guilt. It has, perhaps, plunged the poisoned arrow of grief into a happy bosom. A chance of a single moment may sow the seeds of jealousy and discord among friends. May revive the slumbering passions in the breast of man, and plunge him one step towards eternal ruin.

But time has brighter tales. The happiness of many depend on the chance of a single moment. In that moment a whisper may give joy to the despairing heart of a lover. The scale of fortune may turn, and the child of poverty be raised to happiness. The light of newly implanted hope may illumine the path of the desponding; the voice of truth may dispel the illusions of infidelity; a holy joy steal over a bruised spirit, and words of pity bring back a wandering soul to the bosom of its Maker.

I have lived whole days in a moment. Who has not? Some slight association touches the chord of memory, and awakened feelings rush over the mind with the overwhelming rapidity of a mountain torrent. The present sinks into nothing; the past is vivid before us. Forms, long mouldering in the dust, are moving in our presence, glowing with life and health. Voices, of which the echo has long passed away, are breathing to us in "words that burn," the brilliant conceptions of their powerful imaginations. The playful repartee, the witty remark, are heard, and the beaming smile again seen. The vision passes away with the moment that gave it birth, but unlike that moment, it leaves its trace behind. It has been one of inexpressible, soul-entrancing enjoyment; and, though the first feeling may be disappointment, that it has been but an illusion, yet it is soon lost in wonder and astonishment, at the power of our own minds, at the unlimited range of our own thoughts. And yet there are those who believe, that this ethereal substance, which we call mind, this power, so boundless in its extent, withheld only by the chains of earth from soaring into the highest heaven, and measuring itself with infinity, is destined to annihilation. Believe that it will die with this frail body, to whose wants it now administers; believe that man is the sport of fate, thrown upon earth by the caprice of chance, withering away like the flowers of summer, and leaving, as a memento of his existence, not even the shadow of a shade. I would not be this being, could my life be lengthened to a thousand years, and those years the happiest earth's resident can enjoy, yet would I exchange that lot for one instant's perfect assurance of my destined fate in eternity, and that fate bliss. Could we know that by one single act of ours we could secure such fate, at what would we hesitate? At nothing. The stake, the torture; we would embrace them with all the ardour of joy. What would be to us the pleasures of earth? Trifles. Fortune? a plaything. Fame? the airy emptiness of a bubble. 'Tis well it should not be so; 'tis well that doubts sometimes sway the firmest mind; that earthly feelings and earthly ties have power to interest us: Such thoughts are, in themselves, ennobling; but they should be the sacred pleasures of a lonely hour. When we mingle in the world it becomes our duty to regard its pleasures as our own; and the happy constitution of our minds renders this duty congenial to us. The spirit that loves to indulge itself occasionally in such deep and holy thought, if well regulated, is the best adapted to enjoy the sweet intercourse of social life. It has, within itself, an unfailing spring of true happiness; but, too often to draw from it, would be to unfit itself for its worldly duties. Our nature cannot long sustain a state of high excitement, and we should restrain even our imaginations within the bounds of judgment.

The playful exercise of fancy, the melody of sweet sounds, the moderate gratification of each separate sense, are all sources of happiness. Each season has its own peculiar pleasures. The earth is full of beauty. It is beautiful in spring, with its green verdure, its skies of dark deep exquisite blue, her many coloured flowers, and songsters of the woods. The very air we breathe in spring is pregnant with joy; health returns to the pale cheek, and life to the chilled heart of the sad victims of disease; youth rejoices in the very consciousness of existence. The firm step of manhood treads more proudly in his path; and woman, oh! it is her own sweet season. It gives new brightness to her eye, and tinges her cheek with the colour of its own fair flower. She cannot withhold her smiles when all nature smiles, nor restrain the outpourings of her joyous spirit when all nature breathes of joy. And summer—her joys are those of spring ripened and matured, exciting emotions less rapturous, but more chastened, more pure, more exalted. There is a softness in the air of summer, that enervates the tone of the mind. We seek the cool shades of retirement. Her sweetest hours are those of twilight and moonlight, and the soul gives itself up to that pensive pleasing melancholy, in which nature herself seems to indulge. It is a fleeting season, but in its flight we gather many a gem of joy. The pleasures of autumn are fewer, but not less dear. Age delights in its deep repose; in the stillness which pervades the earth. Its beauty, its brilliancy, is passing away; but we are prone to set a higher value on joys that are soon to fade; and in their gradual decay we read a moral most useful to us; and, in the thought that they will soon revive, we feel more and more deeply the conviction, that, like them in their decay, so shall we be in our renewal. Winter—what are the enjoyments of winter? No more do we look without for pleasure. Nature presents us a dreary aspect: the sun is chilled; the trees are leafless; there are no flowers nor birds. Men hasten their steps, anxious for shelter from the piercing winds. What is that shelter? Home. In this word lies the spell that makes even winter pleasant. Friends meet oftener; the cheerful fire promotes sociability; the pleasures of conversation; of intellectual communion; the sportive jest; the merry laugh. These does winter bring us, and it is welcome. Let us value its blessings as we ought to do. In this merry season throughout our land, let us participate with cheerful hearts; and, while each spirit reflects with gratitude on the occasion of the celebration of its great festival, meditates upon the events of the last year, and resolves to begin and end the next with good, may the great Power that watches over us grant a happy new year to each and all. THE MAGIC RIFLE.

Imitated from the Illyric, by P. Merimee.

The rifle of the great bey of Sawa was a wonder! It had twelve golden rings, twelve rings of silver, its stock was embellished with mother of pearl, and from its butt end was suspended three tufts of red silk. Many other rifles have rings of gold and tufts of red silk also. The gunsmiths of Banialouka are exceedingly skillful. But where is the workman, who could sing the magic song, which rendered deadly the balls of the rifle of Sawa?

It had slain the Delhi with his mailed coat, and it had fought the Arnaut with his cassock stuffed with felt and embroidered with seven double cords of silk. And the mail coat was broken like the web of a spider, and the cassock was pierced like a plantain-leaf.

Dawoud, the handsomest of the Bosniaks, slung the cest-liest of his rifles on his back; he filled his girdle with sequins; of his twelve guzlas he took the most sonorous. He started from Banialouka on Friday, and arrived in the land of the bey Sawa on Sunday.

There he sat down. He played on his guzla, and all the maidens closed round him. He sung plaintive melodies, and all the maidens sighed. He sung songs of love, and Nastasie, the daughter of the bey, threw him her bouquet, and blushing at her boldness fled into the house.

In the cool of the evening she opened her window, and beheld Dawoud seated on the stone bank before the gate of the house. As she bent forward to look at him, her red cap dropped from her head, and Dawoud seized it, and filled it with sequins, and threw it back into the window of the beautiful Nastasie.

"Behold," said he, "yonder black and threatening cloud which hovers over the mountains, heavy with hail and rain. Wilt thou leave me a prey to the storm, and see me expire before thine eyes?"

Unloosing her silken girdle, Nastasie fastened it with a knot to the balcony, and Dawoud was soon at her side. "Speak softly," said she. "If my father should hear thee, he would kill both thee and me."

The morning dawned—Dawoud descended from the balcony, and ran to conceal himself in the mountains. And every night he returned to the village, and found the silken girdle hanging from the balcony. The fifth night he came pale and blood-stained.

"The Kayduks," he exclaimed, "are lurking for me in the passes of the mountains. Should they discover my retreat, they will murder me. Ah, had I the magic rifle of thy father, who would dare to molest me? who could resist me?"

"The rifle of my father," replied Nastasie, "I cannot get. During the day it hangs on his shoulders; and at night it reposes with him on his couch." And she wept, and looked into the heavens where the sun rises.

"Oh, Nastasie," said he, "bring me the rifle of thy father, and put mine in its place; he will not perceive the change. My rifle has twelve rings of gold, and twelve rings of silver, and from the handle hang three tassels of red silk."

Silent and breathless she entered the room of her father, and took his rifle, and laid that of Dawoud in its place. The bey sighed in his sleep, and was troubled, but he awoke not; and his daughter gave the magic rifle to her lover. He embraced Nastasie tenderly, and swore to return the next evening. And he left her on Friday; and he entered Banialouka on Sunday.

When the bey awoke, he lifted the rifle of Dawoud. "I am growing old," said he; "my rifle lays heavy on me; but it will kill many yet."

Every night the silken girdle hung from the balcony; but the faithless Dawoud came no more.

"The enemy have entered our lands," said the bey, "and nothing can resist their chief Dawoud-Aga. He carries on the croup of his saddle a leathern bag, and his slaves fill it with the ears of those he kills."

All the men of Vostina gathered round the old bey of Sawa. Nastasie mounted the roof of the house, to behold the battle; and she recognised Dawoud, as he spurred his horse against her father. The bey pulled his trigger, sure of his victory; but the priming alone caught fire. A cold shudder overran him. Shortly afterwards a ball pierced the cuirass of Sawa in the middle, and it entered his breast and came out from his back. The bey fell dead. A black cut his head off, and hung it by its white mustachios on the croup of the saddle.

When Nastasie beheld the murder of her father, she cast the cloak of her young brother around her shoulders, leaped on his black horse, and went into the battle to seek her false and perjured lover and to kill him. When Dawoud beheld the young horseman, he aimed at her with his magic rifle. Fatal was the ball he sent: the fair Nastasie dropped dead on the ground. A black cut her head off, held it by its long fair hairs, and Dawoud saw the sweet face of Nastasie!

And he sprang from his horse, and kissed the bloody head. "I am her murderer," he exclaimed; and he flung himself and the magic rifle into the abyss of Vostina. S.

EVILS OF EARLY RISING.

It seems to be the laudable endeavour of a great portion of the present generation to prove their forefathers fools; this being the way in which they choose to evince their gratitude for the benefits they have derived from the labours of those who have gone before them; and accordingly, from the author of Devereux downwards, they are employed in running full tilt at what it is their pleasure to term "popular fallacies."—Now, notwithstanding we can travel ten miles an hour quicker than those who lived before us, I, for one, cannot help thinking that our ancestors knew something; and am therefore particularly cautious of impugning, or even entertaining doubts of the soundness of any good old maxim that may seem to have received the sanction of wiser heads than I ever expect mine to become, even in these ready-made-knowledge days. But there is one thing which has been much advocated by doctors and moralists, (not, I suspect, without sinister motives on the part of the former,) namely, "early rising," which I never could see the utility of, and which has only to be placed in a proper light to show at once its folly and imprudence.

Let the merits of the case be examined. It is the custom of those who advocate this baneful practice to appeal rather to the fancy than the reason, and to sketch a highly romantic and altogether ideal picture of the pleasures of early rural walks, &c. They talk of green fields, and purling streams, and warbling birds, and healthful breezes, invariably winding up with a florid description of the glories of the rising sun. Now I myself, from dear-bought experience, happen to know something of these matters; for though, with one exception, I have not seen the sun rise for many years, yet in early life, when I "thought as a child and acted as a child," I was seduced, by empty rodomontade, to adopt the pernicious practice of early rising until a heavy cold, caught by roaming about the fields at an unseasonable hour in search of health and mushrooms, settled upon my lungs, and came pretty near making my early rising the prelude to an early grave.—But suppose a man up and dressed before the sun, (and here I will not dwell upon the soft, delicious slumbers that have been broken and frightened away by his harsh and unnatural conduct,) suppose him up, dressed, out of the house, and away to the fields. When he gets there, these fields are, to be sure, green enough—rankly green—but he dares not venture into one of them; or if he does, especially if the grass be any way luxuriant, he might just as well have gone a bathing with his nether garments on: he dare not pluck a wildflower from the hedge-side, for on approaching he finds that

"Black snails and white,
"Blue snails and gray,

are pursuing their slimy peregrinations in every direction; the birds do not warble at that early hour, but on leaving their warm nests, flit uneasily from bush to bush, shaking their plumage, and twitter-tweeting in a way certainly not calculated to raise his feelings to any very ecstatic pitch; and even the cows, whose slumbers he has disturbed, arise slowly and sullenly from their damp couch, look grimly at the worshipping of nature, and proceed, in a discontented manner, to slake their thirst by nibbling the grass. These discomforts probably rather damp his feelings, and he proceeds forthwith to select a dry spot on the turnpike-road, where he stands, with his hands in his pocket, gaping at the sun getting up, and fancying himself very much delighted; though everybody knows, that for richness and beauty one sunset is worth a dozen sunrises. After this he makes it a point of duty to walk and lounge about for three or four hours, leaning over some farmer's gate-way watching the chickens, with their eyes half open, picking up stray worms, or the ducks gobbling "unhoused" snails, when he goes home wet and weary, and finds the sensible part of the family enjoying themselves with toast and coffee. As all foolish persons dislike to confess their folly, he proceeds to state that he has had "such a charming walk!" thereby not only sinning his miserable soul before breakfast, and giving the father of lies a decided advantage for the rest of the day, but inducing other unsuspecting victims to follow his scandalous example.

There is more truth than poetry in this plain statement of the case, which will be found to be correct nine times out of ten, even in the most favourable season of the year—summer; what then must an early morning's walk be through the chills and drizzle of spring or the substantial fogs of autumn? As for winter, the idea of a man leaving his warm bed, and wading through ice and snow without the prospect of anything but a frost-bitten nose, is so abhorrent to the natural and common feelings of humanity, that it may well be doubted whether any one but an hypochondriac or a lunatic could conceive or execute such a measure.

Can any thing be more preposterous than the advice not unfrequently given, to "go to bed with the sun and get up with the sun?" It is clearly contrary to the visible intentions of Providence. Before the sun rises the night dews lie heavily on flower and plant and field and forest. Nature is drenched: and the sun is kindly sent forth, as it were, to mop up the world, and make the earth all dry and comfortable before it is necessary for its tenant man to come abroad. With his warm beams he proceeds in the work of exsuction, and draws up all the raw and unhealthy vapours out of harm's way: and any man who unnecessarily intrudes himself into his presence when thus transacting his morning's business, well deserves what he generally gets, a chilly reception and an inflammation of the lungs. Yet people will punish themselves in this way, and bear it all as if they were suffering in a good cause! And if you remonstrate with them on their folly, they will take pen, ink, and paper, and prove to you, by the rules of arithmetic, how many years of active existence a man adds to his natural life by getting up regularly four hours before the rest of his fellow-mortals, only forgetting to deduct the four hours he loses by going to bed that much sooner, in order to indulge his strange, out-of-the-way propensities.

If a cause is to be judged by its advocates, few, I believe would stand worse than early rising. You never meet with what is called "a good fellow" among early risers. It is either your old bachelor, who is, to be sure, more excusable than any other class of men; or your morose worldly husband, who prides himself on his domestic virtues, because he sleeps over the fire after supper, and goes to bed at nine o'clock; or your thin, bilious, poetical and dyspeptic youth, who fancies he is an admirer of nature, and therefore comes abroad to see her in her most disagreeable forms, and also to beget an appetite for an extra egg or an additional muffin at breakfast. But the most amusing thing is, the credit such people take to themselves for these departures from the ordinary regulations of society. They invariably narrate the history of their morning's exploits to one who loves his bed with an air of conscious rectitude, and with that "sort of satisfaction,

"Men feel when they have done a virtuous action," though wherein consists the virtue of one man putting on his clothes three or four hours before another, I am utterly unable to conjecture. But so it is, and they pride themselves upon it, as if it was one of the cardinal virtues, and like charity, covered a multitude of sins.

My prejudices against this habit were greatly augmented by the shock my feelings received from witnessing it carried into effect on a highly improper occasion. I was, a summer or two ago, invited to a wedding, a few miles in the country, having an off-hand acquaintance with both bride and bridegroom. The former was very pretty and agreeable, the latter very pedantic and disagreeable. Many people thought him a genius, and he himself inclined to that opinion. He was busy with an epic poem, was an inflexible early riser, and invariably ate dyspepsia crackers at breakfast. His conversation always turned upon one subject, which was himself; this subject he divided into two parts, one of which was an unsparing narration of his literary labours, and the other, a particular account of the state of his stomach for the last three weeks past, with minute reminiscences of what had agreed with him and what had not. How he had contrived to steer between these two divisions and carry on "his whole course of wooing," I cannot comprehend. Be that as it might, a set of joyous spirits were congregated together at the wedding party. The wine circled gaily, and the song and jest past merrily round. At a reasonable hour the ladies and junior and senior gentlemen retired, leaving about a dozen of us too well contented with things as they were to think of leaving them so soon. Time flew unheeded by, and the bright sun and four o'clock in the morning, found us singing in full chorus, when happening to cast my eye into the garden, judge of my surprise at beholding our friend the "gay bridegroom" perambulating the gravel walk a little way from the house. Struck with astonishment, I spoke not a word, but rushed from the room and made towards him, filled with fearful forebodings of some dire mishap. On my anxiously inquiring what was the matter, he seemed surprised at the question, and civilly stated "that nothing was the matter—that four o'clock was his usual time for getting up—that he found it conducive to health—that he had eaten three quarters of an ounce too much at supper—that the rising-sun was a glorious spectacle, and that nothing aided the digestive powers so much as an early walk." As he proceeded I looked in the reptile's inanimate face—there was not a spark of fire in his dull gray eye, his turned-up conceited-looking nose was tipped with blue, and I thought of the truth of what the scripture says, "we are but clay." I remonstrated with him on the brutality and cruelty of his conduct; but he seemed to have no notion of endangering his health for the satisfaction of any created being, and I left the animal, or rather vegetable, sticking among the cabbages, admiring the beauties of nature, while I betook myself to my alas! solitary pillow.

In the course of time two events occurred, one of which did not surprise me—the other did. My friend, the bridegroom's wife, insisted on a separate maintenance, and my friend, the bridegroom, published a volume of poems, which, upon opening, to my utter amazement, I found were almost all on amatory subjects. He discoursed of "love and dove," and "kiss and bliss," and strolls by moonlight, (he always went to bed at ten,) and ardent hopes and fiery passions, in a way that would have outdone Catullus and Thomas Moore, only that his were merely words without ideas, which certainly improved the innocence of the poems, however it might destroy their effect. There were also two or three bacchanalian songs, concerning "circling cups" and "rosy wine," (he always drank cinnamon-cordial diluted with water,) &c. &c. At the time of receiving this, I was busy with "an essay attempting to form a judgment of the characters of authors from their works." I read half a dozen of my friend's poems, after which I folded up my manuscript, laid it on the fire, and said nothing more about the matter. Ever since that time I have entertained a decided abhorrence of early rising in every shape, and never contract an intimacy with any man that gets up before six in summer and seven in winter.

ANECDOTE OF MURAT.—Baron Larrey lately told the academy of sciences that Murat was one day giving the word of command, when a ball struck his throat and penetrated as far as the larynx. At the end of a few minutes, and after some violent efforts, he spit it out, and was cured within a fortnight.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

January.—This month is so called from Janus, whose festival was celebrated on the first day by the Romans. It has been asserted, that its derivation is from janua, a door, because it opens the year, and is, therefore, called its portal; but this is fanciful, and unworthy of credit. In the Monthly Miscellany for December, 1693, there is an essay on new-year's gifts. It states, that "the Romans were great observers of the custom of new-year's presents, even when their year consisted only of ten months, of thirty-six days each, and began in March; also, when January and February were added by Numa to the ten others, the calends, or first of January, were the time on which they made presents; and even Romulus and Tatius made an order, that every year verine should be offered to them, with other gifts, as tokens of good fortune for the new year. Tacitus mentions an order of Tiberius, forbidding the giving or demanding of new-year gifts, unless it were on the calends of January, at which time the senators, as well as the knights and other great men, brought gifts to the emperor, and, in his absence, to the capitol. The ancient Druids, with great ceremonies, used to scrape off from the outside of oaks, the maleden, which they consecrated to their great Tutates, and then distributed it to the people, through the Gauls, on account of the great virtues which they attributed to it; from whence new-year's gifts are still called in some parts of France, guy-Pan-neuf. Our English nobility, every new-year's tide, still send to the king a purse with gold in it. Reason may be joined to custom to justify the practice; for as presages are drawn from the first things which are met on the beginning of a day, week, or year, none can be more pleasing than of those that are given us. We rejoice with our friends, after having escaped the dangers that attend every year; and congratulate each other for the future, by presents and wishes for the happy continuance of that course, which the ancients called strenarium comercium."

This month is generally the coldest in the year.

"Cold and raw the north winds blow
Bleak in the morning early;
All the trees are covered with snow
As it is in the winter yearly."

Snow is most apt to fall in this month, and the pleasures of snow-balling and sleighing, skating and sliding, are then fully realized. With us they have been rare of late years. Not so in more northern regions, where the poet's description still applies in all its force:

"Now in the Netherlands, and where the Rhine
Branched out in many a long canal extends,
From every province swarming, void of care
Bavaria rushes forth; and as they sweep
On sounding skates, a thousand different ways,
In circling poise, swift as the winds along,
The then gay land is maddened all to joy.
Nor less the northern courts, wide o'er the snow,
Pour a new pomp. Caper on rapid sleds
Their vigorous youth, in bold contention, wheel
The long resounding course. Meantime, to raise
The manly strife, with highly blooming charms,
Flushed by the season, Scandinavia's dames,
Or Russia's buxom daughters, glow around."

We can remember, when, in good old years, now gone by, we too had our share of these pastimes, even in this now so busy and money-making city of New-York. It was not then so populous, nor so filthy, nor so filled with strange faces, come from heaven knows whence; from the strada of Naples, the alameda of Madrid, the shanties of Tipperary, the huts of Berne, the bazaars of Morocco, or perhaps some pagoda in Canton. So many dark-looking brick walls did not intercept the free currents of keen and bracing air, that swept down from the iron-bound palisades of Jersey, and over the foam-crested waves of Henry Hudson's own beloved river, across the spacious plains and meadows of Lispenard's farm, infusing health, vigour, and bloom into the youthful faces that were seen, thick as blackberries in June, or the leaves in Valombrosa, to move and wheel gracefully around, poised upon their polished skates. Canal-street, that eternal and mushroom-growth thoroughfare, was not. St. John's lofty spire was just commencing to cast its shadow far and wide over the groves and plantations of trees that lay thickly scattered around, barely relieved here and there by some villa or decent cottage, peeping through the foliage. Thompson and Sullivan, and even Laurens-street, (in which latter a theatre hath since stood and fallen too) were all in embryo. But those were the days of our youth, and this editorial column is not the suitable place in which to recall them, or mourn over their faded glory. They shall not, however, be lost to the reader; we mean to present him shortly with our "reminiscences of New-York," and show that we can excel even the far-famed Francis Herbert, Esq. on this most interesting topic. There are streets, and alleys, and lanes, and roads, and avenues, about which we could relate the most pathetic stories and engrossing anecdotes. Such a street was wholly destroyed by fire; in such an alley an awful murder was committed; in yonder lane a great personage breathed his last; and in the meeting of these two roads a capital execution was once exhibited, by the considerate indulgence of the public authorities, for the festive enjoyment of some thousand spectators, and the immense pecuniary emolument of eighty-nine ginger-bread boys. But we forget January. If this month is the coldest of the year, it is not without its pleasures even in these degenerate days. A clear day will sometimes be succeeded by a far more clear night; and then the beauties of the starry firmament glow in all their most transparent lustre. "The earth is dark, but the heavens are bright." The beautiful constellation Orion, distinguished by the three stars of his girdle, makes a conspicuous figure in the heavens. Astronomical studies may now be usefully blended with bodily exercise and moral contemplation. Man may humble himself, as he regards those distant and adamant spheres that wheel along silently, but impressively and harmoniously, through the immense vault above; and if a feeling of rebellious pride arise, he may address himself—

"And canst thou think, poor worm, those orbs of light
In size immense, in number infinite,
Were made for thee alone,—to twinkle in thy sight?
Presumptuous mortal! can thy nerves deery
How far from thee they roll, from thee how high!
With all thy boasted knowledge, canst thou see
Their various beauty, order, harmony?"

Number twenty-six.—The half volume of the present year is now completed. Having been compelled, by circumstances, to say much of late respecting our arrangements, and—thanks to the public—our very brilliant prospects, we shall not obtrude any remarks which might have otherwise suggested themselves at this time. We cannot, however, refrain from offering the tribute of our wishes for the individual prosperity of our numerous readers, for their unalloyed and heartfelt enjoyment of the festivities of the season, and for the continuance of that reciprocal and cheering good-will that has ever subsisted between them and ourselves.

N. B.—Next week we shall commence the publication, as promised in our last, of the regular order of popular airs. We shall then endeavour to comply successively with the wishes of many subscribers for particular and favourite melodies.

The Proselyte.—We have only room to acknowledge the receipt of this very interesting brochure, and to applaud the humane spirit which induced its author to publish it at the present juncture. It is well calculated to make the unwary pause, who are ready to engulf themselves in the abyss of a cold and unredeeming scepticism, and array themselves against the present order and well-being of society. We need only say it is from the pen of the accomplished writer of the "Uneducated Wife," to ensure it an attentive perusal.

Clara Fisher.—Bourne has just published a magnificent portrait of this highly-gifted and deservedly popular young lady, executed by Gimber and Bennet, from an original picture by Inman. A better finished acquaintance engraving, or a more animated and striking likeness, we have seldom, if ever, seen. The size of the print is fifteen by twenty inches. As Miss Fisher is a universal favourite, her portrait will, no doubt, meet with a very rapid and extensive sale.—Bourne deserves credit for his taste and enterprise.

Independence of the press.—An Ohio editor declines publishing an obituary notice of two columns, on the death of an infant three months old! deeming it rather too long: and for which refusal the writer stopped his paper.

Longevity.—An unmarried lady, named Poirier, died a few days ago at Villeveque, at the great age of one hundred and one years and eight months. She retained the use of all her faculties, and was consequently cheerful to the day of her death.

Ice.—A mixture of four ounces of nitrate of ammonia, four ounces of subcarbonate of soda, and four ounces of water, in a tin pail, have been known to produce ten ounces of ice in three hours.

Cemeteries.—There is a project on foot at Paris, of forming a cemetery after the manner of the ancient pyramids, capable of containing five million bodies.

New mode of surveying.—A traveller gravely assures us, that he had ascertained the height of these mountains in Africa, called "Mountains of the moon," simply by tying his feet together with a cord, in such a way as to allow them to separate one yard. He then walked from the highest point to the base, which gave the measurement in yards.

Agents, and others indebted to this establishment, are respectfully requested, on the receipt of the present number, to cancel our demands against them.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

WHISKERS.

"I see of you, I beseech you; nay, I insist upon it," said Mrs. Lawton to her son.

"Impossible," replied the elegant and fashionable individual to whom the apostrophe was addressed, touching the tip of his snow-white collar, almost imperceptibly, with his thumb and middle finger, and introducing the thumb of his other hand within the arm-hole of his vest with rather a dashing air. "It is utterly and absolutely impossible—any thing but that."

"But, Charles," continued the persevering old lady, "dear Charles, oblige me this once—I have set my heart on it."

"It cannot be," said the youth, assuming a theatrical attitude, and extending his right arm, with his finger pointing towards the sky.

"'Twill be recorded for a precedent;
"And many an error, by the same example,
"Will rush into the state: it cannot be."

"Let me persuade you," said his sister, a fine dashing girl, with a voice like the ringing of silver, and eyes which must have melted the very soul out of any man except a brother. "May I entreat you?"

"Oh, entreat? Certainly, Kate; you may entreat."

"Well, there," said she, flinging her arm around his waist, and looking triumphantly at her mother.

"But," added Charles, glancing complacently down upon his long, polished, square-toed, graceful boot. "I shant do it, you know, although you do entreat."

"Oh," said Kate, "go about your business; you are a perfect fright."

"You think so, do you, Kate?" and he glanced upon the broad mirror, which hung at the end of the apartment, reflecting the image of a very handsome and well-dressed man. "You have made quite a discovery. You deserve credit; but they won't believe you, Kate; good by;" and, flinging across his shoulders a Spanish cloak, of blue cloth, whose ample folds fell in drapery around his stately form, he placed a ten dollar beaver upon his pericranium, and made his exit.

Now, reader, if you are a grave merchant—then, Mr. reader, if you are a foreigner, just come from "earth's proudest isle"—then, sir reader, if a young gosling dandy, fluttering upon the arena of fashion; master reader—or if some sweet face bends over the page, robbing the avaricious world of radiant glances for my poor scribbles, then, dear reader, are you resolved to pursue this history? If so, before you proceed further, especially the last-named class of my fellow-creatures, let us sound a parley. It is not my intention to enlighten you upon any bloody adventures, nor to draw the blinding tears from their crystal fountains, by tracing the progress of any unfortunate young lady who "never told her love," or told it to no purpose; although, I confess, "the Spanish cloak," and the "ample folds," and "the stately form," have a suspicious appearance. No tempest is to be raised, no battle to be fought, not even a heart shall be broken, though collegians and merchants' clerks are so susceptible to perforations, you know of, that they are usually cracked and otherwise damaged. I have humour to-night neither for the romantic, the sentimental, nor the sublime. This is a practical essay, and though serious and important, has no claim upon your delicate sympathies.

Reader, let us fling aside all jesting, and proceed to the consideration of one of the most alarming evils of modern times.

"But who were the characters first introduced to me?" thinks some gay little miss, all curiosity, tenderness, and ready to fall in love with her own shadow.

I must answer this interrogatory in my own fashion. Mr. Charles Lawton was a gentleman in every sense of the word. His address was sufficient recommendation into every circle of society. His person marked him for one of partial nature's favourites; his disposition candid, generous, and noble; his mind acute, powerful, and highly cultivated. He had one fault, or rather two, and they were his whiskers! They seemed naturally gifted with an inordinate growing force, which he was at no trouble to restrain. The consequence was, that from his cheek bones to his throat, and from the back of his neck to the curl of his chin, he was nothing but whiskers. Our essay commenced with a dialogue upon this very subject. Now, to rear an unexceptionable pair of whiskers requires taste and discernment. It is a task of the most difficult kind, fraught with various dangers. They may be too small—that's mean; or they may be overgrown—that's monstrous. There is a kind of Scylla and Charybdis in the endeavour.

There are whiskers that are not written. There is a kind of man incompetent to raise them. The upper part of the cheek is smooth as a girl's, while, from the barren soil of the jaw bone, some few unfortunate creatures struggle up into a melancholy and dubious existence, so far apart, that if they had voices they could scarcely converse without a speaking-trumpet. "The attempt, and not the deed, confounds us." I pity such a gentleman from the bottom of my soul.

But this is an evil of comparatively inferior importance. It is the amazing increase in size, and multiplication of the number of this article of personal decoration, which prompts me to solicit the attention of the civilized world. They find their way into all companies. Balls and parties are overshadowed by their presence; even the purity and brightness of the domestic circle are violated; and you may find a gentle youth, who yet "speaks small like a woman," with his visage garnished like the great mogul. I am not easily susceptible to terror; but I confess the rapid strides which this fashion makes startled me, and urged me to many profound meditations. I am an American, and I love my country. The interest I felt in her welfare urged me on. From citations I proceeded to inquiry; investigation led to discovery; until I succeeded in unfolding one of the most anti-republican and diabolical conspiracies which ever threatened the independence of a free and happy people.

A secret society has been organized, entitled the "whiskerandos-and-mustachio-confederation," conceived and headed by two or three noted characters in this city. They hold their midnight conclave in a subterranean apartment beneath "Bluebeard hall." Don Felix Furioso has arrived from Spain; and with Gen. Scrubbingbrush from Bear-island in the Arctic ocean, (the one distinguished for having put a band of robbers to flight in the middle of the darkest night in December, by merely putting his head out of the mail-coach window, and the other for having thrown a whale into convulsions, off Labrador, which incautiously ventured near enough to look into the cabin windows as he was shaving the tip of his chin,) have been invited here to superintend the execution of their nefarious designs to overturn all our institutions, abrogate the laws, subvert the constitution, and deliver us up to the dominion of the Prince Daredevil, of a little island in the South Pacific ocean, latitude ninety, who shaves every part of his face except the end of his nose. All who join their society are to cultivate this badge of distinction, to the greatest possible extent. The members of this dangerous tribunal are heedless of all consequences. The dearest social relations are to be rent asunder, rather than yield a hair; and it is astonishing to observe how widely it has already spread. It embraces some of the most wealthy, fashionable, and influential of our citizens. Editors, lawyers, doctors, boys, and old white-headed men. As they become more firmly established, they are gradually throwing off caution. The mustachio is soon to be mounted by young Mr. Q. who lately won the affections of several interesting young women by displaying a blue check collar; and who has since broken off several promising matches, and flung four milliner girls, six chamber maids, thirteen belles, and one married woman, into a galloping consumption, by paying his addresses to them without any collar at all. Monsieur Temeraire, from Paris, has an assortment on hand for those who are unfortunate in the upper lip. They are manufactured out of the horse-hair, fastened with adhesive plaster, and are positively superior in fierceness and irresistibility to every other kind. Monsieur Temeraire has the honour to announce to his friends in particular, and the public in general, that he certainly must excel in this valuable art, as he spent fourteen years among the Russian bears, with the sole intention of studying the spirit of their countenances. He flatters himself that, by following his directions in regard to the whiskers and mustachios, he can transform the smoothest, genteel, and most interesting youth, so as to be distinguished from a bear itself only upon the closest examination.

This is a crisis of infinite danger, and I hope pens abler than mine will resume the subject. I recommended the mayor to order out the militia; but Mr. Bowne assured me that the officers were generally leading men in the "whiskerandos-and-mustachiod-confederation," and have, therefore, set their faces against any interference. I then resolved to apply to the editors to publish my fears; but upon entering into the closet of one of our most celebrated, I was startled to find myself alone, in a little room twelve by ten, door shut, with a pair of whiskers of most threatening aspect. As the only resource, I propose that we organize a society to be entitled the "anti-whiskerandos-and-mustachiod-confederacy-society." It shall be a stock company; if the legislature also are not too far gone to grant a charter, with a capital of a hundred millions of dollars. A meeting of the citizens opposed to whiskers, including women and children, is requested in the Park, on the eighth day of January, A. D. 1830, when measures will be taken to prepare a petition to congress for the purpose of excluding from office every man of whiskers, of making the oath of lawyers that they will support the constitution and wear no whisker, and of rendering mustachios a capital offence. HONOR.

VARIETIES.

MONSTROUS MELO-DRAMA.—The theatre of Gaiety at Paris; has just presented the lovers of the horrible with a melo-drama, which, with all the beauties of the old school—illness and persecuted virtue—unites all the perfections of the new; a corpse whom the exhumators have just delivered for dissection. The heroine of this funeral history is a poor girl named Alice. Smitten by a physician called Belton, she fancies she is beloved, and going to be united to him, when all at once the unfaithful lover disappears, and abandons her for another woman. At the moment that Belton is going to render his infidelity irreparable by a marriage with his newly beloved, his bell is rung; he opens the door, and finds some exhumators who bring him for sale the body of a young girl. This young girl is Alice, dead of despair. This termination of the piece is of course horrifying to a people who execrate the grave scene of Hamlet. The work, nevertheless, shows ability, and possesses much interest.

THE CHATTI-SHERIF.—This word implies the sign-manual of the sultan. In the early days of Turkish story, when the Ottoman sovereign was unacquainted with the use of the pen, he had no other sign-manual, or chatti-aherif, but the rough impression of his hand, which he had previously besmeared with ink. In more recent times, the sultan, feeling a sovereign antipathy to the toil either of ruling or writing, his genuine autograph is of very rare occurrence; and the chatti-aherif, or "noble line," is limited to a line of two or three short words, which he scrawls with his own hand at the corner of treaties, cabinet orders, diplomas, &c. It has ever been more to their taste to wield a sword than a pen.

THE SHOE AND THE SLIPPER, A FABLE FROM THE FRENCH.—A shoe, ornamented with superb buckles, said to a slipper, that was placed near to him, "My good friend, why have you not buckles?" "Of what use are they?" replied the slipper. "Is it possible you don't know the use of buckles? without them we should stick in the mire in the first bog we enter." "My dear friend," said the slipper, "I never go into bogs." It is certainly wiser and better to avoid difficulties than to provide remedies for them. This is a lesson cunning people and fools can never understand.

AN HYPOCHONDRIAC.—There is now in the Maison de Santé, at Rouen, a patient who is fully impressed with the belief that he was killed at the battle of Austerlitz, at which he was, in fact, present, and received a wound. If his health is inquired after, he answers, "You are asking after M. Lambert, but M. Lambert is no more, he was killed by a cannon ball. I know this which you see bears some resemblance to him, but it is by no means a good likeness, I wish you would construct a better." He falls occasionally into a state of insensibility, which sometimes lasts for several days, during which the application of blisters, pinches, and even pricking him with a pin, appear to give him no kind of uneasiness.

DUCHESS OF ST. ALBANS.—The duchess of St. Albans is in possession of a greater number of unpublished poems, epigrams, satires, and sonnets, written by the late lord Erskine, than any other person. During the life-time of Mr. Coutts, and especially those portions of the year which they spent either at Brighton or Salt Hill, when that most amiable nobleman was their guest, it was his constant custom to present Mrs. Coutts at dinner-time, or immediately after, an original poem, all of which are inserted in the album of the duchess of St. Albans, and not one of them has been published.

DERIVATION OF HONEY-MOON.—It was the custom of the higher order of Teutones, a people who inhabited the northern part of Greece, to drink mead or metheglin, a beverage made with honey, for thirty days after every wedding. From this custom comes the expression "to spend the honey-moon."

FIDELITY.—Horn, president of Magdalen college, Oxford, and afterwards bishop of Norwich, said pleasantly enough, of an indolent person who lived five and thirty years in college, without any occupation, "he had nothing to do, and he did it!"

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1880.

NUMBER 27.

We make room for the following address, which was presented to our city subscribers on the first instant. It is scarcely necessary to state that it is from the pen of our good friend Samuel Woodworth, esq.: to use the language of Curran, "the maker's name is stamped upon the blade."

Address of the Carrier.

TUNE—"Songs of shepherds and rustical roundelays."

Time is a dotard, I'll wager a ha'penny,
Age and care must have addled his brain,
Creeping onward, he does not escape any,
Wit and genius invoke him in vain.
With fraudulent dealing, he's constantly stealing
The blossoms of feeling, as soon as they bloom;
While pleasure and beauty, he thinks it his duty,
To seize as his booty, and hide in the tomb.
Years have roll'd with increasing celerity,
Roll'd and mix'd in eternity's seas,
Since your carrier, with truth and sincerity,
First address'd you in numbers like these.
Six have departed, since blithe and light-hearted,
He then first imparted his feelings in rhyme;
And many sweet faces, renowned for their graces,
May now show the traces of pilfering Time.
Hang the dotard!—Excuse the profanity,
Few would censure the deed as a crime;
Old and young, in this era of vanity,
All conspire in the killing of Time.
And each of these verses your carrier rehearses,
Successively pierces his bosom no doubt;
And while you are reading the villain is bleeding—
The sands are receding—his glass will run out!
Kill him oft as you please, he will rise again:
When the Mirror has knocked him down flat,
Quick as thought he is up, and he flies again—
Nipe more lives than your favourite cat.
But maugre his capers, there are few better papers
To drive away vapours, and cripple his wing;
And none in the city can furnish a ditty
So pretty and witty as that which we bring.
Press'd on paper of elegant quality,
Taste and neatness distinguish each page;
Music suited to sadness or jollity,
Each new song that is heard from the stage.
With drawings appended, so brilliant and splendid,
That all have commended their taste and design;
Engraven so sweetly, and printed so neatly,
That critics, discreetly, pronounce them divine.
Where's the host of aspiring competitors,
Springing like mushrooms, as quick to expire?
Ask their editors, printers, and creditors,
They will tell you 'twas best to retire.
'Tis true the Truth-Teller, an emigrant dweller,
A fine clever fellow, is still on the road;
And Albion's pages enlighten all ages,
While Atlas engages to bear his own load.
Were not modesty prone to prohibit us
Praising the Mirror and telling its worth,
We could boast of a host of contributors,
Rivall'd in talent by few upon earth.
'Tis not our intention, however, to mention
The weekly convention of poets and wits,
Whose sage lucubrations, and choice speculations,
On divers occasions, enlighten our city.
F. you know, in the cause of morality,
Wields a pen seldom rivall'd in force,
Proving virtue a blissful reality,
Vice the herald of pain and remorse.
His blithe LITTLE SPIRIT appears to inherit
A genius and merit supernally bright;
And long will continue with sweetness to win you,
And kindle within you a glow of delight.
C. renowned for his strictures dramatical,
Charms the lovers of genius and wit,
Telling critics, in language emphatical,
Whom the chaplet of honour will fit.
Fair Emily etches such beautiful sketches,
That fancy outstretches her pinions to fly;
Then there's a writer of genius still brighter,
Whose talents delight her—he signs himself I.
S. conversant in matters historical,
Culls the flow'rets of every clime,
Tuneful Reuben, in strains allegorical,
Sweetly dresses a moral sublime.
Ianthe, Lucinda, Estelle, and Belinda,
With Thyra and Hinda, are minstrels of fame;
While Everard, Norna, with Proteus and Horner,
And Q in a corner, the laurel may claim.

Time would fail us in mentioning more of them;

These suffice for a holiday verse,
Tho' 'twere easy to name twenty score of them,
Could it but add twenty cents to our purse.
We rather would mention some happy invention,
And turn your attention to city affairs,
Improved regulations, in divers locations,
And grand alterations in angles and squares.

"We"—the Mirror—ne'er stooping to flattery,
Tell our aldermen what they must do.
Thus they furnished the seats on the Battery,
Thus the Park was embellished for you.
And now they decide well, the jail and the bridewell,
Which oft we deride well, must soon disappear;
And streets are extended, by us recommended,
And others intended, in course of the year.

Broadway shortly must meet the Fourth Avenue,
Know the mandate has gone from our lip;
Down-town merchants may possibly have a new Ferry to Brooklyn, from busy Old-slip.
But save us from one ill, a bridge or a tunnel,
Except for a runnel to water your lambs;
May hurricanes shiver, and tempests deliver
The noble East River from bridges and dams.

More than any our columns contributed
Hints for fashions, amusements, and such;
All the shows that have yet been exhibited
Owe their worth to our magical touch.
The Park and the Bowery, and Chatham so flowery,
Though evenings were showery, were fill'd by our pen;
And now that the latter's a circus, no matter
We'll keep up a clatter to fill it again.

Competition and hopeless rivalry
Swell no longer the pomp of the stage;
Each competitor has, in reality,
Bow'd to "Old Drury," their senior in age.
Where Forrest has lately increas'd his fame greatly,
By calling the stately King Philip from death;
And no ninny-hammer, can easily damn a
New elegant drama, like Stone's, with a breath.

Barnes, Placide, and Hilson are comical;
Tuneful Austin is graceful as fair;
Barry of gesture is not economical;
Woodhull's too partial of fighting the air.
The loud tones of Ritchings are truly bewitching,
Such rapturous twittings are felt at the breast,
You'll own, if you heed 'em, there's nought can exceed 'me,
When brave "Sons of Freedom" is "sung by request."

Sharpe, with eyes like her name, will enrapture you;
Hilson smiles while she pierces the heart;
Wallack too, with her acting may capture you;
Wheatley delights us in every part.
But sweet Clara Fisher, the worst that we wish her,
Is laurels still fresher around her to fall;
A fortune to bless her, true friends to caress her,
And one to possess her that's worthy of all.

Cline, renown'd for his grace and agility,
Wheeled a barrow aloft on a rope;
Niblo, famed for champagne and civility,
Fill'd his purse and his bottles we hope.
We'll offer no stricture, on West's famous picture,
And though 'twould afflict your best feelings no doubt,
Go view it at leisure, confessing with pleasure,
That this is a treasure unequal'd throughout.

Vizards or masks were the rage till prohibited;
Balls, soirees, and assemblies are yet;
Cards and billetdoux, daily distributed,
Summon the lovers of pleasure and wit.
But while their pavilions resound with cotillions,
There're less favour'd millions as happy as they;
Besides a choice number, whom nought will encumber,
But rythmical lumber, prepared for to-day.

Holiday gifts—there's none like an annual,
But though the Talisman counted the best,
Kitchiner's cook-book, the "Housekeeper's Manual,"
We recommend and prefer to the rest;
For this will enable each fair at her table
(I tell you no fable, but plain common sense),
To furnish such dishes of meats and of fishes,
As every one wishes, at little expense.

Themes religious, and subjects political,
Grecian, Turkish, or Russian, we bar;
None but vassals, in strains parasitical,
Chant the praises of Sultan or Czar.
We'll make no reflections on recent elections,
Nor whisper objections, because we don't care;
Of squabbles and scratches, and runaway matches,
Or jumping Sam Patches, or Morgan's affair.

Thanks for favours—expressions of gratitude,

Hopes and wishes which fancy defines,
These are subjects entitled to latitude—
We despatch them in four little lines:
May every blessing that's worth your possessing,
And nothing distressing, be pour'd in your cup;
The heart's purest pleasure be yours without measure,
With one richer treasure in heaven laid up.

MORAL TALES.

THE VILLAGE ROMANCE.

BY MISS MITFORD.

It was on a rainy day, late in last November, that Mrs. Villars came to take possession of her new residence, called the lodge, a pretty house, situated within the boundaries of Oak-hampstead Park, the pleasant demeane of her brother-in-law, sir Arthur Villars, and generally appropriated to the use of some dowager of that ancient and wealthy race.

Mrs. Villars was an elderly lady, of moderate fortune, and excellent character. She was the widow of a dignified and richly-beneficed clergyman, who had been dead some years, and had left her with three promising sons and two pretty daughters, all of whom were now making their way in the world to her perfect satisfaction; the daughters happily and respectably married; the sons thriving in different professions; and all of them as widely scattered as the limits of our little island could well permit—so that their mother, disencumbered of the cares of her offspring, had nothing now to prevent her accepting sir Arthur's kind offer, of leaving the great town in which she had hitherto resided, and coming to occupy the family-jointure house at Oakhampstead. To inhabit a mansion in which so many stately matrons of the house of Villars had lived and died, was a point of dignity no less than of economy; and besides, there was no resisting so excellent an opportunity of gratifying, amidst the good archdeacon's native shades, the taste for refinement and solitude, of which she had all her life been accustomed to talk. Talk, indeed, she did so very much of this taste, that shrewd observers somewhat questioned its existence, and were not a little astonished when, after dallying away the summer over take-leave visits, she and her whole establishment (two maids, a pony-chaise, a tabby-cat, and her scrub Joseph) left C., with its society and amusements, its morning calls and evening parties, for solitude and the lodge.

Never was place or season better calculated to bring a lover of retirement to the test. Oakhampstead was situated in the most beautiful and least inhabited part of a thinly inhabited and beautiful county; the roads were execrable; the nearest post-town was seven miles off; the vicar was a bachelor of eighty; and the great house was shut up. There was not even one neighbour of decent station, to whom she might complain of the want of a neighbourhood. Poor Mrs. Villars! The last stroke, too, the desertion of the park, was an unexpected calamity; for, although she knew that sir Arthur had never resided there since the death of a most beloved daughter, after which event it had been entirely abandoned, except for a few weeks in autumn, when his only son, Harry Villars, had been accustomed to visit it for the purpose of shooting; yet she had understood that this her favourite nephew was on the point of marriage with the beautiful heiress of General Egerton, and that this fine old seat was to form the future residence of the young couple. Something, she learned, had now occurred to prevent a union which, a few months ago, had seemed so desirable to all parties—some dispute between the fathers, originally trifling, but worked up into bitterness by the influence of temper—and all preparations were stopped, Harry Villars gone abroad, and the great house as much shut up as ever. Poor Mrs. Villars, who, after all her praises of retirement, and her declared love of solitude, could not, with any consistency, run away from this "deserted village," was really as deserving of pity as any one guilty of harmless affectation well can be.

The good lady, however, was not wanting to herself in this emergency. She took cold, that she might summon an apothecary from the next town; and she caused her pigs to commit a trespass on the garden of a litigious farmer, that she might have an excuse for consulting the nearest attorney. Both resources failed. The medical man was one of eminent skill and high practice, whom nothing but real illness could allure into constant attendance; and the lawyer was honest, and settled the affair of the pigs at a single visit. All that either could do for her, was to enumerate two or three empty houses that might possibly be filled, and two or three people who would probably call when the roads became passable. So that poor Mrs. Villars, after vainly trying to fill up her vacant hours—alas! all her hours!—by superintending her own poultry yard, overlooking the village school, giving away flannel petticoats, and relieving half the old women in the parish, had very nearly made up her mind to find the lodge disagree with her, and to return to her old quarters at C. when the arrival of a fresh inmate at the next farm-house, gave an unexpected interest to her own situation.

Oakhampstead was, as I have said, a very beautiful spot. Its chief beauty consisted in a small lake or mere without the park, surrounded partly by pastoral meadow grounds, and partly by very wild and romantic woodland scenery, amongst which grew some of the noblest oaks in the kingdom. The water did not, perhaps, cover more than thirty acres: although a length disproportioned to its breadth, a bend in the middle, and, above all, the infinite variety of its shores, indented with tiny bays and jutting out into mimic promontories, gave it an appearance of much greater extent. Rides and walks had formerly been cut around it; but these were now rude and overgrown, the rustic seats decayed and fallen, and the summer-houses covered with ivy and creeping plants. Since the absence of Sir Arthur, neglect had succeeded to care; but a poet or a painter would have felt that the scene had gained in picturesque what it had lost in ornament. A green boat, however, and a thatched boat-house, still remained in excellent preservation, under the shadow of some magnificent elms, and the chimney of the boatman's cottage might just be seen peeping between the trees, over the high embankment which formed the head of the lake. The only other habitation visible from the water, was an old farm-house, the abode of farmer Ashton, whose wife, formerly the personal attendant of the late Lady Villars, had soon been found by her surviving relative to be by far the most conversable person in the place; and if the many demands on her attention, the care of men, maids, cows, calves, pigs, turkeys, geese, ducks, chickens, and children, would have allowed her to devote much time to that unfortunate lady, her society would doubtless have proved a great solace and resource. But Mrs. Ashton, with all her desire to oblige Mrs. Villars, was enviously busy, and could only at short and distant intervals listen to, and, by listening, relieve the intolerably ennui of her seclusion.

Now, however, a fresh inmate had made her appearance at the farm: a young woman, whom Mrs. Ashton called Ellen, and introduced as her niece, who having much leisure, (for apparently she did nothing in the family but assist in the lighter needle-work) and evincing, as far as great modesty and diffidence would permit, her respectful sympathy with the involuntary recluse, became her favourite auditor during her frequent visits to farmer Ashton's; and was soon sent for as a visitor (an humble visitor, for neither Mrs. Villars nor her young guest ever forgot the difference of their stations) at the lodge. Seldom a day passed without Joseph and the pony-chaise being sent to fetch Ellen from the farm. Nothing went well without her.

Partly, of course, the charm might be resolvable into the bare fact of getting a listener; any good listener would have been a welcome acquisition in this emergency; that is to say, any one who felt and showed a genuine sympathy with the "fair afflicted;" but few could have been so thoroughly welcome as Ellen, who soon became, on the score of her own merits, a first-rate favourite with Mrs. Villars.

Whether Ellen was pretty or not, was a standing question in the village of Oakhamstead. Her zealous patroness answered without the slightest hesitation in the affirmative. Other people doubted. For the common sort, her face and figure wanted showiness; whilst the young farmers and persons of that class complained that she was not, according to their notions, sufficiently genteel, Mrs. Villars' man-of-all-work, Joseph, combined both objections, by declaring that Ellen would be well enough if she were smarter. My readers must judge for themselves, as well at least as a pen-and-ink drawing will enable them.

Her figure was round and short, piquante and youthful. Her face was round also, with delicate features and a most delicate complexion, as white and smooth as ivory, and just coloured enough for health. She had finely-cut gray eyes, with dark eyebrows and eyelashes, a profusion of dark hair, and a countenance so beaming with gaiety and sweetness, that the expression was always like that of other faces when they smile. Then her voice and accent were enchanting. She sang little snatches of old airs in gushes like a nightingale—freely—spontaneously, as if she could no more help singing as she went about, than that "angel of the air;" and her spoken words were as musical and graceful as her songs; what she said being always sweet, gentle, and intelligent; sometimes very lively, and sometimes a little sad.

Her dress was neat and quiet—plain, dark gowns, fitting with great exactness, such as were equally becoming to her station and her figure; delicately white caps and habit-shirts, and the simplest of all simple straw bonnets. The only touch of finery about her was in her chaussure; the silk stockings and kid slippers in which her beautiful little feet were always clad, and in her scrupulously clean and new-looking French gloves, of the prettiest pale colours; a piece of quaker-like and elegant extravagance, which, as well as the purity of her accent and diction, somewhat astonished Mrs. Villars, until she found from Mrs. Ashton, that Ellen also had been a lady's maid, admitted early into the family, and treated almost as a companion by her young mistress.

"Where had she lived?" was the next question.

"In General Egerton's family," was the reply; and a new source of interest and curiosity was opened to the good lady, who had never seen her niece, that was to have been, and was delighted with the opportunity of making a variety of inquiries respecting herself and her connexions. Ellen's answers to these questions were given with great brevity and some reluctance; she looked down and blushed, and fidgeted with a sprig of myrtle that she held in her hand, in a manner widely different from her usual lady-like composure.

"Was Miss Egerton so very handsome?"

"Oh, no!"

"So very accomplished?"

"No."

"Did Harry love her very much?"

"Yes."

"Did she love him?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Was she worthy of him?"

"No."

"Ah!" said Mrs. Villars, "I thought she was too fine a lady; too full of airs and graces! I had my doubts of her ever since a note that she sent me, written on blue embossed paper, and smelling most atrociously of otto of roses. I dare say Harry has had a narrow escape. Sir Arthur, even before the quarrel, said she was quite a petite maitresse. Then you think, Ellen, that my nephew is better without her?"

This query caused a good deal of blushing hesitation, and nearly demolished the sprig of myrtle. On its being repeated, she said, "She did not know! She could not tell! She did not wish to speak ill of Miss Egerton; but few ladies appeared to her worthy of Mr. Villars—he was so amiable."

"Was Miss Egerton kind to her?"

"Pretty well," answered Ellen quietly.

"And the general?"

"Oh, very! very!" rejoined Ellen, sighing deeply.

"Why did she leave the family?"

At this question poor Ellen burst into tears, and the conversation ended. Mrs. Villars, unwilling to distress her favourite, did not resume it. She was already prepossessed against the Egertons by the disappointment and vexation which they had occasioned to her nephew, and had little doubt but that either the general or his daughter had behaved unjustly or unkindly to Ellen.

Winter had now worn away; even those remains of winter which linger so long amidst the buds and blossoms of spring; spring itself had passed into summer; the country was every day assuming fresh charms, the roads were becoming passable, and distant neighbours were beginning to discover and to value the lady of the lodge, who became every day more reconciled to her residence, varied as it now was by occasional visits to the county families, and frequent excursions with Ellen upon the lake.

On these occasions they were constantly attended by the boatman, a handy, good-humoured, shock-pated fellow, of extraordinary ugliness, commonly called Bob Green, but also known by the name of "Hopping Bob;" not on account of his proficiency in that one-legged accomplishment, as the cognomen would seem to imply, but because an incurable lameness in the hip had produced a jerking sort of motion in walking, much resembling that mode of progress; and had also given a peculiar one-sided look to his short, muscular figure. The hop, it must be confessed, stood much in his way on land, although he was excellent in the management of a boat; in rowing, or steering, or fishing, or anything that had relation to the water.

A clever fellow was Bob, in his way, and a civil, and paid much attention to his lady and her young companion; and, as the summer advanced, they passed more and more time on the beautiful lake, of which they continued the sole visitors; the great house being still deserted, and little heard either of Sir Arthur or his son.

One afternoon, Mrs. Villars, returning unexpectedly from a distant visit, drove down to the farm, intending to spend the evening with Ellen in the pleasure-boat. It was a bright sunny day, towards the middle of July. The blue sky, dappled with fleecy clouds, was reflected on the calm, clear water, and mingled with the shadows of the trees upon the banks, to which the sun, shining through the tall oaks, gave occasionally a transparent glitter, as of emeralds or beryls; swallows skimmed over the lake, flitting around and about, after the myriads of insects that buzzed in the summer air; the white water-lily lay in its pure beauty in the midst of its deep green leaves; the foxglove and the wild vetch were glowing in the woods; the meadow-sweet, the willow herb, and the golden flag, fringed the banks; cows stood cooling their limbs in the shallow indented bays, and a flock of sheep was lying at rest in the distant meadows.

Altogether it was a scene of sweet and soothing beauty; and Mrs. Villars was looking for Ellen, to partake in her enjoyment, (for Ellen, Mrs. Ashton had told her, was gone down to the mere) when, in a small cove at the other side of the lake, she beheld in a fine effect of sunny light, the boat, their own identical green boat, resting quietly on the water, with two persons sitting in it, seemingly in earnest conversation. One of the figures was most undoubtedly Ellen. Her astonished friend recognised at a glance her lead-coloured gown, her straw bonnet, and that peculiar air and attitude which gave grace and beauty to her simple dress. The other was a man, tall as it seemed, and elegant—most certainly a gentleman. Mrs. Villars even fancied that the height and bearing had a strong resemblance to her own dear nephew, Harry; and immediately a painful suspicion of the possible cause of Ellen's leaving Miss Egerton forced itself upon her mind. Harry had perhaps found the lady's maid no less charming than her mistress. A thousand trifling circumstances in favour of this opinion rushed on her recollection; Ellen's blushes when Harry was accidentally named, her constant avoidance of all mention of the family in which she had resided; the great inequality of her spirits; her shrinking from the very sight of chance visitors; the emotion amounting to pain, which any remarkable instance of kindness or confidence never failed to occasion her; and, above all, the many times in which, after seeming on the point of making some avowal to her kind patroness, she had drawn suddenly back: all these corroborating circumstances pressed at once, with startling distinctness, on Mrs. Villars's memory; and, full of care, she returned to the farm, to cross-question Mrs. Ashton.

Never was examination more thoroughly unsatisfactory. Mrs. Ashton was that provoking and refractory thing, a reluctant witness. First she disputed the facts of the case: "Had Mrs. Villars seen the boat? Was she sure that she had seen it? Was it actually their own green boat? Did it really contain two persons? And was the female certainly Ellen?" All these questions being answered in the affirmative, Mrs. Ashton shifted her ground, and asserted, that "if the female in question were certainly Ellen, her companion must with equal certainty be the boatman, Bob Green, 'Hopping Bob,' as he was called;" and the farmer coming in at the moment, she called on him to support her assertion, which, without hearing a word of the story, he did most positively, as an obedient husband should do—"Yes, for certain, it must be Hopping Bob! It could be no other!"

"Hopping Bob!" ejaculated Mrs. Villars, whose patience was by this time well nigh exhausted: "Hopping Bob! when I have told you that the person in the boat was a young man, a tall man, a slim man, a gentleman! Hopping Bob, indeed!" and before the words were fairly uttered, in hopped Bob himself.

To Mrs. Villars this apparition gave unqualified satisfaction, by affording, as she declared, the most triumphant evidence of an alibi ever produced in or out of a court of justice. Her opponent, however, was by no means disposed to yield the point. She had perfect confidence in Bob's quickness of apprehension, and no very strong fear of his abstract love of truth, and determined to try the effect of a leading question. She immediately, therefore, asked him, with much significance of manner, "whether he had not just landed from the lake, and reached the farm by the short cut across the coppice?" adding, "that her niece had probably walked towards the boat-house, to meet Mrs. Villars, and that Bob had better go and fetch her."

This question, however, produced no other answer than a long shrill whistle from the sagacious boatman. Whether

Mrs. Ashton over-rated his ability, or under-rated his veracity, or whether his shrewdness foresaw that detection was inevitable, and that it would "hurt his conscience to be found out," which ever were the state of the case, he positively declined giving any evidence on the question; and after standing for a few moments eyeing his hostess with a look of peculiar knowingness, vented another long whistle, and hopped off again!

Mrs. Villars, all her fears confirmed, much disgusted with the farmer, and still more so with the farmer's wife, was also departing, when just as she reached the porch, she saw two persons advancing from the lake to the house—her nephew, Harry Villars, and Ellen leaning on his arm!

With a countenance full of grieved displeasure, she walked slowly towards them. Harry sprang forward to meet her: "Hear me but for one moment, my dearest aunt! Listen but to four words, and then say what you will. This is my wife."

"Your wife! why, I thought you loved Miss Egerton?"

"Well, and this is, or rather happily for me, this was Miss Egerton," replied Harry, smiling.

"Miss Egerton!" exclaimed the amazed and half incredulous Mrs. Villars. "Miss Egerton! Ellen, that was not smart enough for Joseph—the fine lady that sent me the rose-scented note—Ellen, at the farm, the great heiress—my own good little Ellen!"

"Ay, my dear aunt—your own Ellen, and my own Ellen—blessings on that word! When we were parted on a foolish political quarrel between our fathers, she was sent, under the care of her cousin, Lady Jerminham, to Florence. Lady Jerminham was much my friend. She not only persuaded Ellen into marrying me privately, but managed to make the general believe that his daughter continued her inmate abroad; whilst Mrs. Ashton, another good friend of mine, contrived to receive her at home. We have been sad deceivers," continued Harry, "and at last Ellen, fettered by a promise of secrecy, which your kindness tempted her every moment to break, could bear the deceit no longer. She wrote to her father, and I spoke to mine; and they are reconciled, and all is forgiven. I see that you forgive us," added he, as his sweet wife lay sobbing on Mrs. Villars' bosom; "I see that you forgive her; and you must forgive me, too, for her dear sake. Your pardon is essential to our happiness; for we are really to live at the park, and one of our first wishes must always be, that you may continue at the great house the kindness that you have shown to Ellen at the farm."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

FORETHOUGHT IN COURTSHIP.—A late Scotch paper contains the following story, which is said to be a sketch from life:—"An elderly spinster, from the town of Paisley, who teaches the lasses tambouring, called on a clergyman not long ago, and told the maid, 'she wanted to speak a word wi' the minister by himself.' He looks at this time were full of importance, and after shutting the study door, she repeatedly whispered, 'Will naeboddy hear us?' 'No,' said the other, 'and even if there should, I suppose you have no treason to communicate.' 'Treason,' said the spinster, as if at a loss to understand the drift of the question, 'I was joust wanting, sir, to tak' ye'er advice.' 'Aweel,' said the minister, in his own homely way, 'since I see there's something weighing on your mind, sit down and tell us a' about it.' 'Weel, sir, I was gaun to tell you that I hae gotten an offer.' 'An offer, Eppy! an offer o' what?' 'Ou, sir,' smiling, 'am sure ye needna speer that; it's lang since I got an offer afore, and as I may never get anither again, I joust cam' to see whether ye think I should tak' him.' 'Oho! Eppy, I understand you now; it's the offer o' a man that's makin' ye sae canty.' 'Deed is't, sir, though I am no muckle uplifted wi't neither.' 'But ye ken, Eppy, it's my business to finish a courting by buckling the parties when they come before me, and no to interfere in the matter.' On hearing this the spinster hung her head, and then said, 'gif ye dinna like to hear me, I am sorry I fashed ye.' 'Weel, but Eppy, wha and what is this lover o' yours?' 'He's a doctor, sir.' 'A doctor! and what would a doctor have to do with the like o' you?' 'Ou, but ye dinna gie me time to tell—he's a smoke doctor.' 'A smoke doctor—that alters the case entirely. And what's his name?' 'They ca' him Steel.' 'Steel! ay steel's a hard metal, and should be true too, for ye ken when we speak of an honest man, we say he's as true as steel.' 'Ay, sir, but he's been three times married already!' 'He must be a great waster o' wives that.' 'Ay, sir, and they tell me he's in debt forbye.' 'In debt forbye! and yet he wants a fourth wife.' 'But then, sir, I'm in a pickle debt mysel'.' 'That's a pity; but you ken what the proverb says—that twa blacks 'ill no make a white; and tho' I've kent mony a couple that did weel in the world, by joining stocks, even when they were sma', I doubt joining debts will hardly answer the same end.' At this intimation the decent spinster looked very grave, and told the minister that the matter had cost her a great deal of thought, and that even before she had seen him, she had half resolved to seat herself quietly by her own fireside, and console herself with the thought, 'that it was better to cry waes me, than waes us.' She then withdrew in better spirits than she had been at first, though most unfortunately the mischievous maid was heard tilting, as she passed the kitchen door,

"As Bessy sat down wi' her seam by the fire,
She thought on the time that was flying by her,
And said to herself, with a heavy heigh, ho!
A' body's like to be married but me."

A NERVOUS LADY.—Cælia is always telling you how provoked she is, what shocking things happen to her; what usage she suffers, and what vexations she meets with every where. She tells you that her patience is quite worn out, and that there is no bearing the behaviour of people. Every assembly that she is at, sends her home provoked; something or other has been said or done, that no reasonable, well-bred person ought to bear. Poor people that want her charity, are sent away with hasty answers, not because she has not a heart to part with any money, but because she is too full of some trouble of her own to attend to the complaints of others. Cælia has no business upon her hands, but to receive the income of a plentiful fortune; but yet, by the doleful tune of her mind, you would be apt to think that she had neither food nor lodging. If you see her look more pale than ordinary, if her lips tremble when she speaks to you, it is because she is just come from a visit, where Lupus took no notice of her, but talked all the time to Lucinda, who has not half her fortune. When cross accidents have so disordered her spirits, that she is forced to send for the doctor, to make her able to eat; she tells him, in great anger at Providence, that she never was well since she was born, and that she envies every beggar that she sees in health. This is the disquiet life of Cælia, who has nothing to torment her, but her own spirit. If you would inspire her with a christian humility, you need do no more to make her as happy as any person in the world. This virtue would make her thankful to God for half so much health as she has had, and help her to enjoy more for the time to come. This virtue would keep off tremblings of the spirits, and loss of appetite, and her blood would need nothing else to sweeten it.

PERIODICALS AND NEWSPAPERS.—In the city of New-York are ten daily papers, averaging one thousand eight hundred and fifty at each publication, and making a weekly aggregate of one hundred and eleven thousand sheets; seven published twice a week, of one thousand eight hundred each, or twenty-five thousand weekly; and sixteen once a week, averaging three thousand one hundred and fifty, and printing fifty-two thousand copies; making a grand total of one hundred and eighty-eight thousand sheets in a week. In the state, besides weekly and oftener, one hundred and forty. In the city, thirty-three. Total, one hundred and seventy-eight. Annuals, quarterlies, monthly, and semi-monthlies, literary, theological, medical, and miscellaneous, are not here included; nor occasional, transient, and unestablished publications. In the United States, in 1828, there were officially reported, eight hundred and twenty-five newspapers; another account gave nine hundred and seventy-four, and there is, probably, now about one thousand periodicals of every description.

A DAMPER.—A young city fop, in company with some belles of fashion, was riding into the country a pleasuring, when they saw a poor rustic-looking country lad at work by the road's side. Thinking it a fine opportunity to show his wit to the damsels, by sporting with the poor boy's ignorance, he thus accosted him: "Can you inform me, Mr. Zeb-dee, how far it is to where I am going, and which is the most direct road?" Poor Zebby, not at all daunted, but with the most sober and composed face, said, "If you are going to the gallows, it is but a short distance; if to the jail, it stands but a few rods this side; but if only to poverty and disgrace, you are now approaching your journey's end—as for the most direct road to either, you are now in it, and cannot miss the way." The dandy dropped his head and drove on.

PERSIAN METHOD OF DESTROYING TIGERS.—A good method of destroying tigers is said to be common in Persia, and towards the north of Hindostan. The device consists of a large semispherical cage, made of strong bamboos or other efficient materials, woven together, but leaving intervals throughout of about three or four inches broad. Under this cover, which is fastened to the ground by means of pickets, in some place where tigers abound, a man, provided with two or three short strong spears, takes post at night. Being accompanied by a dog, which gives the alarm, or by a goat, which, by its agitation, answers the same purpose, the adventurer wraps himself up in his quilt, in full confidence of his safety. When a tiger comes, and, perhaps, after smelling all around, begins to rear against the cage, the man stabs him with one of his spears, through the interstices of the wicker-work, and rarely fails in destroying the tiger, which is ordinarily found dead at no great distance in the morning.

BEASTS OF PREY.—Austin, says the National Gazette, the keeper of the menagerie, near Waterloo-bridge, London, has found that if beasts of prey are kept so well fed as not to know the sense of hunger, they will live together in the same cage, in peace and harmony. But man, says a British writer, is always a restless and dissatisfied animal; as long as he is haunted by the dread of poverty, he thinks that any plan which offers him a comfortable provision and a tranquil mind, comprehends every thing in life; but let him continue so long in this state as to forget what it is to feel or to fear hunger, and he will think his mode of life insipid, and get into adventurous or rapacious action.

ARAB WOMEN.—The Arab women marry about the age of sixteen. They are allowed great liberty, visiting each other till late at night, without interruption; indeed, being in company with a female is considered the best protection. A woman is enabled to divorce her husband on very slight grounds; a bad temper on his part is a sufficient reason; and, if no serious offence can be proved against the wife, she is entitled to receive back her dowry. Every lady, when she visits, carries on her arm a little bag of coffee—this is boiled at the house where she spends the evening; thus enabling her to enjoy society without putting her friend to expense.

SUSPENSION BRIDGE.—An iron chain suspension bridge has lately been constructed at Avignon, which is considered a master-piece of art, and has attracted great attention from the beauty of its proportions. The total length from one buttress to the other is 500 feet; there are two stretches of 240 feet each, capable of supporting a weight of 500,000 kilogrammes. The breadth, which is the same the whole distance, is thirty feet, divided into three ways or roads; the centre one for carriages, and the two others for foot passengers. The height above low-water mark is thirty feet. A triumphal arch surmounts the centre pillar, as well as the two at the buttments of the bridge, resting on the angles. It is supported by six iron cables, by means of vertical cords, the cables being fastened to the pillars, after having passed over the triumphal arch.

THE WILD HORSE.—The following is from the "Library of Useful Knowledge." All travellers who have crossed the plains extending from the shores of La Plata to Patagonia, have spoken of numerous droves of wild horses. Some affirm that they have seen ten thousand in one troop. They appear to be under the command of a leader, the strongest and boldest of the herd, and which they implicitly obey. A secret instinct teaches them that their safety consists in their union, and in a principle of subordination. The lion, the tiger, and the leopard, are their principal enemies. At some signal, intelligible to them all, they either close into a dense mass, and trample their enemy to death, or placing the mares and foals in the centre, they form themselves into a circle, and welcome him with their heels. In the attack, their leader is the first to face the danger, and, when prudence demands a retreat, they follow his rapid flight.

EDITORS.—It is stated that of the proprietors of seventeen political journals published in Paris, at least one-third are noblemen, or persons of great distinction in the scientific or literary world. The proprietors of one paper, who are three in number, are said to be a duke, a count, and a baron. To be a known writer in a respectable periodical, is said to be the best passport to good society in Paris.

TRAVELLING SIXTY YEARS AGO.—An old inhabitant of Cirencester having had occasion to visit London about sixty years since, was asked by a friend if he intended to go by the coach or diligence, which at that time slowly wended its way to the metropolis, he replied, "No, I am in too great a hurry, and therefore would rather walk." He started accordingly, and actually reached the end of his journey some hours before the coach.

DIFFERENCE IN LAW.—The pacha of Egypt, a year or two since, declared that every able-bodied man twenty-one years of age and upwards, should have two wives. The law in North-Carolina is, that every man who has two wives shall be hanged. So much for the wisdom of lawgivers.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

EMILIE.

"With her, methinks, life's little hour
Passed like the fragrance of a flower;
To bridal bloom her strength had sprung—
Behold her beautiful and young."

It is the very best thing I can do; and I'll do it. Shall I not, wife?"

"Certainly, my dear, by all means, if you wish it."

Now what this best thing was, was as much a secret to the complaisant better half of good old Mr. Heyward, as it is to the reader. There she sat in an old-fashioned elbow chair, her whole soul as much occupied with her knitting as was her husband's with his schemes; and, though she occasionally regarded with much satisfaction his goodly form, arrayed in waistcoat, gown, and fine linen, all the work of her own fingers, yet she cared very little for what was passing in his brain. However, as in duty bound, she assented whenever her assent was asked, and he, "good easy man," chuckled at his own wisdom in choosing so obedient a wife, and never for a moment dreamed that she thought his plans of very little consequence, as they generally ended in nothing. This was the true reason for her want of curiosity, though it came to our ears with insinuations of great secrecy, as she was too judicious to allow her husband to suspect it.

Mr. Heyward was a farmer in one of our Yankee settlements. He was "well to do in the world," and had it not been for his generous disposition, might have acquired a store of wealth. But he prided himself upon his hospitality, a great virtue among the Yankees; and besides, the friends which he loved to see daily assemble around his table, it was the custom (in frequenting the little inn of the town) to invite such strangers as he might find there worthy of the compliment, to make his house their home as long as it might be agreeable to them. The house on the hill, therefore, soon became proverbial for the kindness of its master, and the good puddings and pies of its mistress.

This worthy couple had one child, a daughter, the youngest and sole survivor of five children. The loss of the others had thrown a gloom over the early part of their marriage, but it had passed away, and left no trace, except that their love for Emilie was deeper and more idolatrous, because it was undivided. In truth, our heroine grew up a spoiled girl, as wild and untameable as the fawn of the hills. Her parents never contradicted her; but she loved them so entirely and devotedly, that in her most frolicsome moods a look from them would render her as gentle as a dove. The gay laugh would die away, her song would be hushed, and she would glide noiselessly to her little seat by the side of her father, and gaze at him, with an expression of such arch gravity in her blue eyes, and her little mouth pursed up into a shape of seriousness so comical, that the old man would laugh till his eyes run over, and then bid her begone to her doll like a silly child as she was, and not attempt to play the woman till she should have more sense and decorum.

In this manner her years passed away, until she attained the age of fourteen. In height she was almost a woman; but as for a woman's dignity and sobriety, one might as well have looked for it in a kitten.

"She will never be a lady," said her mother; "she will be a hoyden all the days of her life."

"Unless," said aunt Martha, "we send her to a good boarding-school."

"What! part with the darling of my old age," said Mr. Heyward, "impossible!"

But second thoughts are best; and our farmer, finding that this plan, so abruptly discovered, was one upon the success of which all his "woman-kind" had long fixed their hearts, at last yielded with tolerable grace.

Indeed, the wishes of aunt Martha were seldom disputed by either Mr. Heyward or his wife, for it was shrewdly suspected that their little Emilie held a very conspicuous place in her last will and testament, duly drawn up by counsellor Ketchum. The exact amount of the old lady's wealth was not generally understood, but it was known to be sufficient to raise a girl of far less pretensions than Emilie to the rank of a belle; to boarding-school, therefore, was Emilie sent, that she might learn "To prim and mince, to sit up straight and still,

"To bend to fashion nature's wayward will."

And here we must leave her for the present, to inquire into the cause of the exclamation of Mr. Heyward, with which we commenced our story. It has been said, that Mr.

Heyward had a good wife. She was amiable and industrious; and though demonstrating her affection rather by actions than words, yet deeply attached to him. But she had not been the object of his first love. His heart had once received a wound, from which it was long before he recovered. Indeed it was said that he was still subject to fits of melancholy. But when late in life, he gave his hand in marriage, it was with sentiments of the highest respect and esteem for his chosen partner. His judgment even preferred her to the one who still held a hallowed place in his memory, as possessing qualities more calculated to render her truly a helpmate for a man in a middle station of life. But deep in his heart there still existed a feeling of interest in the fate of the loved one of his youth, of tenderer interest than he would have been willing to acknowledge to himself. They had been brought up together. She was early an orphan, and left to the guardianship of his father. So fondly and affectionately had she always treated him, that he had allowed himself to hope, till hope became security. Unexpected by him, therefore, was the answer given to the eager disclosure of his wishes. That her affection for him could never be other than that of a sister. There was no room for hope. And when, shortly afterwards, she bestowed her hand on one who had won her heart, it gave no additional pang to the bosom of George Heyward. He had endured the worst in knowing that she loved him not; and he, perhaps, even rejoiced at an event that removed her from the home, and the scenes where with her he was obliged to remain, and where his frequent meetings with her deepened the wound which time and absence alone could heal.

The young couple settled in a village many miles distant from that home, and from that time they were strangers to the friends of their youth; but Mr. Heyward had occasionally heard of them from sources upon which he could depend: had heard that they were unfortunate in business, but happy in each other; until the death of the husband, in the fifth year of their marriage, destroyed the peace of the little family, and left Mrs. Willis with her boy to brave the sorrows of life, alone and unprotected. The remains of their little property being sold, however, proved sufficient to buy a life-annuity for the widow, which, with economy, gave her the comforts of life and the means of educating her son. He was a boy of a generous, noble disposition, and most promising talents. At the age of fourteen he was considered a good scholar. He was passionately fond of study, and so ardently desirous of a professional life, that his mother relinquished her intention of making him a farmer, and exerted all her power to fulfil his desires. She interested in his behalf the lawyer of the village, a respectable and worthy man, who consented for a moderate yearly stipend to board him in his family, and educate him for the law. The happy mother took lodgings near her son, and with the help of some friends, who furnished her with needle-work, managed to supply the deficiencies of her income, and joyfully looked forward to the time of her son's manhood and prosperity.

"Who knows," would she say to herself, "but I may one day be the mother of a judge!"

But there was one thing which escaped the memory of the good woman; it was, that we are all mortal, and that death cares not to wait till time shall have fulfilled the expectations of his destined victims. But she was soon to learn the truth; soon destined to feel the necessity of preparing for an approaching separation from life, and all that made life dear, her only son.

He had been scarcely a year with his patron, and had already made considerable progress in his studies, and obtained the esteem of his master, who prophesied his future excellence. But after the death of his mother, his prospects would be blighted, as her annuity ended with her life. Mrs. Willis, who was at heart a pious woman, felt that she could meet death with fortitude, and even joy, could she be assured of the future happiness of her son. There was but one hope, and this was to write to Mr. Heyward. She knew he was comparatively rich, and she trusted, with perhaps a little of woman's vanity, but above all, with a woman's ideas of the enduring nature of first love, that her application would not be in vain. She told him of her plans for her son, her wish that he might continue his studies, and, throwing herself upon his generosity, conjured him by the memory of past years, to transfer that friendship to her son, which he had once so warmly felt for her.

The letter reached Mr. Heyward just at evening. He had finished his daily business, and was preparing, as was his custom, to read the evening papers, and, for he was something of a politician, to criticise the measures of government. He read the letter again and again. A thousand tender associations sprung up in his mind. He forgot the lapse of time, and for a moment returned to his boyhood. He awakened from his dream; but his heart was touched, and he determined to be a friend to the boy.

Many plans were thought of, and rejected. At last he determined to visit Mrs. Willis himself, and promise her to be as a father to her child. He expressed his determination in the words with which we introduced him to the reader, and obtained the consent of his wife before unfolding to her his scheme. When he did unfold it, she did not retract it, for the feelings of one mother seldom fail to excite interest in the bosom of another.

Mr. Heyward arrived in time to give joy to the dying mother, who expired invoking blessings on his head. It was agreed that Edward Willis should remain with his friend the lawyer, until he should arrive at the age of twenty-one, when he should obtain his license, and commence the profession for himself. Mr. Heyward took upon himself to defray the expenses till then, and bade him farewell, with injunctions to visit him once a year, that he might become attached to his future home. This was promised, and the promise was carefully kept.

His first visit secured to him the attachment of Mr. Heyward and his wife, and even aunt Martha spoke in terms of high praise of the manly deportment and handsome person of cousin Edward, for by this title did his benefactor wish him to be called. He wrote frequently when he returned, and before the close of the second visit, he was almost as great a favourite as Emilie herself.

He longed to see this cousin of his, of whom he had heard so much. At his third visit he was gratified. She was seventeen, and had been recalled from her school; the mistress of which pronounced her education finished. Aunt Martha was in raptures with her improvement; for though the spirit of mirth was not quenched, yet it was restrained by the diffidence and pride of blushing womanhood, and displayed itself only in the flashing of her eye, and the arch smile of a mouth, which cousin Edward said, was a perfect rose-bud.

It was no wonder that Edward was much pleased with his cousin, for she was certainly a pretty girl, and of so playful a disposition, and yet of such gentle manners, that she was a universal favourite. Then her name was so pretty, so soft and musical, and it glided into verse so easily, that any one might rhyme upon it. Edward was certainly not in love, but he began to love poetry and music. He made sonnets on the moon, and copied songs, and perhaps composed them, when he ought to have been studying Blackstone. His master thought him strangely altered. But asking him, one day, the meaning of some law phrase, he answered, "cousin."

"It is a cozening trade," said the witty lawyer, "but we should keep that to ourselves."

The blunder of the blushing youth had betrayed his secret, but his friend said nothing. Perhaps he thought it was all for the best.

Mr. Heyward encouraged the attachment of the young people tacitly, but he never spoke of it. But there was one trait in the character of Edward, unknown to his relations. He was proud, very proud. He accidentally learned that Emilie was an heiress, and he determined to think of her no more.

"I will not owe my fortune to my wife," thought he, "and it will be many years before I can earn one myself."

He was on his last visit to Mr. Heyward. The next winter was to see the completion of his twenty-first year, and he was then to receive his license. His behaviour to Emilie was distantly respectful. It at first mortified her; but she was quick sighted, and when she discovered the cause, it made him doubly dear to her. She had not been without admirers; one, in particular, had almost gained her affections. He had lived at her father's for many weeks. He was handsome and accomplished; and his attention to Emilie was apparently so sincere, that it made at first a deep impression. But our little heroine happened to overhear him calculating the probable contents of aunt Martha's treasury, for the amusement of a friend, and this turned the current of her feelings. It at first gave her a pang of disappointment; but the mischievous spirit delighted in the thoughts of a merry revenge, and she slowly drew the curtain of the little closet in which she sat, the only separation from the room where her lover was, as he thought, secure from interruption.

The effect was instantaneous. He caught the merry glance of her eye; heard the laugh of her ridicule at his situation, as she disappeared; and, muttering an oath, he took "French leave" of his hospitable entertainers, and was soon far distant.

This event made her cautious, and she continued to reject all offers, as aunt Martha said, for no earthly reason but mere whim.

She did not suspect, nor perhaps did her niece herself, that the image of cousin Edward occupied the secret place in her heart.

"I tell you what, niece Emilie," said aunt Martha, "you are an obstinate girl, and I have a great mind to have nothing more to do with you. Here is farmer Wilson. He is a nice young man, and rich enough to support a wife handsomely; he loves you, and positively, if you won't have him, I will adopt cousin Edward for my son, and make him my heir."

"Dear, dear aunt, I should be the happiest girl in the world."

The old lady stared at her niece, wiped her spectacles, and stared again, till at last, marking the rosy colour of Emilie's cheeks, new light broke upon her.

"Hey day! oh ho—deny it not, you love Edward, my child," said she.

The increasing blushes of her niece, and the sobs which burst from her, as she hid her face on the bosom of her affectionate aunt, alone gave the affirmation to the question.

Aunt Martha was a little romantic, and she gave full credit to the generosity of Emilie, and the nobleness of her lover.

The bells rung merrily in the village to welcome the young lawyer, and celebrate his birth-day. He received the embraces of his relations; to the astonishment of all, when it came to the turn of aunt Martha, she folded him in her arms, and called him her dear son, and the heir of her wealth.

The youth in amazement doubted the evidence of his senses. He glanced at Mr. Heyward, whose countenance beamed with approbation and pleasure. There was another, whose congratulations he had not yet received. He was by her side in an instant, and gazing in her tearful eyes, learned that the prize, for which he had not even dared to hope, was his own.

"Bless you, my child," said old Mr. Heyward; "may you be for ever happy in each other's love."

Years have passed away, and the wish has been realized. Counsellor Willis is an opulent citizen of one of our eastern states, an honour to his profession and his country; and the house on the hill, though modernized and improved, is still the abode of elegance and comfort, and its owner still welcomes the stranger with his wonted hospitality. WHISKERANDOS CONFEDERATION.

MA. EDITOR—Agreeably to a notice published in your last, a large concourse of our fellow-citizens assembled in the park, for the purpose of adopting resolutions in opposition to whiskers, and of directing public attention to the alarming extent of this propensity. The meeting was composed of beardless boys, patriotic spinsters, and immense numbers of those decent and unassuming gentlemen, who were either unwilling from education, or unable by nature, to cultivate the growth of this contraband commodity. Miss Kosymouth was called to the chair, and Master Minikin was appointed secretary.

The proceedings were opened by Dr. Whiteface, of Fever-and-ague-alley. He rose with much dignity, and seemed by his very appearance, to command the confidence and respect of his fellow-citizens. He had a long, pale, thin, hatchet-countenance. His hair was combed meekly down to his eyes, which glared indiscriminately upon the expectant multitude, through a pair of spectacles resembling full moons. His nose stuck out in bold relief from his face, like a triangle, garnished towards the tip with a lively tinge, evidently inclining to scarlet, and "even handed justice," had compensated him for a total deficiency of forehead with a mouth of about twice the ordinary width. His head was set rather loosely upon a neck less distinguished for grace than length, which formed a connecting link with a body as gaunt as that of Don Quixote.

Cæsar has said, "let me have men about me that are fat." Now, if the last-named gentleman had been president of the United States, no matter what station the doctor might have occupied, there can be little doubt, in all reflecting minds, that he would have been "turned out." He held in his long fingers a sheet of paper, apparently the draft of some highly patriotic resolutions. The meeting was all attention. Not a whisper was to be heard—not a whisker to be seen. There was to be sure some slight signs of dissatisfaction upon the appearance of an old lady's head, above the level of the crowd, upon whose upper lip there was something resembling—but as the disturbance was immediately quelled by the lovers of order and decorum, it is unnecessary to pursue this part of the subject further.

"Friends and fellow-citizens. From my earliest boyhood I have been opposed to whiskers. Long ago I have perceived the fatal consequences to which they would lead. It is a painful, but the importance of the present crisis renders it a peremptory duty, for me to recapitulate a few of the unhappy effects with which this formerly flourishing nation has been visited." (Cries of hear him, hear him—he bowed slightly—cast down his eyes modestly and continued.) "They have given rise to the most perplexing mistakes. After a short absence, friend meets friend without recognition. The social ties are in this way rent asunder, and sheriff's officers are unable to identify those whom they are authorized to arrest. Fashion, my fellow-citizens, is a changeable and delusive goddess. She lives upon the error of human beings. She turns their caprices into ridicule, and takes advantage of their confidence in her decrees to place them not only in the most absurd, but in the most dangerous positions. When you once facilitate her progress, you cannot afterwards arrest it, and it would be impossible to conceive where her encroachments would stop. Many have already commenced to let hair grow all over their faces, and to cut it off from their foreheads. Are you not startled at the fear, lest in a few years, we may so far swerve as to shave all our heads bare, and have our faces completely hidden by those intrusive and wide spreading evils? Again, they have a very injurious influence upon our commerce. Loud applause, and cries of hear him. "Mr. Damascus, the barber, a few years ago, actually received an annual income exceeding that of the chancellor of this state." (General applause) "Now none so poor to do him reverence. He has lost all his custom. There has been a melancholy fall in razor-strops, razors, patent-paste, face-powder, &c. and several amiable and respectable soap-boilers have been ruined. These facts, my friends, are not the mere effusions of a heated imagination. They are truths, plain, practical alarming truths, to which I beg your most earnest consideration. But these are but a small part of my arguments for the exclusion of whiskers. There has been discovered."

The eloquent speaker here went on to give a succinct but lucid and affecting account of the "whiskerandos-and-mustachio confederation." At the termination of which Mr. Hungby, the broker, was visibly overcome, and young Mrs. B. fainted.

At this period, very unexpectedly to all, Captain Slashum made his appearance. He was a little man, but much celebrated in the military history of the town during the last six years. He had enlisted in Captain L.'s company as a private, where his amiable deportment and gentlemanly manners soon elevated him to the rank of corporal. The arduous and honorable duty of serving the members with notices having been executed with great credit to himself, and satisfaction to his friends, he rose by the mere force of his own courage to the captaincy, in which he has since served through rain and sunshine in a manner which entitles him to the everlasting gratitude of his country. Of course he belongs to the whiskerandons, and wore a pair of full grown entirely above comparison. The most indifferent observer must have perceived that they set all criticism at defiance. Indeed there could be no doubt upon the subject whatever. In addition to this he wore a very interesting vest of martial red—a collar of a superior cut, and a cravat tied like the gordian knot. He stretched forth his hand, and, as the chairman called the meeting to order, for his whiskers created a considerable sensation. Commenced as follows:

"I appear here, my friends, as the representative of a large concourse of my fellow-citizens. I am shocked at the calumnies which have been this day circulated. They arise from the sophistry of interested individuals. Of individuals opposed to pleasure, to beauty, to truth, and to nature. Yes, whiskers, my friends, I fearlessly pronounce to have been the intention of nature. Else why have we been created with them? They have been worn by the most distinguished of men, in all ages. Greeks, Romans, Spaniards, Englishmen, counts, magistrates, emperors, consuls, warriors, poets, have been proud to decorate their countenances according to the plan of nature. No, my countrymen, it is not the mere question of whiskers which is here involved. This is only the first link in the great chain with which our opponents are endeavouring to fetter the rights and tastes of this nation. If they succeed in this unwarranted attempt to interfere with our privileges, they will carry on the war with increased vigour: they will prescribe the manner in which we shall cut our hair; they will turn us into crop ears; they will measure the fashion of our garments, and the phraseology of our conversation. I tremble to think of the effects. I have it, upon excellent authority, that the petition about to be presented to congress has been signed by women and boys. Women, who certainly cannot be proper judges of the matter, and boys who are thus prematurely enlisted in a cause, the merits of which they are not yet competent to determine. As for me, I hold the fact to be self-evident, 'that all men are born free and equal,' and for further proof, I shall take the liberty of reading the declaration of independence."

He read this excellent document with great effect, and several opinions were interchanged, particularly among the female portion of his auditory, that his whiskers after all were "not so bad."

There was something like applause as he sat down, and it would be difficult to decide as to the ultimate opinions of the meeting, had not professor Emptyhead, of the Greece-street-institute, made a short address, and counteracted his impression.

Professor Empty-head was a short thick set man, who had no distinguishing trait in his physiognomy, except a deep blue tinge which covered both sides of his cheeks, and the whole lower part of his face and throat.

"My friends," said the professor, "it is easy to be seen that Captain Slashum is a whiskerandonian; but I hope you will not be influenced by his shallow arguments. He speaks of nature; but I will prove to you in two minutes that he is in error. The great and learned Confucius, the Chinese philosopher, has asserted, in the thirty-ninth volume of his treatise on things in general, page two thousand six hundred and four, line seventh from the top, that nature is sometimes to be curbed. Nature has given us passions, appetites, &c.; but these are useful only under the restraint of reason; and the same nature which gave us whiskers, gave us taste to control them. The same nature which commands us to curb our passions, to shelter ourselves from the tempest, to fly from her heat and cold, also commands us to cut our nails, comb our heads, wash our faces, and cut off our whiskers. Allow me to relate to you a little anecdote. Mr. Peter Simpkins was formerly a very virtuous young man. He lent a thousand dollars to Captain Thompson, of the ship Virginia, bound for Canton, who also was a gentleman of mild disposition, and not at all addicted to whiskers. The captain left him with the promise that immediately upon his return the account should be settled. Nearly two years passed away. Simpkins became involved, grew desperate, joined the confederation, and appeared with a pair of the articles in question, of the most palpable and audacious description, and by one of those caprices which fortune loves to play, Captain Thompson also, whether from want of razors, soap, time, care, or absence from civilized society, had also suffered himself to be overgrown in such a piratical style, that human eyes never witnessed any thing more huge and monstrous. Simpkins was prosecuted upon a note for eight hundred dollars, and at this very period, Captain Thompson returned, heard of the distress of his friend, and although on the point of leaving the city upon another long voyage, for sailors are the most generous of human beings, flew to his relief. Simpkins sat in his counting-room, and Thompson entered. 'Is Mr. Simpkins in?' 'Yes, sir: my name is Simpkins.' 'Mr. Peter Simpkins, sir?' 'My name is Peter Simpkins, sir.' 'You are not the gentleman I wish to see,' said the captain very respectfully; 'is there not another Peter Simpkins in the city?' 'Not that I am aware of,' said Simpkins. 'There must be some mistake,' said the captain: 'good morning, sir.' 'Good morning,' and thus, my friends, neither recognising the other, they parted: the captain sailed on a voyage round Cape Horn, and has not been heard of since."

This address was received with general applause, and Dr. Whiteface arose for the purpose of reading his resolutions, and having obtained permission of the chair, proceeded as follows.

"Resolved—That we deem whiskers barbarous, impudent, and dangerous to the liberties of the country.

"Resolved—That we will hereafter support no man for congress, senate, or assembly of this state, governor, alderman, or assistant alderman, who will not pledge himself never to wear them, nor to allow them to be worn by any member of his family.

"Resolved—That we will not support any paper, the editor of which wears whiskers.

"Resolved—That professors of colleges, teachers of public schools, and private academies, be requested to educate their pupils in the fear and abhorrence of this disagreeable and savage custom.

"Resolved—That a press be established in this city to disseminate the principles of this meeting.

"Resolved—That a petition be presented to congress, that a law be passed rendering the wearing of whiskers and mustachios a sufficient ground for legal prosecution.

"Resolved—That our fellow-citizens in different parts of the states and the world, be requested to unite with us in organizing societies, establishing newspapers, disseminating pamphlets, delivering orations, and forming schools with the view of arresting the progress of this pernicious evil, so inimical to the morals of the community, and so likely to bring us to ruin.

"Resolved—That the thanks of the meeting be presented to the president and secretary, and that these proceedings be published.

Miss Rosymouth, Chairman.

"Master MINIKIN, Secretary."

The meeting then adjourned sine die, and the citizens dispersed quietly, without any riot as had been anticipated.

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. MORRIS—I have translated, for your admirable journal, the following authentic letters of the late empress of France, from a work entitled "Memoirs of Josephine."—The first was written before her marriage, and while Napoleon was a brigadier-general; the last was addressed to the emperor after his abdication. Who can read them without being struck with the singular blindness of the man who could cast away a jewel, which, talisman-like, had raised him to and supported him on his dazzling height? Ingratitude seldom goes without its proper reward. S.

Letter from Madame Beauharnois to Madame —, previous to her marriage with Napoleon.

MY DEAR FRIEND—They desire me to marry. All the world advises me to do so. My aunt insists, my children implore. Why are you not here, to give me your advice on this important subject; to convince me, that I cannot resist a union which is to put an end to the painfulness of my present situation? Your friendship, of which I have had so many proofs, would make you clear-sighted to my best interest; and I would decide myself and follow your advice, without farther hesitation. You have often seen General Bonaparte? Well, he is the man who wishes to become father to the orphans of Alexander Beauharnois—the husband of his widow. Do you love him? you ask. Alas! no. Do you feel a repugnance to the match? no; but I am in a state of indecision, which displeases me, and which is one of the reasons why I desire your advice, which will fix the irresolution of my vacillating character. To take a decided part was always difficult, you know, for my creole nonchalance, which finds it infinitely more easy to follow the inclinations of others. I admire the courage of the general; the extent of his knowledge: on whatever topic he speaks, he speaks well; his penetrating spirit makes him comprehend the thoughts of others almost before they are uttered; but I am afraid, I confess, of the supreme control which he seems desirous of exercising over every one with whom he becomes at all connected. His scrutinizing looks have something singularly inexplicable, which even confuse our directors. You may judge, then, whether they must not intimidate a woman! And even what should delight me most, the impressive glance of his eye, when he speaks with energy, is precisely what hitherto has arrested my consent, which was several times on the point of being pronounced.

The fair resource! you say? Good heavens! It will help but little; yet still it is the only resource left to my poor heart, which grows so easily cold. Write instantly; and be not afraid even to scold, if you find me wrong. You know that every thing coming from you is welcome.

Barras assures me, that if I marry the general, he will procure for him the command of the Italian army. Yesterday Bonaparte, in speaking of this intended favour, said, "Do they believe that I want protection to attain it? Ere long they shall be happy if I give them mine. My sword is my protector, and with it I shall go far."

What do you say to this specimen of assurance? Is it not a proof of a confidence, which springs from excessive vanity? A brigadier-general our ruler! Yes; there is much likelihood indeed! I gave him no answer; and yet the ridiculous presumption of this singular man was near letting me perceive what he sometimes fancies himself.—With his eccentricity, who can tell what he will not undertake?

All of us regret your absence a thousand times, and we cannot console ourselves otherwise than by speaking eternally of you. We follow your track in the fair country, step by step; and if I was sure of finding you in Italy, to-morrow I would marry the general, on condition of his taking me there; but then our roads might cross, and so I think it more prudent to await your answer. Do hasten it, and still more your return.

Madame Tallien requests me to assure you of her tender love. She is always so graceful, so good; she employs her immense influence only in acts of mercy for the unhappy; and she dispenses her benevolence with an air of satisfaction which makes it almost appear as if she was the party obliged. Her friendship for me is tender and ingenuous. I assure you, my sentiments towards her are of the same nature as those I bear you. This may give you an idea of the affection I feel for her.

Hortensie becomes more amiable every day; her charming person develops itself every hour; and if I felt inclined, I could have a fair opportunity of making sad reflections on the waste of time, which embellishes the daughter at the expense of the mother. Happily I have other things in my head, and I pass over these disheartening thoughts to occupy myself with the future, which promises fair, as we soon shall be reunited to separate no more. Without the marriage, which causes me so much trouble, I should feel very happy, in spite of all; but, as long as things are not decided, I shall have the heart-ache. Once resolved, I shall be resigned, come what will. I have accustomed myself to sufferings, and should I be destined to experience new ones, I believe I could bear them, provided my children, my aunt, and you, will support me. Adieu, dear friend.

JOSEPHINE.

Letter from the Ex-Empress Josephine to the Emperor Napoleon, while on the island of Elbe.

Malmaison.

SIRE—It is only now that I am fully sensible of the cruel fate which dissolved our marriage-bond, and that I sigh at the recollection that I am to you no more than a mere friend. I can only weep over a disaster as great as it was unexpected.

It is not the loss of a throne for which I pity you. I know, from experience, that such a loss can be borne with patience; but my heart bleeds at the thought of the struggle it must have cost your noble nature to separate yourself from your old companions in glory; from those officers and soldiers whom you loved so ardently, and whose glorious deeds you knew so well how to appreciate. I fully participated in your feelings on that sad occasion.

You had to deplore the ingratitude of friends who forsook you, and on whom you thought you could rely. Ah, sire! could I fly to you, I would convince you that exile can frighten vulgar minds alone, and that misfortune, far from diminishing a sincere attachment, gives it new force! I was on the point of quitting France, in order to follow you, to consecrate the rest of an existence to you, which you have embellished for so long a time. One motive alone kept me back. You will guess it.

Should it be true, that notwithstanding appearances to the contrary, I am the only one who is inclined to fulfil her duty, then nothing will be able to keep me here. I will hasten where, in future, it shall be my happiness to console you, because you are deserted and alone.

Farewell, sire! a word more would be too much. It is not by words I can prove the sentiments you inspire; it is by deeds—but I must have your consent.

JOSEPHINE.

P. S. Malmaison has been respected. I am treated with the highest regard by the foreign sovereigns. But would I was not to remain here!

WHITE MAIZE.—It is stated in the annals of the horticultural society of Paris, that the white maize of China, although it produces a smaller grain than the maize of Philadelphia, which has been hitherto so much cultivated in France, yields more abundantly, and gives a much finer flour. Some Chinese maize, sown in the south of France during the present year, is stated to have turned out very well, notwithstanding the badness of the season.

THE TRAVELLER.

THE BANKER AND THE KING.

MR. MORRIS—The anecdote I am about to relate may be relied upon as a fact. I was, not many months ago, present at a convivial party, given by Mr. P—, the great Frankfort banker, at his own residence. He was in excellent spirits, and being requested to favour the company with a tale, he related the following account of his journey to Prussia. I have given it in his own words, as near as I can remember them.

"It was in the year 1805," said Mr. P—, "near twenty-five years since, that business of importance required my speedy presence at the Prussian capital. Our house had not long before been established, and as the Prussian government wanted money, I thought it expedient to see their minister myself without delay. The journey was somewhat dangerous, as the state of Germany had become rather precarious. The French had again been so polite as to pay us unasked a visit, and were not likely to look with a very kind eye on a banker who was hastening to the seat of government to lend money. However, I was young, undaunted, of a happy flow of spirits, and cared neither for Napoleon nor any of his adherents, and so I bid Anthony, who is my witness—the well embroidered footman nodded complacently from behind the chair of his master—"to make himself ready, to place some wine and a dozen pheasants in our chest, and to take his seat in the post-chaise. The pheasants were intended as a present for the Prussian finance minister. Like as I do Frankfort, my native city, I felt highly delighted when I arrived at the frontiers of Saxony, but my joy was soon to give way to other sensations. I was always fond of a good dinner and a good glass of wine; things which are rarely to be met with in Saxony. It is a wretched country, and their wine is stuff compared to which our vinçgar is nectar. I had travelled three days, and changed horses fifteen times. My bottling establishment was nearly out, when I found myself on the borders of Prussia, a vast desert of sand, where nothing grows but the hungry pine and curly-headed children; yet still they might put better dinners before respectable travellers. It is really a shame, nothing but dry veal, potatoes, and beer! You may judge, gentlemen, of my situation by the fact, that I was obliged to attack the chest, which contained the intended present for the Prussian minister, and to purloin one of the pheasants. I ordered Anthony to cook it: it was excellent, and so was my last bottle of rhenish. My appetite being satisfied, I mounted my post-chaise again, and proceeded on my journey. Our wheels ploughed through the waves of sand as deeply as a three-decker through the billows of the sea."

[Our banker had made the tour across the channel in the Calais packet, and he loved to speak of the sea.]

"My patience at length became exhausted, and being weary of looking at the sandy surface, I fell asleep. Shortly afterwards a terrible shock awakened me. I endeavoured to look round, but could not. I struggled to open my mouth—it filled with sand. My feet were fast in the carriage. I was near being killed. In short, the axle-tree of the chaise, with one of the wheels, were broken. Anthony had fared somewhat better than his master, and he relieved me from my disagreeable situation. Now, gentlemen, you may believe me, this was no joke. There I was, fifteen miles from Berlin, and two from the next village, with a portfolio containing several hundred thousand dollars in papers, and no conveyance. Presently I discovered a carriage travelling the same road. It approached. Two gentlemen occupied the seats. A footman was behind. My resolution was soon taken. I ordered Anthony to get my post-chaise repaired, and to follow me to the Brandenburg hotel as soon as possible. Thus resolved, I stepped towards the carriage, which had now come up to us.

"Gentlemen," said I, lifting my hat civilly, 'will you be so good as to afford a traveller, whose chaise you see is broken, a seat in your carriage?'

"Certainly," said the youngest; 'please to step in.'

"I did so. The first minutes were passed in surveying the strangers, with whom my happy or unhappy stars, I knew not which, had brought me in contact. I was in a military country, and I was soon convinced that my new companions were military men.

"The complaisance of these strangers soon restored me to my former good humour; and thinking it my duty to meet their politeness by similar advances, I began to enter into something like conversation with them; they, however, were not the most talkative persons in the world. I spoke of the war which was raging between France and Austria, but I received only a nod. I went over the prospects of Prussia—no answer at all; the old gentleman was as dry as a chip, the young one as shy as a lark. I hate sullenness, especially in young men, and thinking that my subjects were perhaps disagreeable, I changed them to the state of the country. I was not very lavish of my praise, and censured the government for not repairing the roads; both gentlemen were extremely attentive, but still more reserved. I had now tried every means to bring them into conversation. At last I spoke of my fare, and of the miserable dinners provided for travellers. They smiled.

"What do you think, sir," said I, addressing the young man, "I have dined upon?" A pheasant I knew he never would guess.

"I do not know, sir."

"Well, guess then," said I.

"The young man looked significantly, and entering into my humour, returned,

"I do not know, indeed; perhaps a shoulder of mutton?"

"My hand fell involuntarily on his knee.

"Higher," said I.

"Well, then, perhaps you have dined on a goose?"

"Higher," replied I, placing my hand a second time on his knee.

"Then it was a chicken," said he.

"Higher," replied I, accompanying my word with a third slap.

"You have not, surely, dined on a turkey in so poor a country?"

"Higher, sir," returned I, striking him for the fourth time on his knee.

"Well then, it must have been a pheasant."

"You have hit it, sir; a pheasant brought from Frankfurt; and if you will do me the honour of being my guests at the Brandenburg hotel, you shall dine off pheasants too."

"Neither promised to come, but both smiled.

"After this dialogue, we rode several miles without speaking a single word, when the young man, in quite a friendly tone, said,

"Now, sir, to ask you a question, whom do you think you ride with?"

"This question was put in the usual brisk tone of a Prussian officer. I looked at the stranger a moment; he was about my age, but much taller. His dress was a plain surtout, and his head was covered with a woollen cap, strongly set in leather with a narrow gold brim. He had a good deal of the military cast.

"Well," said I, "I think I have the pleasure of being in company with a military gentleman—a captain?" added I, asking.

"Higher," said the young man, striking me in his turn on the knee.

"The old gentleman now began to laugh.

"A major, then," said I.

"Higher," repeated he, slapping me a second time.

"He understands a joke, thought I.

"So young, and already a colonel?"

"Higher," said he again, with a fourth slap.

"He is getting impudent, thought I. I looked confounded at his assurance.

"Then I have the honour to be in company with a general," said I, with a sarcastic incredulity.

"Higher," he still replied, with another slap."

"This, I thought, is the most impudent fellow I ever met with—and giving vent to my impatience, I said,

"Then you are a field-marshal?"

"We were by this time before the Brandenburg gate. I was fully persuaded that I was treated as a dupe by my companions. The young man's higher had so confounded me, that I was thunderstruck, when the hats flew off in every direction. "Gewehr aus!" shouted the multitude, and officers and soldiers rushed from the guard-house to their muskets; the drums were beating, the arms presenting; a number of carriages passed through the gate, and, in the confusion of the crowd, thronging from every side, I looked for the royal personage, to whom all these honours were paid. Our carriage whirled fast towards the Brandenburg hotel.

"Where do you wish to alight?" said the young gentleman.

"At the Brandenburg hotel, if you please," was my answer.

"There it is," said he.

"I leaped from the carriage, took my portfolio, and bowing, requested the pleasure of their seeing me at dinner."

"You shall see us," said the younger, and off they went.

"The landlord and waiters of the hotel rushed towards me as I entered the gate, bowing to the ground. The former addressed me by the title of highness.

"My name," said I, "is P——, banker, from Frankfurt. Do you know the gentleman with whom I arrived?"

"Gentleman," repeated the landlord, significantly, "it was the king."

"A good joke," said I, "the young fellow was near telling me so himself."

"Beg your pardon, banker," said the landlord, "but please to use other terms, when you speak of his majesty."

"You are not in earnest?" said I.

"But I am though: it is the king."

"The waiters, and fifty other persons who had assembled round me, pledged themselves for the truth of what the landlord had spoken.

"There was now no doubt it was the king with whom I had made so free!

"I am, gentlemen, a republican, and not afraid of any king in christendom, yet the affair might have become a serious one. I had dropped expressions which were not suited to royal ears, and which I might have kept more wisely to myself. How would he take these things? What might he think of me?—were thoughts which kept me awake for the greater part of the night.

"The next morning I began the rounds of my visits. I found the finance minister extremely tough. When I returned home, the landlord informed me, that a royal page had been at the hotel, summoning the banker P—— to the castle.

"Well, thought I, nothing can happen worse than hanging, and throwing myself into a hackney-coach, I rolled towards the royal residence of the king. The appointed hour was five. I was conducted through numberless guards into the royal apartments. When the last door opened, I beheld my young travelling companion seated on an ottoman; on his right side was a most beautiful lady; two boys and as many girls were playing in the chamber.

"A king, thought I, who can enjoy domestic happiness, cannot be a tyrant, and I stepped resolutely forward.

"This, dear Louise," said his majesty, "is the banker, who so agreeably entertained me yesterday."

"Banker P——," said the lovely queen, "we hope you will take a better opinion of our country home with you."

"She stretched out her hand, and I was permitted to kiss it.

"Nor was this all. I had to tell my whole adventure over—I, however, omitted the slapping on the knee. In short I spent the most agreeable hour in my life. The following day, I concluded my money business. The royal condescension had rather too much captivated the otherwise cool banker—I entered somewhat deeply into Prussian money matters, so deeply, that his royal majesty twelve months afterwards, had well nigh ruined me. I do not know whether I would not have forgiven him for the sake of this hour. However, Frederick William has since honestly paid me both debt and interest."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Collegiate Institute at Brooklyn.—An academy, highly respectable in its patronage, and sanctioned by the approval of some of our most eminent divines and scholars, has been lately established for young ladies under this title, at the above place. The system of instruction is ample, and comprehends all the elegant as well as useful departments of physical and mental education. The institute is under the direction of Messrs. Van Doren, and, from the prospectus of their courses of instruction, we feel warranted in drawing the most favourable anticipations of their success. The proximity of this seminary to New-York, the healthful site chosen for its location, and the extensive and highly useful system of discipline and improvement intended to be pursued in it, recommend it to the serious attention and generous encouragement of this community.

American Institute of the city of New-York.—We have received a copy of the address delivered before this useful association, at their late fair, by James Lynch, esq., accompanied with a report of the fair, drawn up by a committee appointed for the purpose. The perusal has gratified us exceedingly, and furnished us with much light on the true objects of the institute. It has been generally believed that these objects were exclusively confined to the promotion of the success of manufactures. This impression, we are happy to be informed by Mr. Lynch, is altogether erroneous. Its members are arranged into four departments, to be denominated severally those of agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and the arts. Such an arrangement is truly a wise one, and, if carried into effect, must render the society generally popular with the citizens of New-York; "it tends to soften the asperities which are created by rival interests, and mistaken notions, as to the effect of the growth and increase of any particular branch of industry, and to produce, among the members, by calm discussion and deliberation, a conviction of the necessity that private interests should sometimes yield to the public good." So far we are ready to go heart and hand with the author of the address before us. Beyond this, and when he under-values the importance of commerce to a maritime city like this, composed of so numerous and promiscuous a throng, wholly and necessarily dependent upon the pursuit of this vital branch of its resources, we must pause before we record our concurrence. It is not our intention, however, to enter upon an argument on the subject. It is better and more appropriately discussed in the newspapers. The report of the fair presents a truly flattering statement of the success which has hitherto attended the efforts of the institute.

Music type.—We have great pleasure in presenting to our readers this week, our musical department arrayed in a new and comely garb. Music, formed of moveable and separate types, has, for the most part, an unseemly and disjointed appearance; but we think this, for its elegance and distinctness, and its excellent property of joining perfectly, is unequalled by any type ever cast in this country. A little exercise of the fancy might suppose it possessed of other qualifications; and we can ourselves imagine it imparting melody to the air and harmony to the chords. It is from the foundry of Mr. George B. Lothian, of this city.

New-year's day.—We do not recollect a new-year's day so mild and pleasant as the one we have just celebrated. It was Indian summer, in its most smiling aspect. Perhaps no single day in the recent year, with the exception of Sundays, exhibited such a multitude of pedestrians in Broadway as filled it on this occasion. Of course, they were principally of the masculine gender, as the ladies were at home holding their annual levees, receiving and exchanging the compliments of the season with their male visitors, and treating them to coffee, instead of wine and punch. This is an improvement of the age that cannot be too much applauded, and will have a better effect than if the fair hostesses had all signed the roll of a temperance society.

Jared Canfield.—The following is copied, by request, from the Morning Courier and Enquirer.—No accounts have yet been received of Jared Canfield, who has been missing since the fourth of December last, from the lottery and exchange office at the corner of Vesey and Greenwich streets. We have been requested by his disconsolate relatives to give a description of his person and appearance so as to put it in the power of the humane to do a good deed if any opportunity should offer, tending to his discovery. Jared Canfield was between thirteen and fourteen years of age. His complexion, hair, and eyes were light. He was about four feet eight or ten inches in height. Any information leading to his discovery, living or dead, may be left at the corner of Vesey and Greenwich street, or at this office. Editors would confer a favour on his relatives, by inserting in their papers a notice similar to the present.

The Truth Teller.—The first number of the sixth volume of this excellent weekly journal was issued on Saturday last. A partial change has taken place in the proprietorship, and William Denman, esq. who has conducted, and with great ability, the editorial department from the commencement of the work to the present day, has become the owner. The contents of the impression before us are various, and extremely interesting, the quality of the paper good, and the typographical execution very respectable. Altogether, the Truth Teller is a credit to the press of this city, and is, beyond doubt, the best Irish newspaper ever published in the United States.

Communication.—Mr. Editor.—The following remarks in Moore's Life of Sheridan, struck me as so particularly applicable, at the present moment of unrighteous zeal, that I could not refrain from sending them to you for publication.

"Whatever may be thought of particular faiths and sects, a belief in a life beyond this world, is the only thing that pierces through the walls of our prison house, and lets hope shine in, upon a scene that would be otherwise bewildered and desolate. That believers who have each the same heaven in prospect, should invite us to join them, on their respective ways to it, is at least a benevolent officiousness, but that he, who has no prospect, or hope himself, should seek for companionship in his road to annihilation, can only be explained by that tendency in human creature, to count upon each other in their despair, as well as their hope."

HOURS THERE WERE.

AS SUNG, WITH THE MOST UNBOUNDED APPLAUSE, BY MISS PATON, AT COVENT GARDEN THEATRE, LONDON.

ANDANTE.

Hours there were to mem'-ry dear - er, Than the sun-bright scenes of day; Friends were fon - der, joys were near - er, But, a - las! they're fled a - way.

Oh, 'twas when the moon - light play - ing, O'er the val - ley's si - lent grove, Told the bliss - ful hour for stray - ing, With my fond, my faith - ful love.

Oh, when evening faded mildly,
O'er the wave our bark would rove;
Then we've heard the night-bird wildly,
Breathe his vesper tale of love.

Songs, like his, my love would sing me—
Songs that warble round me yet:
Ah! but where does memory bring me;
Scenes like those I must forget.

But in dreams let love be near me,
With the joys that bloom'd before;
Slumb'ring then 'twill sweetly cheer me,
Calm to live my pleasures o'er.

Then, perhaps, some hope may wake,
In this heart depress'd with care;
And like flow'rs in vale forsaken,
Live a lonely beauty there.

THE ROSE AND VIOLET.

ONE summer morn a damask fair,
Oped her soft bosom to the air,
And from her velvet casket free
Exhaled a store of fragrantcy.
Smiling in youth her form she eyed
In all the consciousness of pride,
When, dancing o'er the gay parterre,
The breeze espied the beauty there,
And stooped upon his wing to seek
A morning kiss from Rosa's cheek.
The flower perceived the sly intent,
And lithely from his greeting bent;
E'en as the gay coquet will run
From him she wishes not to shun.
As downward from the fond embrace
She hid her brightly-blushing face,
Beneath her coy averted eye
A Violet of blended dye,
Low sheltered by her leafy shade,
Her variegated charms displayed.

The rose bent back upon her stem,
And, with a consequential hom,
"What dost thou here," she rudely cried,
Reckless the queen of flowers beside?
Methinks, unmanner'd Miss, that I
Could spare thy unasked company;
For thou art born of low degree,
And all thy puny ancestry,
By certain changeless laws of birth,
Were wedded to the sordid earth.
Ah, wherefore leave thy humble sphere
To spread such little beauties here!
Since mine, sure common sense might show,
O'er thine a deepened shade would throw.
Poor thing! I truly pity thee,
That thou shouldst think to sort with me;
Oh, height of impudence and pride,
To blossom by my courted side!
But if thou think'st to gain from me
Aught that will raise thy dignity,
Bloom on, and with presumption high
Be sport for every passer-by."

The violet heard the proud address,
And looking up with gentleness,
"Tis true that I may be
A lowly flower like thee;
But I am kin, by birth,
To the lowly earth;
And my generous mind,
My simple refined,
And my true nature,
Nature's sovereign laws,
Nourish proud and high,
The smile of every eye;

'Tis thine, enchanting flower, to rest
On beauty's lawn-encircled breast:
'Tis thine to spread thy tinted wings
Within the palaces of kings:
And thine, when evening wraps the vale,
To hold the pensive nightingale,
As seated on thy budding stem
She sings the young moon's requiem.
Yet still I envy not thy state,
Nor all the smiles that on thee wait.
I own that I am courted not—
But then I am not quite forgot;
For oft with simple hues do I
Detain the poets' musing eye,
While with the proudest flowers I share
A part of nature's kindly care:
When summer shows her smile of glee,
And all is mirth and melody,
The cricket joins the general choir
And 'neath my leaflet tunes his lyre.
Cruel thy blame, since I am not
The author of my lowly lot;
Nor did I choose this near location
To profit by the situation;
No vain desires my peace can hap—
They're cradled in contentment's lap:
Kind nature in my make combined
A lowly form and humble mind,
And this my pride has aye sufficed—
To prize myself as I am prized."

Hence let the wealthy nor the wise,
The unenlightened poor despise,
But ever recollect that Heaven
To each his changeless lot has given,
And that the meanest of the mean
Coacts with him life's varying scene.

A THOUGHT.

As we look back through life
In our moments of sadness,
How few and how brief
Are its gleamings of gladness:
Yet we find, midst the gloom
That our pathway o'er-shaded,
A few spots of sunshine
Still lingering unfaded.

And memory still hoards
As her richest of treasures,
Some moments of rapture,
Some soul-thrilling pleasures.
One hour of such bliss
Is a life, ere it closes;
'Tis one drop of fragrance,
From thousands of roses!

THE NEGLECTED CHILD.

I never was a favourite,
My mother never smiled
On me, with half the tenderness
That blessed her fairer child;
I've seen her kiss my sister's cheek,
While fondled on her knee;
I've turned away to hide my tears,
There was no kiss for me!

And yet I strove to please, with all
My little store of sense;
I strove to please, and infancy
Can rarely give offence;
But when my artless efforts met
A cold, ungentle check,
I did not dare to throw myself,
In tears, upon her neck.

How blessed are the beautiful!
Love watches o'er their birth;
Oh beauty! in my nursery
I learned to know thy worth;
For even there, I often felt
Forsaken and forlorn;
And wished, for others wished it too,
I never had been born!

I'm sure I was affectionate,
But in my sister's face,
There was a look of love that claimed
A smile or an embrace.
But when I raised my lip, to meet
The pressure children prize,
None knew the feelings of my heart,
They spoke not in my eyes.

But oh! that heart too keenly felt
The anguish of neglect;
I saw my sister's lovely form
With gems and roses decked;
I did not covet them; but oft,
When wantonly reproved,
I envied her the privilege
Of being so beloved.

But soon a time of triumph came—
A time of sorrow too—
For sickness, o'er my sister's form
Her venom'd mantle threw.
The features, once so beautiful,
Now wore the hue of death;
And former friends shrank fearfully
From her infectious breath.

'Twas then, unwearied, day and night
I watched beside her bed,
And fearlessly upon my breast
I pillowed her poor head.

She lived! she loved me for my care!
My grief was at an end;
I was a lonely being once,
But now I have a friend!

STANZAS.

I've sat and seen one bright wave chase
Its fellow on the strand,
Then fall away, nor leave a trace
Upon the printless sand;
Though scarce the pebbles felt their shock,
Those waves have worn the solid rock!

I've sat and seen the autumn wind
Amid the branches stray,
So softly mild, so blandly kind,
It scarcely stirred the spray;
Yet soon it bore spring's verdant birth,
To wither on its native earth.

I've sat and seen the evening sun
Sink from the golden sky,
His long, bright race of glory run,
And closed his golden eye;
So slow he passed, scarce changed the light,
And yet he left the world in night.

And like yon sea in human life;
Events like billows roll,
Moment on moment, strife on strife,
That change us, to the soul:
And joys, like autumn leaves, fall fast—
Hope sets—and being's light is past.

I've stood on earth's most daring height,
And seen the day-god rise,
In his magnificence of light
To triumph through the skies;
And all the darkness of the world
Far from his shining presence hurled.

All, too, that fades upon the earth,
Too weak to linger here,
Reblossoms with a second birth,
To deck the coming year;
Shall hope, then, man's eternal dower,
Be frailer than a fading flower?

Ah, no! like autumn leaves that die
To bloom again in spring,
Fresh joys shall rise from those gone by,
And fairer blossoms bring;
And when, like suns, hope sets in night,
Shall she not beam from worlds more bright!

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE FIRST TRANSGRESSION.

My young, my loved, my only one, so early gone astray!
Ah! light has been the chast'ning rod until this mournful day;
The future rises darkly now upon my aching sight,
Gone forth 's the curse for him who leans on arm of mortal might.

When sickness paled thy infant cheek, and quell'd thy sportive glee,
Heaven heard the prayer of anguish breathed upon the bended knee;
And must I live to wait the day that gave me back my flower,
The sweet exotic, sull'd with care to beautify my bower?

'Twere better that the valley's clouds had press'd thy sinless brow,
Than see the dark unfading lines of guilt upon it now;
Better the laughing eye should close in death's eternal night,
Ere burning tears of shame had quench'd its joy-diffusing light.

Oh! holy are the thoughts which rise within a mother's breast,
When trusting in earth she lays her cherish'd one to rest;
In high and glorious temple shrouded her idol she beholds,
Beyond temptation's potent lure, or error's subtle folds.

She hears his lisping accents join in praises with the just,
He is a heavenly inmate now, not sleeping in the dust,
And can it be that thou art sent the messenger of ill,
My little page of loneliness with gloomy lines to fill?

Must I uproot the soothing hope, that when dark years prevail,
When life is but a tasteless draught, and flesh and spirit fail;
Thy love, like sunset's glowing tint, shall gild my day's decline,
And even on my grassy tomb with holy radiance shine?

"Cling not to earth," a warning voice is whispering in mine ear,
Such chilling accents pass unmark'd when sweeter tones are near;
Thy little arms are round my neck, the cheek press close to mine,
Alas! alas! this yielding heart is still delusion's shrine. ARIEL.

TO THE EVENING STAR.

Thou melancholy star!
Gazing on thee what visions thrill my breast;
In thought I leave this weary world afar,
And fly to thee for rest.

I'll speak to thee of days
Long gone, of young affections all unscarred;
When earth, unto my fondly trusting gaze,
A paradise appeared.

Those days of happy youth!
Ev'n then I loved to muse upon thy beams,
Sweet star! kindling bright hopes that seemed like truth—
Alas, they were but dreams!

I've looked upon thee oft
In the lone stillness of a moonless night,
And drank the music of the winds, low, soft,
Hymning the spirit's flight.

What habitants hast thou?
The loved departed ones of earth should be
The dwellers of thy sphere—how blest were now
The thought, their forms to see!

And then what ecstasy,
With those so prized to hold communion sweet;
To hear glad voices from the far blue sky
Pledges of love repeat.

Communing with the dead!
And wherefore not? the living spirit is Ethereal, and its wings may overspread
The phantom-land of bliss!

Come then, ye blessed ones!
Heart-treasures of life's better years, oh! come
With your familiar looks, remembered tones—
I call you from your home!

I summon ye to tell
The mysteries of your bright abode—oh! say
Do earthly hopes, and fears, and sorrows, dwell
In thy blest land away?

Ah! no—it may not be—
Wild fancy! prison-bound to earth, remain!
Like wave-tost men thrown back upon the sea,
My thoughts return again?

SECRET PLEASURES.

'There is a transport of the soul,
Which swells the heart, we know not why;—
It spurns the fetter of control,
And rises, like the buoyant sky,
In many a nameless sympathy,
That steals the path of life along,
When thought is ranging high and free,
And fancy pours her witching song.

But it were vain, the source to tell
From whence these rays of gladness come;
So gentle and unspeakable,
Like land-winds o'er the ocean's foam;—
Telling the mariner of home!
Coloured by visions, wild and high,
The spirit, cold and wearisome,
Is changed, like clouds in summer's sky.

Sometimes when the all-glorious sun
Is proudly sinking to his rest,
E're yet the twilight's pall of dun
Hath gather'd o'er the ocean's breast
Like sadness o'er a spirit blest:
Then, in that thought-enkindling hour
That spell will every scene invest
The woods of spring, the bud, the flower,
And sober autumn's yellow vest.

Give me that spell! I cannot ask
A joy so rich and pure beside,
As in that radiant light to bask
By hope and memory sanctified,
And with the o'er-bending heaven allied!
It is a talisman, whose power
We call, when restless storms betide,
And it can soothe their darkest hour. EVERARD.

POPULAR TALES.

A SWISS LEGEND.

NEAR the ruins of the old baronial castle of Wadenschwy, Petermann, a poor wood-cutter, was one day, in the heat of noon, felling wood. About twelve or fifteen years before the era of this legend, that venerable old mansion had fallen into the possession of the city of Zurich. Till then the massiveness of the building had preserved it from decay; but, notwithstanding its beautiful situation, upon a hill behind the rich and stately burgh, and its fine view of the lake of Zurich, it was at last half demolished to make way for a more commodious castle, and now it stood in dreary loneliness, raising only one turret to the sky above the surrounding wood.

The industrious Petermann had up to this day been as indifferent to the old castle as the man in the moon. He had never gone into it; nay, it is doubtful if he had ever so much as intentionally looked up to it; but, as he now chanced to be working very near it, and every blow of his axe laid it more clearly open to his view, a thought struck him, while taking a breath during his labour, and he said to himself with a sigh, "Ah! if I could get all the silver and gold which once glittered up there, I might well throw away my axe, and live comfortably all the rest of my days with my wife and children."

At this moment it seemed to the simple rustic, that something moved in a hole of the masonry wall, and as he eyed it attentively, he overheard a low whispering and rustling, which appeared to come from the opening. "Odzooks," thought he, "are the gipsies here? That would just suit me." So throwing aside his axe, he climbed up the steep acclivity to the foot of the ruins, where he found a small aperture, through which he could easily look into the interior of the tower. With some trouble he got firm footing, and applied his eye to the hole; but, good heavens! what were the feelings of the poor wood-cutter, on perceiving within the ruined walls, two figures, so tiny, so marvellous, and so enigmatical in their gestures, that his fancy had never shaped any thing like them, when the winter evening tales of goblins and gnomes circulated from lip to lip in his wife's spinning-room.

Petermann beheld two little dwarfs, in long robes of ashen gray, with silver beards descending to their girdle, talking aloud, but quite unintelligibly, and in a chirping tone, as if they spoke the bird language, and bustling about within the four walls of the ruin, which now reflected the rays of noon almost like the glow of an oven. One of the little men seemed to exercise some authority over the other; for he kept always at the same place, whilst the other moved slowly to and fro, about a kind of excavation, into which he ever and anon descended and re-appeared, bearing upon his shoulders to the light of day the most magnificent golden basins, silver cups, costly jewels; in short, all the riches which were ever conceived of in a fairy tale. Every piece was examined, and laid in order, as the superior little figure seemed to direct; and then both the dwarfs stood and gazed upon the spectacle with an expression of complacency quite indescribable. The whole seemed to be conducted after the fashion of one of those reviews which thrifty housewives occasionally take of their furniture, in which the contents of dusty corners, store-rooms, and attics are carefully spread out before the sun.

Petermann's heart felt now all alive, like a swarm of ants; feelings of the most conflicting kind crossed and chased each other by turns—astonishment, covetousness, curiosity, awe, and terror. A wonder it was that no exclamation escaped his lips. But all at once, a soot-black raven popped his head out of a hole, and stretching out his long neck over the little dwarfs, screamed from his hoarse throat three times rap—rap—rap, and drew the looks of the wood-cutter to him with a sort of spell, while, at the same moment, a noise like the shutting of a door was heard, and when Petermann again turned his eyes to look on the gold and silver vessels, nothing but the barren stones met his eye; the strange jewellers, with all the magnificent exhibition, had vanished, without leaving a trace.

"Oh thou hellish raven!" at last burst from the lips of the disappointed peasant; he wiped the perspiration from his forehead, rubbed his eyes ten times over, stared again into the empty turret, and saw a few little birds and lizards running about in it, but not a vestige of the treasures which had so lately fascinated his senses.

Three days Petermann remained thoughtful, silent, and gloomy, without any one being able to conjecture what strange mischance had befallen the light-hearted woodsman. Every morning at the earliest dawn, and every evening in the latest twilight, he crept up to the old castle, where he clambered about, knocking with his pick-axe, and turning over stones and bushes, till he had thrown himself quite into a fever, in his anxiety to discover the door, which he now supposed led to the treasure-chamber of the two dwarfs.

Early in the morning of the fourth day which had elapsed since his adventure, Petermann was seated upon a stone, on the border of the wood which covered a great part of the hill where the ruins stood, plunged in deep reflection and melancholy thought, and hesitating whether to sacrifice any more of his precious time in scrambling and picking about the turret, when suddenly there sounded through the stillness of the morning, a clear, youthful voice, which, after having hastily sung a few verses at a distance, drew nearer, so that the wood-cutter recognised the following words:

Fortune's a bird too sly to take,
Cease then the fond endeavour,
As subtle as the wily snake,
To-day as false as ever.

With tiny eggs she decks her nest,
Building where it may please her;
But ah! he meets a bitter jest,
The clown that thinks to seize her.

Hark to her song: "Come take me, friend!"
But whose will pursue it,
Hot in the chase, shall miss his end,
And ever after rue it.

The voice was that of an errant-scholar, who, in a singular dress, came tripping onwards, rather beside the path than upon it, through the dewy grass. He wore a barret-cap upon his head, from his shoulders floated a wide black robe, the loose folds of which, as formed above the girdle, seemed to serve the purpose of wallets; the skirts of this robe were turned up and fastened to the girdle; his under-dress was also black, and formed a piece with his hose and shoes, the fiery-red heels of which raised the wearer almost three inches above their points.

"Ho now, good friend," said the wanderer to the wood-cutter, "why sit you there breathing melancholy abroad over the merry world, from your morning seat? You are just like the dog upon the heap of hay."

"That I am," replied the wood-cutter roughly.

"And that's being very silly," answered the scholar. "There is wealth of gold under you; but it is of just as much value to you as the heap of hay was to the dog."

Petermann gaped and stared on the stranger at these words. "An enchanter, a sorcerer, a devil's conjurer," sounded in his ears. "Hey-day, my heart," nevertheless, thought he, "this fellow comes at a right hour."

* It is the custom in the Swiss hamlets, and in some parts of Germany, for the peasantry to spend the long winter evenings alternately in one another's houses. On these occasions, one of their number sings or narrates a popular legend, while the rest diligently ply their distaff or shuttle.

"Yes," said Petermann aloud, "I know it; what a pity it is! I know perfectly well what a vast deal of riches and jewels are beneath my feet. But if I were able to look through the mountain, like your reverence, I would not be sitting here brooding in vain, if I cared at all for gold or silver."

"I, my good friend," replied the scholar, "I, for instance, don't care a farthing for it; and you, if you were wise, would care as little."

"Precious wisdom that!" murmured Petermann. "No, I am not so wise! If I could get at the gold you talk of, I would soon throw my axe aside. Your reverence has probably never tried what it is to cut wood in the forest for six burning summer days, with nothing to eat but milk and bread."

"Poh, what matters that," answered the scholar; "you are in good health, and merry withal; that stands written red as cherries upon your cheek. However, if you wish to try it, I can easily do something to give you a sight of this treasure."

"If I wish to try it!" exclaimed Petermann. "In the name of wonder, certainly I do wish to try it! Set about it instantly; open me the whole below, and with three grasps I make myself a rich and happy man!"

"Gently, gently," was the answer. "I go strait up even now to the owl's nest above us; and do you, my impatient friend, when twelve o'clock has struck, join me there, when I will see what can be done for you."

With these words the stranger took his way gaily up the steep hill, leaving the wood-cutter gaping after him with open mouth.

The honest Petermann had now some strange sensations, and already felt himself very grand. "Well," muttered he to himself, "I'll try to resume my work for a short time, that I may in future be able, during my leisure and repose, to figure to myself how stoutly I handled the axe for the last time;" and with this he rose, whistled a merry tune, took his axe, and cut away so briskly, that it was quite a pleasure to behold him.

An hour before noon he went home, eat his dinner cheerfully with his honest spouse, Salome, took a romp with his three children, and before the expiry of an hour, was again in the wood, where he made his way through thick and thin, without heeding the regular path, till he reached the old castle, and joined his friend in the black mantle.

"I have had a good deal of trouble," said the scholar. "Truly, my good friend, the treasure-keepers here below us are obstinate, cross fellows! I had hard enough work to find the door." With these words, he pointed with a long ivory wand to the weather-beaten wall; and, lo! between the rubbish, thorns, and thistles, a small gate was visible, which, in truth, Petermann had never seen before.

It struck twelve o'clock in the village. The magician placed the wood-cutter at his right hand, waved three times in the air with his wand, pointing towards the north, murmured, with much grimace, a potent spell, directed the wood-cutter to lay aside all iron or other metal that he might have about him, and then drew, with great solemnity, a three-pronged divining rod from one of the folds of his garments.

"With this instrument," said he, "be armed, my hero, and step down into the dwelling of the silent people. Three doors will open before you at its touch; cast not a single look behind you—speak not a word—touch nothing—in the last chamber you may take three grasps with both your hands at whatever your heart wishes. But remember, one word, and every thing disappears. Be prudent, the day is a rare one—the stars are propitious—all the powers of the subterranean world are tamed; go—be silent; take—be daring."

Petermann took one of the points of the rod in each hand, as the magician directed him; and stepped boldly forward over the loose rubbish till he reached the iron door. At the first touch of the rod it opened with a creaking noise, and the simple wood-cutter was nearly shouting aloud when he heard the very same sound which three days before attended the disappearance of the little dwarfs in the turret.

But his mouth was instantly shut by a spasm of disgust, when he entered a dripping, feeble-lighted chamber, full of the most horrid reptiles he ever saw; it seemed the audience hall of toads and salamanders; bats whistled like hail-showers through the air—horrid serpents and dragons crept hissing about over each other—all the spawn of poisonous nature seemed here concentrated, and crawled around the feet of the wood-cutter as if they wished to bury him in a living tomb.

Petermann, however, kept steadily on in a straight direction towards a larger door, which he saw through the clouds of bats, directly before him at the distance of about fifty steps. He touched it, and at the second touch, it opened with a shrill clear sound like that of shivered glass, and a perfume of roses and a rosy light streamed upon his intoxicated senses. "My stars! this is something better," thought the wood-cutter. But how did he gape to behold, close upon his right hand as he entered, a beautiful lady reclining upon a splendid sofa, who raised her head covered with beautiful ringlets, threw her sparkling glances upon him as he entered, and presented him with a magnificent golden cup, brimming over with the red odorous juice of the grape. Petermann was in an ecstasy of delight and surprise, and if the lady had spoken he would certainly have answered her merrily without reflection. Her silence, however, and the solemn tranquillity of the splendid room, overawed him so much, that his tongue remained fettered, and he thus gained time to recover from his trance of pleasure. After some hesitation, and again listening, but without turning his head, he reached the third door, which was a folding one of elegant workmanship.

Here it required the third touch of the rod to open the two leaves of the door, but so gently and quietly did they move, that they seemed rather to disappear than to open. Petermann was instantly dazzled by the indescribable lustre which now met his eyes. It was not the glare of candles or of a fire, neither that of the clear sunbeams when they stream through a window, but the glitter of the heaps of treasure which produced this overpowering brilliance. Silver, gold, precious stones of every kind, mother of pearl, ivory, corals, treasures wrought and unwrought, were here heaped together in a number of chests, boxes and caskets, or placed on the table or on boards on the floor; every heap outshining another in magnificence.—In truth, the other day the two little bearded folks had got up into the sun some miserable specimens only of this imperial treasure; for here was a profusion of elegant vessels alone, which even a sturdy wood-cutter would have had trouble enough to carry above ground in thrice twenty-four hours.

A long pause of astonishment detained Petermann upon the threshold of the portal, while he felt himself deprived of the power of speech by a kind of blissful ecstasy at the sight of the treasures which lay here at his command; but at last a loud shout of astonishment, "Heavens! how much!" burst irresistibly from his lips.

Suddenly a clash of thunder was heard,—the darkness of the darkest night fell like a mountain over the subterranean treasure,—the hill trembled to its foundation, and with it shook the heart of the child of man who had ventured down into its recesses. Strength and consciousness forsook him, while he was lifted away as upon the wings of a raging whirlwind, and, during a moment of dreadful suspense, borne backward through the pitchy darkness of the resounding chamber.

When he recovered it was evening, the reddening blaze of the sky threw a cheering light into the eyes of the poor wood-cutter, as he opened them with a convulsive motion, unconscious of what had happened to him, and not daring for some time so much as to look behind him or move. The poor fellow then got his two elbows placed upon his knees, and his doubled fists applied to his ears, and sat thus like an immovable image of stone in some heathen temple. At first he began to roll his eyes, and point his ears, to try if he could recall to his recollection what had happened to him. At last he ventured to turn his head, and now remembering distinctly the errant-scholar in black robes, the magic wand, the divining rod, the iron gate, looked fearfully around him for all these objects, as they presented themselves to his memory, but in vain. Something now rustled close to him, among the bushes, and he leaped up with terror, was gently called back into the reality of his own quiet life, when his two elder children jumped out of the hazel-bushes, and behind them appeared Salome, who wished him a happy evening, in dear and well-known accents. The faithful Salome, though not so charming as the lady in the vaults of the castle, but with an expression of much greater good-will in her countenance, sat down beside him upon the fallen leaves, and placed the two children between their father and the red evening glow. "Is it not true," said she smiling, "is it not true, Petermann, that two such golden heads are worth all other treasures, and make us richer than many a king?" At this moment the sound of the errant-scholar seemed to resound from afar—

"A broad for fortune wilt thou roam?
Nay cease the fond endeavour:
She dwells at home,—and scorning home
You lose your chance for ever."

A little sense is requisite to polish the behaviour; but a great deal to polish the mind.

EXCERPTS.

THE celebrated Italian poet Metastasio was the son of a common mechanic, and used, when a little boy, to sing his extemporaneous verses about the streets. The father of Hayden, the great musical composer, was a wheel-wright. The father of the painter, Opie, was a working carpenter, in Cornwall. The parents of Sebastian Castalio, the elegant Latin translator of the Bible, were poor peasants, who lived among the mountains in Dauphiny. The Abbe Hautefeuille, who distinguished himself in the seventeenth century, by his inventions in clock and watchmaking, was the son of a baker; and Parini, the modern satiric poet of Italy, was the son of a peasant. The parents of Dr. John Prideaux, who afterwards rose to be bishop of Worcester, were in such poor circumstances, that they were with difficulty able to keep him at school till he had learned to read and write; and he obtained the rest of his education by walking to Oxford, and getting employed in the first instance as assistant in the kitchen of Exeter College, in which society he remained till he gradually made his way to a fellowship. The father of Inigo Jones, the architect, was a cloth-worker. Sir Edmund Saunders, chief justice of the court of king's bench in the reign of Charles II., was originally an errand boy at the inns of the court. Linnæus, the founder of the science of botany, although the son of the clergyman of a small village in Sweden, was for some time apprenticed to a shoemaker. The famous Ben Jonson worked for some time as a bricklayer or mason. Dr. Isaac Maddox, who in the reign of George II. became bishop first of St. Asaph, and then of Worcester, and who is well known by his work in the defence of the doctrine and discipline of the church of England, was in the first instance placed by his friends with a pastry-cook. The late Dr. Isaac Milner, dean of Carlisle and Lucasian professor of mathematics at Cambridge, was originally a weaver—as was also his brother Joseph, the well known author of a history of the church. Of the same profession was also, in his younger days, the late Dr. Joseph White, professor of Arabic at Oxford. The celebrated John Hunter, one of the greatest anatomists that ever lived, scarcely received any education whatever until he was twenty years old.

"A page of poetry," said queen Elizabeth, "is of little matter; be it so: but of a truth I tell thee, Cecil, it shall master full many a bold heart that the Spaniard cannot trouble; it shall win to it full many a proud and flighty one, that even chivalry and manly comeliness cannot touch. I may shake titles and dignities by the dozen from my breakfast-board; but I may not save those upon whose heads I shake them from rottenness and oblivion. This year they and their sovran dwell together, next year they and their beagle. Both have names, but names perishable. The keeper of my privy seal is an earl: what then? the keeper of my poultry yard is a Cæsar. In honest truth, a name given to a man, is no better than a skin given to him: what is not natively his own, falls off and comes to nothing."

Vondel, like many of the other literary men of Holland, had begun life as a commercial man, and originally kept a hosier's shop at Amsterdam; but he gave up the management of his business to his wife, when he commenced his career as an author. He died in extreme old age, in the year 1679, after having occupied during a great part of his life, the very highest place in the literature of his country. The French mathematician, Henry Pitot, was the author of several ingenious works, and particularly of a treatise on the management of vessels at sea. This book was long adopted by the French government, as the text-book for the instruction of the navy, and being translated into English, procured the writer the honour of admission into the royal society. Yet he had reached his twentieth year before he began to pay any attention to learning.

The mind perceives, by occasion of outward objects, as much more than is represented to it by sense, as a learned man does in the best written book, than an illiterate person or brute. To the eyes of both the same characters will appear; but the learned man, in those characters will see heaven, earth, sun and stars; read profound theorems of philosophy or geometry, learn a great deal of new knowledge from them, and admire the wisdom of the composer; while to the other nothing appears but black strokes drawn on white paper.

Genoa was overrun with idle poor, till a spirited nobleman built a spacious hospital and workhouse, to which all vagrants were sent and confined; and the better to clear all places of beggars, alms were prohibited under a penalty;

every one except the infirm, who were comfortably relieved, was set to work according to his ability, and if his earnings were found to exceed the charges of his maintenance and clothing, the surplus was faithfully delivered to him.

We once knew an old gentleman, no less remarkable for his eccentricities than he was for his honesty of purpose, whose rule it was, to dismiss from his service any servant, who, on coming to his employment, "picked holes" (to use his own expression) in the work of the one whose place he was called to fill. He reasoned, and with great truth, "that the man who could be mean enough to draw a comparison, with a view of disparaging another and of elevating himself, must certainly lack moral honesty, and that the consciousness of it made him resort to the miserable trick of bolstering up his pretensions to a reputation to which he had, in fact, no just claim." He said, "You may set it down as a general rule, that a man of real merit, of genuine worth, will never stoop to build up his own fame at the expense of another."

Wycherley had this odd particularity about him, from the loss of his memory; that the same chain of thought would return into his mind, at the distance of two or three years, without his remembering that it had been there before. Thus perhaps he would write one year an encomium upon avarice, for he loved paradoxes, and a year or two after, in dispraise of liberality; and in both the words only would differ; and the thoughts be as much alike as two medals of different metals out of the same mould.

The celebrated French dramatist Moliere, could only read and write very indifferently when he was fourteen years of age. It had been intended that he should follow the profession of his father, who was an upholsterer; but upon being taken on one occasion about the time we have mentioned by his uncle to the theatre, his passion for literature was so much excited, that he would hear of nothing but going to college, to which he was accordingly soon after sent.

There is the same difference between Corneille and Racine, as there is between un homme de génie, and un homme d'esprit. Corneille has more fire than Racine, bolder strokes, and in some things is not unlike Shakspeare. Racine's tragedies are all good; and as to Corneille's, even his greatest enemies would allow six of these to be so.

It is a very easy thing to devise good laws; the difficulty is to make them effective. The great mistake is that of looking upon men as virtuous, or thinking that they can be made so by laws; and consequently the greatest art of a politician, is to render vices serviceable to the cause of virtue.

Many grounds of calculation proceeded on by celebrated writers, are little better than those proceeded on by the Emperor Heliogabalus, who formed an estimate of the immense greatness of Rome from ten thousand pound weight of cobwebs which he had found in that city.

The mind which does not converse with itself, is an idle wanderer, and all the learning in the world is fruitless and misemployed; whilst in the midst of his boasted knowledge, a man continues in profound ignorance of that which, in point both of duty and advantage, he is most concerned to know.

A prince should know how to take advantage of his ministers' talents, but he ought never to follow their counsels blindly; he may lend himself to men, but not yield himself up absolutely to them.

He who would strike out any thing novel in architecture, commits a folly in safety; his house and he may stand; but he who attempts it in politics, carries a torch, from which at the first narrow passage we may expect a conflagration.

Nothing does more hurt in a state than that cunning men pass for wise ones.

FOREIGN LITERATURE.

FOSCARINI, THE PATRICIAN OF VENICE.*

A VENETIAN story, the incidents of which are mixed up with one of the frequent tumults of the city, in which, in the year 1613, Foscari, a popular patrician, falls a victim to the vengeance of one of the inquisitors. The writer is familiar with the events and recorded manners of the times—a very common qualification now, by the way, remarkably contrasting with the state of novel writing half a century ago; but he takes things as he finds them, without feeling the necessity of inquiry or doubt; and so, of course, the Venetian noblesse, (except the younger members,) the ancients, the inquisitors, are all of the old cast—more of them demons than men, and fitter for melo-dramas than sober realities. The story, however, for the most part, is agreeably told, almost wholly narrative, and very little burdened with reflection; distinct and intelligible in the details generally, but too circumstantial for the particulars to be readily caught by the reader—a fault past all redemption; for the glancer of novels, of course, wishes to read as he runs, and not to be perpetually summoned to consideration, or the ascertainment of consistencies.

Foscari, the hero, is just returning from his French embassy, in company with a friend, a Venetian exile, under the disguise of his secretary and a Moorish name, Almoré; and also a page, who is really a Moor, with some mystery about him not very essential to the story. They are gliding along in a gondola, now within sight of Venice, and finding, upon a careful estimate, there is just time to tell his story to his friend, he tells it, circumstantially, up to the very minute. He, it appeared, was of the first families of Venice, and had been engaged to a lady of another distinguished family, whose face, according to a practice not uncommon in Venice, and very common in novels about Venice ladies, he had not seen, and was not to see till the bridal ceremony; and in whose features, when unveiled, he discovered a person whom he had encountered not long before, in a very equivocal position. Though in the presence of her assembled relatives, he renounced the match without explaining, in mercy to the lady, braved the family resentments, and luckily escaped their poniards. Though passionately devoted to his country, absence became desirable, and he had influence enough to get appointed ambassador to France. At Paris the young noble soon got again into difficulties, occasioned by a passionate attachment to the daughter of the Spanish ambassador, which, in spite of the jealousies and prohibitions of his government, who did not approve of foreign connexions, he determined to prosecute. The marriage day was fixed, all in secret, when suddenly, without giving a hint of the cause, the lady vanished, father and all; and the forlorn Foscari was left a second time, the victim of his too easy confidence. Recovering his good spirits, however, and his mission terminating, he was now returning to Venice, to render an account of his embassy. Scarcely landed, he discovers the Spanish jilt was at Venice, and actually the wife of her cousin, Don somebody, the resident ambassador. Though desirous of shunning her, contact becomes inevitable, especially as his page, the young Moor, some way connected with the lady's family, and not remarkable for discretion, wishes to promote an interview. The lady, too, wishes it, simply to explain, and set herself right in the esteem of her quondam admirer—to whose interests, that is, to screen him from the vengeance of the laws, which forbade foreign marriages, she had, in fact, sacrificed her own happiness. This interview, however, is not easily accomplished. Foscari has other business to occupy him; he desires to persuade the Venetians to go to war with the Spaniards, if possible, but at all events war with somebody; and at last, by the exertions of himself and his friends, war is declared against the Uscques, whose piracies were winked at by the duke of Styria, their sovereign; and notwithstanding all opposition, he himself gets the command. He was very popular with all the young nobles; and the poor ones, who were numerous, and looked with ardour to a war as a source of plunder. In this expedition, nothing could exceed Foscari's successes; but unluckily, in the very midst of them comes, in company with his page, Donna Margaretta, the Spanish lady, to the camp, where the long sought for interview at last takes place, and a full explanation follows. Conducting her back to the vessel, the whole party were seized by some Greek pirates, to the serious mortification, of course, of the gallant commander; but from this awkward position, he was rescued by another apparently untoward affair—wrecked in a storm, and thrown, without the pirates, but with the lady, on the shore. The effect of thus being thrown together, they scarcely knew where, was some little inroad upon the lady's prudence, and some soft effusions of mutual fondness, when suddenly the roar of cannon—fortunately it was his own—brought them to their senses; he returned in time to resume his command, and she proceeded to Venice.

In the meanwhile Foscari's enemies at home, political and personal, especially the old father of the lady to whom he had been originally betrothed, and who was now one of the three inquisitors, were all at work to procure his recall. They succeeded, and his return was speedily followed by disastrous consequences. The lovers again meet—a fire occurs, from which he rescues the lady, and searching for a place of refuge, accident throws him in contact with the inquisitor's daughter. Explanations here also, of course, ensue, and his suspicions prove to have been ill-placed. Her affections are still fixed upon him, and though not returned, she still labours to serve him. Tracked now to the ambassador's house, a handle is made of this by his foes, who represent him as caballing with the enemies of the state, and he is seized and plunged into the dungeons of the inquisition. No mercy is in store for him; old Gradenigo, who wanted nothing but a decent pretence for wreaking his vengeance, resolves to despatch him. His lovely daughter appeals and exculpates in vain. The young nobles conspire—a rebellion rages—the inquisition itself is stormed—the devils within—the inquisitors, we mean, persist—and the turbulent scene ends with the death of the unlucky Foscari, the suppression of the rebellion, and the misery of the ladies, one of whom dies, and the other had long been a San Lorenzo nun, and continues so.

THE DRAMA.

THE DRAMA OF MARIE MIGNOT.

THERE is no romance so romantic as that of real life, and no materials for a work of fiction so effective as the simple truth. The drama of Marie Mignot, which is at present enjoying more vogue in Paris than any that has been produced for several years, is founded on a personal history of the most romantic description. As it is little known, we shall glance at its chief details. Marie Mignot, who was lifted from a counter to a throne, to fall thence to the lowest conceivable depth of human wretchedness, was the daughter of a linen draper of Grenoble. She was a person of very restricted intellect, of passions so limited as to be entirely under her own control, of some beauty, and gifted with a native simplicity of manner, which won all who looked upon her. She was first beloved by the private secretary of a councillor of parliament in the reign of Louis XIV., who was engaged to marry her, when an accident of the most extraordinary description, which can only be alluded to, not recounted, caused the marriage to be broken off suddenly. This rupture, and especially the immediate occasion of it, made some noise in Grenoble, and excited the curiosity of the old councillor himself to see this beauty, who had been so beloved and then deserted by his secretary. He saw her—was smitten with her charms—found fault with the folly of his secretary in losing such a treasure, and committed a greater himself, by marrying the little grisette.

The moment Marie became the wife of the councillor of parliament, she totally changed her manners and mode of life; procured instructions from the first masters in every kind of fashionable accomplishment; and was soon in a condition to receive and mix with the best society of the city. But her old husband very soon left her to enjoy her new rank by herself,—leaving behind a very handsome fortune to console his widow for his loss.

Once her own mistress, she soon bethought her of quitting a place where her low origin was so well known; she left Grenoble, and went to Paris; where, by means of a lavish expenditure of her wealth, she created a lively "sensation," and nothing was talked of for a time but the charming widow. She was soon surrounded by lovers and aspirants for her hand and fortune; among others the famous Mareschal de Hopital sought her favour—thinking with her wealth to rebuild his dilapidated fortunes. He made her an offer of marriage, and rank being what the gay widow, with all her simplicity, most sighed after, she accepted it, and they were wed. The marshal soon dissipated the fortune of the widow (which in truth was not so large as her expensive mode of living seemed to indicate), and he then died, leaving her little but rank to console her for her double loss. She had still her personal charms, however, and these served her more effectually than ever, in attracting the notice and at length the love of John Casimir, King of Poland—who, after having been first a Jesuit and then a cardinal, succeeded to the throne of Poland, married the widow of his brother Uladislav, abdicated the crown, and came to Paris, where Louis XIV. gave him the Abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés.—This "king and no king" saw the charming widow of the marshal—loved, and secretly married her—not so secretly, however, but what the lady was able to cause it to be pretty well known: to which end she never spoke of the king except in the following words, "my lord the king of," (le roi mon seigneur.)

She had now reached the height of her fortune; and we have not space to follow her in her fall. Suffice it that she survived her royal husband many years, and was reduced to such an extremity of poverty and wretchedness that she actually became a beggar in the public streets, and was found dead of want at a church door!

PAINTING.

If I had the privilege of living over several lives, in one of them I should study painting. It is no mystery to me that men have devoted themselves so assiduously to this charming art. There is in it a quality of magic. It is independent of time and place. Scenes and persons distant and vanished are brought back. There are so many objects which appeal through the eye to the imagination and the heart, so many scenes abroad in the fields and woods, such bright and graceful groups of my own race, continually arrest attention, and images so fair and endearing so often glide by me, which I long to seize upon their wild flight to oblivion, that I have often wished to be a painter. I would not endure the labour of learning, the long lonely hours of vain endeavour, the sequestration from exercise and society necessary in one who means to excel; but my fancy has shaped it as some heavenly gift, free from the difficulties and imperfections which ever mingle with all human acquirements. If I had been thus blessed by nature, it were worth while to look into my gallery. Many a delicious scene would be there; and, perhaps, here and there a face which has beamed before me, as unconscious of my admiration as if it had been a star. But if you would feel the spell of the painter, wait till some being whom you loved has gone down to the dust. You have traced her from health, beauty, and pleasure, through the dark passages of disease. Day after day has only borne her deeper into the awful abyss. Her Hebe cheeks are sunken and ashy, those red lips are withered, the long motionless lashes are closed over those impressive eyes, and the silver voice is hushed for ever. You have stood by her new grave. You have heard careless men shovel the pebbly earth upon her coffin, and when the strange and dream-like ceremonies are completed, and the various crowd dispersed to the business of the world, you have gone back to the deserted dwelling, where incredulous imagination hears her step and her voice in every noise and whisper. Now look upon her picture. You will not speak. There is nothing in language to express the singular mixture of fancy and reality, of pleasure and anguish with which the mind is filled; but you gaze upon the full lips and dimpled cheeks, the eyes follow yours with the motion of life, and the curls, clustering about the familiar brow, almost wave with the stirring air. It is at such a moment that we acknowledge the mastery of the painter.

But have you ever been introduced into the room of a bad painter? All sorts of faces stare at you from the walls. The artist directs your attention to a figure perched up somewhere in a glare of light. Perhaps a human being of the male gender, in mighty fine apparel, with his hand bent, after the fashion of all paintings, over the back of the chair, and great long fingers sticking out straight, with an evident intention of appearing to the most possible advantage; or, perchance, one of the lovelier kind, loaded with magnificence, damask curtains and sky in the distance, smiles down upon you in a manner positively irresistible. Upon such a slender proof the artist perhaps asks you to select the original from the circle of bystanders. You look around hopelessly, without perceiving any face which could be twisted into a resemblance, and at length fix upon the wrong one.

Persons are much in the habit of underrating the value of a portrait. They evade the solicitations of their families to procure their likenesses with trifling replies. "What should such an ordinary mortal as I have my likeness taken for? I am not so vain. Let the young and the lovely enrich the canvass; but I have no pretensions to beauty." But is there nothing endearing but smooth and pretty faces? The eye of affection finds a sweetness in your features from their associations with mind. They do not love you for your shape and appearance. They are bound to you, heart with heart, by the invisible links of clinging recollections; and, when you are torn away, as you must be, and in all the bustle and variety, in all the merriment and anguish of human nature, they never meet you again, it is then that the canvass seems to snatch from the grave its victim, and to become fraught with a richness and a spell, which the wide universe beside could not have afforded. And the pale painter, who has stolen from the dark fury of death and time, this visible impress of what you love, seems like an enchanter, endowed with the faculties of creation.

I deem it a duty in all parents who have families of affectionate children growing up around them, to bequeath to them an inheritance of this nature. Every idle chance may terminate your existence. It is not for me to inform you upon what a slender thread hangs the important gift of human life; nor how light a breeze may waft the beautiful and airy fabric away. Then, when the awful crisis has taken place, and dust has been consigned to dust, and ashes to ashes, be yet among them. Surely, in gazing upon those beloved features, so teeming with all the sweet and powerful associations of nature, while the throbbing bosom heaves, and the big tears swell up into their eyes, the lips of the still picture will yet speak to them. The lessons you have taught will be more deeply imprinted on their memories; and from the prostration of anguish their bereaved spirits will rise, supported almost as if in your very presence.

But the painter has yet a higher influence upon society. Portraits are individual blessings, interesting only within a contracted circle; and even those who love the departed hasten on to their own fate, disappear from the face of the earth, and the picture which has unlocked all the hidden feelings of warm and deep hearts, becomes itself as a stranger. The portrait painter, therefore, toils only for the age in which he lives. If he would aim at immortality, he must paint from history or imagination. History, in the first place, offers him an opportunity to appeal at once to the deepest and most interesting feelings of all civilized mankind. He conjures up before you the embodied scenes and persons which have been dimly floating in your curious fancy, and it seems as if you were introduced into some vast temple of time, where the old thief had arrayed in order all his stolen treasures. The age in which you live, the people who surround you, pass away from your notice, and you seem to exist in the long vanished hour, whose objects, by the skill of one individual, have been arranged so visibly before your contemplation.

I have been unconsciously led into these reflections by the sight of West's painting of Christ rejected. At first the impression was by no means so powerful; but, after having visited it several times, there appeared to be something about it more than human. It is impossible for me to enter into any description of this masterly production, nor am I sufficiently acquainted with the art to pronounce upon its scientific merits. There is a kind of gentry who find fault, of course; but the only censure which occurs to me is, that its excellence cannot be half comprehended in one visit, but breaks upon you gradually, like the dawning of day. The figure of our Saviour occupies a prominent station. We should be cautious in deciding immediately upon its merits. It requires thought, study, and a tolerably accurate knowledge of the subject, to take in the beauty and the extent of the conceptions which it embodies. The form of our Redeemer can scarcely be described. The perfection of his figure, the living, I could almost say, breathing image of elevated patience and sweetness of character and god-like contemplation. The face, pale with the extremity of anguish, the faultless brow pierced with thorns, and just stained upon the marble temple with the gushing blood, arrest the eye and the feelings. The high priest Caiaphas meets your eye next. His face expressing the gnawings of malignant and unchecked hate, he gazes upon his noble and beautiful victim with blood-thirsty and tiger-like ferocity. He appears longing to tear his flesh, and dabble in his blood. Pilate stands between, proud, offended, and commanding. There is a Roman grace and loftiness in his demeanour. He is in the act of declaring, "Take him and crucify him; but I find no fault in him." Behind Christ the notice is attracted by the athletic form of a Roman soldier, leaning his hands upon his sword, and gazing attentively at Christ. He is the centurion, who has to superintend the execution, and he seems wrapped in reflections upon the cruelty which he cannot restrain, and in which he is about reluctantly to participate. Perhaps Mr. West has in no instance discovered the taste and beauty of his imagination more than in the next image. It is that of a little girl, the centurion's daughter. She has a sweet child's face, ignorant of the stupendous events which are going on around her; her expression discovers the simplicity and artlessness of her soul, and that although the confusion of the multitude has a little awakened her timid and serious feelings, yet with her arms wound round her father's, and her cheek resting upon his hand, she feels safe and happy.

There are other objects to claim attention, but they are too numerous to be touched upon in my limits. It is to be hoped, that young Mr. West will not hasten his departure from our city, until all have had an opportunity to attend his exhibition; for, setting aside the fact that this painting is the offering of an American, its intrinsic merits entitle it to universal admiration.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE CONFESSION.

BY JOHN GALT.

My furlough had nearly expired; and, as I was to leave the village the next morning to join my regiment, then on the point of being shipped off at Portsmouth, for India, several of my old companions spent the evening with me, in the Marquis of Granby. They were joyous, hearty lads; but mirth bred thirst, and drinking begot contention.

I was myself the soberest of the squad, and did what I could to appease their quarrels. The liquor, however, had more power than my persuasion, and at last it so exasperated some foolish difference about a song, between Dick Winlaw and Jim Bradley, that they fell to fighting, and so the party broke up.

Bradley was a handsome, bold, fine fellow, and I had more than once urged him to enlist in our corps. Soon after quitting the house, he joined me in my way home, and I spoke to him again about enlisting, but his blood was still hot—he would abide no reason—he could only swear of the revenge he would inflict upon Winlaw. This led to some remonstrance on my part, for Bradley was to blame in the dispute; till, from less to more, we both grew fierce, and he struck me such a blow in the face, that my bayonet leaped into his heart.

My passion was in the same moment quenched. I saw him dead at my feet—I heard footsteps approaching—I fled towards my father's house—the door was left unbolts for me—I crept softly, but in a flutter, to bed, but I could not sleep. I was stunned—a fearful consternation was upon me—a hurry was in my brain—my mind was on fire. I could not believe that I had killed Bradley. I thought it was the nightmare which had so poisoned my sleep. My tongue became as parched as charcoal: had I been choking with ashes, my throat could not have been filled with more horrible thirst. I breathed as if I were suffocating with the dry dust into which the dead are changed.

After a time, that fit of burning agony went off; tears came into my eyes; my nature was softened. I thought of Bradley when we were boys, and of the summer days we had spent together. I never owed him a grudge—his blow was occasioned by the liquor—a freer heart than his, mercy never opened; and I wept like a girl.

The day at last began to dawn. I had thrown myself on the bed without undressing, and I started up involuntarily and moved hastily—I should rather say instinctively—towards the door. My father heard the stir, and inquired wherefore I was departing so early. I begged him not to be disturbed; my voice was troubled, and he spoke to me kindly and encouragingly, exhorting me to eschew riotous companions. I could make no reply, indeed I heard no more; there was a blank between his blessing and the time when I found myself crossing the common, near the place of execution.

But through all that horror and frenzy, I felt not that I had committed a crime—the deed was the doing of a flash. I was conscious I could never in cold blood have harmed a hair of Bradley's head. I considered myself unfortunate, but not guilty; and this fond persuasion so pacified my alarms, that, by the time I reached Portsmouth, I almost thought as lightly of what I had done, as of the fate of the gallant French dragon whom I sabred at Salamanca.

But ever and anon, during the course of our long voyage to India, sadder after thoughts often came upon me. In those trances I saw, as it were, our pleasant village green, all sparkling again with school-boys at their pastimes; then I fancied them gathering into groups, and telling the story of the murder; again, moving away in silence towards the church-yard, to look at the grave of poor Bradley. Still, however, I was loth to believe myself a criminal; and so, from day to day, the time passed on, without any outward change revealing what was passing within, to the observance or suspicions of my comrades. When the regiment was sent against the Burmese, the bravery of the war, and the hardships of our adventures so won me from reflection, that I began almost to forget the accident of that fatal night.

One day, however, while I was waiting in an outer room of the colonel's quarters, I chanced to take up a London newspaper, and the first thing in it which caught my eye was an account of the trial and execution of Dick Winlaw, for the murder of Bradley. The dreadful story scorched my eyes; I read it as if every word had been fire; it was a wild and wonderful account of all. The farewell party at the Granby was described by the witnesses. I was spoken of by them with kindness and commendation; the quarrel between Bradley and Winlaw was described, as in a picture; and my attempt to restrain them was pointed out by the judge, in his charge to the jury, as a beautiful example of loving old companionship. Winlaw had been found near the body, and the presumptions of guilt were so strong and manifold, that the jury, without retiring, found him guilty. He was executed on the common, and his body hung in chains. Then it was that I first felt I was indeed a murderer—then it was that the molten sulphur of remorse was poured into my bosom, rushing, spreading, burning, and devouring; but it changed not the bronze with which hardship had masked my cheek, nor the steel to which danger had tempered my nerves.

I obeyed the colonel's orders as unmoved as if nothing had happened. I did my duty with habitual precision—my hand was steady, my limbs were firm; but my tongue was incapable of uttering a word. My comrades as they came towards me, suddenly halted, and turned aside; strangers looked at me as if I bore the impress of some fearful thing. I was removed, as it were, out of myself—I was in another state of being—I was in perdition.

Next morning we had a skirmish, in which I received this wound in the knee; and soon afterwards, with other invalids, I was ordered home. We were landed at Portsmouth, and I proceeded to my native village. But in this I had no will nor choice; a chain was around me, which I could not resist, drawing me on. Often did I pause and turn, wishing to change my route; but fate held me fast, and I was enchanted by the spell of many an old and dear recollection, to revisit those things which had lost all their innocence and holiness to me.

The day had been sultry, the sun set with a drowsy eye, and the evening air was moist, warm, and oppressive. It weighed heavily alike on mind and body. I was crippled by my wound—the journey was longer than my strength could sustain much farther—still I resolved to persevere, for I longed to be again in my father's house; and I fancied were I once there, that the burning in my bosom would abate.

During my absence in India, the new road across the common had been opened. By the time I reached it, the night was closed in; a dull, starless, breezeless, dumb, sluggish, and unwholesome night; and those things which still retained in their shapes some blackness, deeper than the darkness, seemed, as I slowly passed by, to be endowed with a mysterious intelligence, with which my spirit would have held communion but for dread.

While I was frozen with the influence of this dreadful phantasy, I saw a pale, glimmering, ineffectual light, rising before me. It was neither lamp, fire, nor candle; and though like, it was yet not flame. I took it at first for the lustre of a reflection from some unseen light, and I walked towards it, in the hope of finding a cottage or an alehouse, where I might obtain some refreshment and a little rest. I advanced, its form enlarged, but its beam became no brighter; and the horror, which had for a moment left me when it was first discovered, returned with overwhelming power. I rushed forward, but soon halted, for I saw that it hung in the air, and as I approached, that it began to take a ghastly and spectral form! I discerned the lineaments of a head, and the hideous outlines of a shapeless anatomy. I stood rivetted to the spot; for I thought I saw behind it a dark and vast thing, in whose hands it was held forth. In that moment a voice said,

"It is Winlaw the murderer; his bones often, in the moist summer nights, shine out in this way; it is thought to be an acknowledgment of his guilt, for he died protesting his innocence."

The person who addressed me was your honour's gamekeeper, and the story I have told, is the cause of my having desired him to bring me here.

TITLES IN AMERICA.

"Sir Richard Ketley, Davy Gam, Esquire."—Shaks.

The absurd use of titles, both prefix and suffix, has gained such strong hold in this country, that I fear something stronger than legislative enactments will be required to uproot it. Nothing can be better evidence than this that a taste for distinction is a natural desire of the human heart. And so it is: but distinctions ought to be rational ones. I would ask, then, where the rationality is of those with which our eyes and ears are so constantly offended?

The institutions of the old world call for regular gradations of rank; and much depends upon a man's title. There, respectability, and mere comfort, and the common enjoyment of life are much concerned in the fact of a man's possessing every inch of his title. We confess that we would not, under such circumstances, find fault with the assumption of something more than one's own.

When an European stranger takes up his residence in Paris, if he does not communicate to the servants of the house in which he lodges any other title, Mons. le Comte is forthwith his appellation. And count, too, is the travelling title of all incognitos. The exiled Louis assumed it, and so did the pretenders to the throne of England. Quite as universal as that is our esquire. Is a man a lawyer? he is presently dubbed esq. Is he a gentleman of fortune, without a profession; or an acting magistrate; or, indeed, any thing else but a shopkeeper or a daily labourer? he is an esquire, by courtesy. And why these two last should not be called esquire, I know not. I remember that squire is a familiar address among people of the lower orders, as is, after the foreign manner, very complacently said, by some of our writers—not of the higher order.

This title is so universal, and has been so bandied about, that I was not astonished to find, the other day, one of my servant's cards with "Mr. Jerry Bowshin, esq." written on it. Too much of a good thing, I have heard, is good for nothing—and thus far our title, it would seem, is but a scurvy subject. After these absurdities, let us for a moment inquire what the meaning of esquire is. "It is," says Doctor Johnson, "a title in dignity next below a knight." And a long string of personages is detailed to whom it is due. But Mr. Webster says, that it is bestowed at pleasure, and is indefinite in meaning—every thing and any thing. He adds, it is a title of respect. It would seem, however, from our motto from Shakspeare, which Johnson quotes, that he intended to ridicule it, as it is probable that it was almost as indefinite in the time of the bard of Avon as at this day.

The term honourable, a far more weighty and imposing title, is now, and has always been with us, much in use; but being of extremely simple etymology, it is not quite so general in its application as the other, and its inconsistency, where too glaring, would be extremely ridiculous.

In Massachusetts, particularly, it is held in much estimation, and scarcely less so in all the eastern states. And it is by no means so indefinite as the other. Besides, it is in the state just named, fixed by law, as is also the worn out excellency. This title of honour has been creeping almost imperceptibly along, until we now find it used before the names of a great many, who are not exclusively entitled to the appellation of its adjective. This is not surprising. Where titles are as plenty as blackberries, no great effort is necessary for a man to get one. This honour does not sound so sweetly in our ears as some other nick-names; it is too high sounding to be relished entirely, and cannot but be envied until it shall, by frequent and general use, like some other words, lose all connexion with its original meaning.

Military titles are extensively used; but I have been astonished at the paucity in numbers of the ranks below colonel. We seldom hear major, and very rarely captain, out of the regular service. Truly that man's ambition must be very easily satisfied, who aspires to nothing more than such small bits of honour.

General is the word, to use a miserable pun, that is most general. I am told by a friend who has travelled much, that although at home he is plain misster, when abroad he is general; this is his travelling title; and some laughable errors have occurred in consequence of his receiving letters with a tremendous prefix to his name, which the postmaster of his town never dreamed belonged to him. Another person tells me, that, travelling to the west, he got on board a steamboat on the Ohio, for the purpose of descending that river.—There were five-and-twenty gentlemen on board, belonging principally to various parts of Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee, and nearly all strangers to one another. At dinner the captain of the boat said, addressing one of the company he knew, "General, shall I help you to a piece of roast-beef," upon which twenty three out of the whole number replied to his civility, affirmatively or negatively. My informant was of the two silent ones. It may appear merely ludicrous, to most persons, that we are so much given to this thing; yet I cannot but wish that it were not so. I think that it detracts from the national character, and sinks us in the eyes of the world. It deprives simple republicanism of its boasted plainness; is a contemptible commentary on our written constitution, and shows us the creatures of a desire which must be satiated even at the expense of belying our most solemn declarations.

This folly has penetrated too deeply into the body politic, not to need sound minds and strong minds too, to erase—to purge it out. Men begin to think that they are entitled to those petty distinctive appellations, and feel offended if they are not given in addressing them.

It is not yet the practice to call a man, to his face, honourable, when addressing him in the first person, but it may not be long before even this is done; for it is uniformly practised in our legislative halls in the third person.

As a moment's reflection must convince every man, of the utter ridiculousness of this mimicry of monarchical institutions, every sound republican, every lover of his country and its customs; all who would wish to preserve pure and undefiled the national manners and conversation, ought to set themselves against these things, and prove by their own practice that they know how to appreciate the flimsy heads and tails that are applied to them—musty relics of feudal times; monarchical contrivances. Let all those enjoy titles to whom they are legitimately due—and so long as they are entitled to them—and no longer.

WALKING.

Since the commencement of our journal, we have taken frequent opportunities to set forth the necessity of daily exercise for the preservation of health. We have endeavoured to show, that it is in vain the air expands the lungs, and the heart propels the blood to the different parts of the body, if their efforts are not seconded by regular bodily exercise. Those who neglect the latter, though they may for a period drag out a species of existence, can scarcely be said to enjoy life; weak and effeminate, they languish for a few years, and then drop into an untimely grave. Our observations have heretofore been only of a general character. We propose now to commence the consideration of the various species of exercise, and their comparative advantages: premising, however, one or two rules, an observance of which is essential, in order to derive from either species the desired results. In the first place, exercise must be regular. It is a very great mistake to suppose that occasional efforts will repair any part of the mischief which habitual indolence produces. A celebrated physician has said, that the weak and valetudinary ought to view regular exercise as one of their moral duties. It should be so, in fact, with all. There is no one, not actually labouring under disease, who should not consider it a duty to appropriate a certain portion of every day to active exercise in the open air. It would be important, also, could this exercise be connected, always, with some pleasing occupation or pursuit. The mere movement of the limbs, as a stated task, will have a far less beneficial effect upon the health of the system, than if the mind be at the same time pleasantly, but not too intensely, occupied. Hence to those who are able to command the time and means, botanical pursuits, or the cultivation of a garden; and to all, various mechanical occupations, or any innocent recreation, will be a means of increasing, very considerably, the salutary effects of bodily exercise.

Secondly: No kind of exercise should be carried so far as to produce undue fatigue. All extremes are injurious to the system, and over-exertion is not less capable of producing bad effects, though of a different kind, than constant inactivity.

Thirdly: Many persons are in the habit, after having increased the warmth of their body by exercise, of throwing off a portion of their clothing, or of sitting in a draught of air, in order to cool themselves. From this practice very serious consequences are apt to result. It would be better, particularly in the milder seasons of the year, to partake of active exercise in a dress lighter than that usually worn, resuming some additional clothing immediately upon the exercise being suspended; or, in summer, to rest in a place free from damp or a current of air; and in winter, in a moderately warm apartment.

Fourthly: Exercise should not be entered upon immediately after meals, as it is liable to give rise to heart-burn, and other disagreeable sensations in the stomach. The instinct of the inferior animals confirms the propriety of this rule; for they all indulge themselves in rest after food. Whenever it is possible, therefore, exercise should be delayed for at least two hours after a hearty meal.

It may be here objected, that we often observe labourers in the country return, after a full meal, to their work, without any apparent inconvenience. We admit the fact, but warn those who would follow the practice, to be certain first that they possess the countryman's vigorous body and powers, and imitate, in other respects, his regularity of life. But after all, do we not observe these very labourers leave their tables with reluctance; and work with less activity and cheerfulness than they did when they entered the field in the morning? The necessity of rest after dinner, even among the labouring classes, seems to be established in warm climates, as in Southern Europe, by the labourers in the field, who are out at the dawn of day, requiring an hour or two at noon for their siesta, or after-dinner nap.

Exercise has been divided into active and passive. The first class, including walking, running, leaping, dancing, galdening, and various mechanical occupations, &c. While the latter class comprehends sailing, swinging, and riding in carriages or on horseback. The last of these is, however, of a mixed nature, and is in some measure active as well as passive. We propose to consider each of these in order.

Walking is undoubtedly one of the most natural, gentle, and beneficial of the active species of exercise. As it is within the power of every individual, possessing the free use of his limbs, no one can have any valid excuse for neglecting it.

In walking, it is all important that the body be held as upright as possible; the shoulders being kept back and the breast projected somewhat forwards, so as to give to the chest its full dimensions; the lungs being by this means allowed sufficient room to expand fully, breathing is rendered free and easy, and every vital action is performed with vigour and regularity. The attitude thus assumed in walking, places, in fact, all the organs of the body in their most natural position, and frees them from all constraint. Hence to the sedentary, whether student, artist, or mechanic, a brisk walk is one of the most effectual antidotes to those injuries, so liable to result from the bent and fixed position in which their bodies are held for the greater part of the day. Females, likewise, would do well to devote some hours out of the twenty-four to this species of exercise. In the more opulent classes of society, in particular, they are too apt to fall into an unpardonable neglect of this important means of preserving health. "We find them," says a pleasing writer, "just like so many divinities of Epicurus—not indeed basking upon clouds in the mild empyreal warmth of heaven, but fixed almost as immovably upon well-cushioned chairs and sofas, in hot and close apartments." We regret our duty should oblige us to say that to them, even the little exercise they take in the open air is deprived of its health-imparting effects by tight-lacing, on the one hand, and by shoes of too narrow dimensions, or improper materials, on the other.

In a former number we pointed out to the studious the importance of alternating mental application with bodily exercise. Let us again invite them to lay by their books, at short and regular intervals, and enjoy

"The rural walk,
O'er hills, through valleys, and by rivers' brink:"

reminding them of the maxim of Plato, that "he is truly a cripple, who, cultivating his mind alone, suffers his body to languish through sloth and inactivity."

Walking in the open air, by increasing the circulation of the blood, communicates an equable glow over the whole body, which tends greatly to prevent that sensation of chilliness which, during the winter, renders weakly and delicate persons incapable of pursuing any occupation out of a close and heated apartment.

A respectable individual, Josiah Walker, who resided a few years since in the state of Connecticut, in the ninety-ninth year of his age, with his natural and intellectual faculties but little impaired, attributed the preservation of such unusual health and vigour to so advanced a period of life, not only to his temperate habits, but also to his "having always preferred walking to riding on horseback or in a carriage." Even on the verge of his hundredth year, he was accustomed to walk every day, and with as much sprightliness as many men in the meridian of life." Indeed most of those who have attained to an advanced age were celebrated as great walkers. Jour. of Health.

SEA SICKNESS.

The Medical Journal intimates, that forty-five drops of laudanum is a sovereign specific against sea sickness; and we have only to say, that if it be true, the discoverer of the remedy should and will be immortal. Harvey, who first found out the circulation of the vital fluid, and Jenner, who taught mankind a preventive of that most loathsome and disgusting of human maladies, the small pox, were both mere sciolists and nostrum mongers, compared with the illustrious Grenville, to whom is ascribed the heaven-born discovery we have just mentioned. The man who can cure or prevent a sea sickness, has already squared the circle! We had rather be that man than to have found out the longitude. Indeed, it strikes us, that diseases of all sorts, (except perchance the king's evil and the malady of disappointed office seeking) are as good as banished from the world, if Dr. Grenville has really invented a cure for sea sickness; for we should like to know what a man could not cure who had wrestled successfully with that villainous "monster of the deep." Didst thou ever take a sea voyage, gentle reader? If thou hast, thou art ready to agree with us in immortalizing the doctor; and if thou hast not, set thyself down and be contented, as a highly favoured mortal, albeit thou hast had small pox, plague, leprosy, and fevers of every type mentioned in the books, of every colour of the rainbow, black, scarlet, sea-spotted and yellow. 'Tis only he who has been sea sick that has the proper insight of human calamity. He who has gone to the ship's side, to square certain unsettled accounts with his stomach, while "the green and yellow" wave glided by his giddy and bewildered vision, till it seemed to the sufferer one vast ocean of nausea and of death!—he who has lain in his berth, sweating in all the agonies of ten thousand aggregated qualms, till he would feel grateful to any kind-hearted sailor who would throw him overboard, has seen that sailor offer him the consolation of raw pork and molasses!—he who has seen and felt all this, has a right to say he knows something! But let no other man presume for one moment to suppose that he has any acquaintance with sublunary troubles. He may have been in the galleys, or under the tortures of the inquisition; nay, he may have been hanged and brought back to life by a galvanic battery, but he knows nothing of genuine affliction, if he never was sea sick.

INFORMAL DIVORCES.

And this divorce shall be as truly kept
As if in thronged court a thousand years
Had heard it, and a thousand lawyers' hands
Sealed to the separation.—Vittoria Corombona.

I do not know what the author of the essay on government might say on the matter; I do know what all the young person's female acquaintance would say of it; I am quite settled in mind as to what the good, the young, and the kind-hearted will think of it, and yet I dare not commit myself by an opinion. Let my reader take the circumstances of the case, and judge for himself.

Mr. Discon Trollop (the reader will excuse my sentimental name) loved, as sincerely as a middle-aged gentleman of four feet eleven or thereabout could be expected to do, a young lady of great beauty, accomplished, of course, of moderate fortune, treasured up like one of her own natty new Leghorns in a little trelliced, balconied, and woodbined bandbox of a cottage near Kensington. There had been, previous to the onslaught of Mr. Trollop's love-making, a rumour of a previous attachment—a sort of mere school-girl fancy, it was said, between Racilia —, the lady in question, and a young artist, too talented to be the inheritor of wealth, too young to be the possessor of it, too mere a novice in his profession to be within even whooping distance of fame or eminence. Mr. Wilderming and Racilia would have soon come to an understanding on the matter, but the old story, friends averse and noble relatives, prevented the wishes of the lovers. An unsuccessful attempt at an elopement gave the coup de grace to Wilderming's hopes. An upper room and a "not at home," became the standard order; and after a world of vows, and tears, and kisses, not loud, but sweet, Wilderming and the lady separated—he to study the old sheets of canvass in Italy, she to pine the while in solitude at home.

The worthy young artist became so enamoured of the counterfeit, though unfading beauties of his Italian masters, that he completely forgot his English love affair. No letters were received from him. The young girl became a blooming woman. Mr. Discon Trollop saw her somewhere or other, and made love to her. She rejected the little fellow without a reason; he addressed the parents, and was accepted with a very good reason, which was to be found in a handsome equipage, and a seat in the country.

I was discussing the merits of a little pot of shrimps one sunshiny morning, when a servant entered the room with a pair of kid gloves, and a letter. Knowing as I did the circumstances in which the bride had been so deeply concerned two years before, I started on finding that such a walking automaton as Trollop should have found favour in her sight, while poor Wilderming's portrait hung in her apartment. I had seen it there but a week before. Very well, thought I, such is human nature after all; and, perhaps, if we consider rightly of the matter, it is well for society that human nature is such, and that the fate which divides for ever the fortunes of its members, should have also the power to sunder that fine connecting link between heart and heart which makes either still dependent on the other, though Providence, circumstance, and worldly wisdom, cry out they shall not mingle.

But my philosophy was quite at fault. No such separation had been effected; distance of time and place had "lengthened the chain," but not attenuated or weakened it. Pale, drooping, and agitated, I beheld the neglected and persecuted being, supported by her well-meaning, but rather thick-headed father, and followed by her quite unmeaning and very thick-headed bridegroom, through a vista of glancing favours and smirking lips, and pensive matrons and envious maidens, old and young, into the church. I heard the hoarse tone of despair with which she gaped forth the awful "yes," and I saw the wildered look of utter despondency which she cast on all around her, when the irrevocable ceremony had concluded. Yes, honest peruser, I am aware of the difficulty into which it throws me, but the truth must be told; the ceremony did conclude, and the sweet Racilia of my little fireside romance became—Mrs. Discon Trollop!

Of course as an intimate acquaintance of one of the parties, I was to spend the evening with the wedding party. In compliance with some whim of the old gentleman's, the old fashion of a feast, with music, dancing, &c. at his cottage was agreed upon, and the bridegroom was not to carry away his prize until the next day. I was strolling slowly down one of the wooded lanes leading to the scene of rejoicing, turning over some very fine reflections upon the matter in my mind, when a sun-burnt, dark-haired, black-eyed young man turned quick upon me at a corner and passed my arm; I stared, and looked upon him.

"You are one of the guests," he ran on almost breathless and wild with passion. "I know you—I remember you—your name is—is—no matter—you remember me—bring me into the house—at once—say I am a friend of yours—I am changed—they will not know me—pahaw! don't speak—I want no remonstrances—I am late I know—'tis folly—but I want to see her—I would die to see her—I will see her."

And he was darting off when I caught him by the arm—and (seeing the perfect inutilty of any thing like reasoning) acceded to his request.

The uproarious fun of the evening, for it was quite a meeting after the school of our fathers, was favourable to my honest friend's incognito. Nobody minded any body, and it was with an emotion almost of regret that I perceived the countenance of the bride herself occasionally lighted up with an expression of satisfaction. This, however, disappeared, and gave place to sullen dejection whenever her attention was drawn to her spouse, who, poor insignificant little booby, sat behind the door, looking, to use a very expressive though vulgar illustration, like a figure of 1 on a sheet of paper. You would have thought it a charity to hang him.

Several songs were sung—some merry—some sad—some sentimental—some half wicked—when, at length, a round, rich, and manly tenor took up the key, and gave in a style of exquisite pathos one of the most pathetic airs in Il Taccu, one which I had frequently heard the bride play and sing to her harp, though I knew not at the time that she had to dwell upon the aria. As the singer proceeded, I observed her change colour—and as he concluded the stanza with a thrilling burst of real or illusive grief—

"E dovro sempre vivere
Nel pianto e nel lod!"

She sunk with a gush of tears upon the shoulder of her mother who sat next her. The alarm spread round the room—"the bride is ill," was whispered from lip to lip—the song had concluded—the singer disappeared—but the bride did not recover her composure. The bridegroom stared and wondered. Every body was at fault but the lady and her historian. Her indisposition seemed rather to increase than cease, as the company dropped away—and she felt herself compelled to echo in her mother's ear the delicate request of the unhappy Juliet:

"I pray thee leave me to myself to-night,
For I have need of many orisons,
To move the heavens to smile upon my state,
Which well thou know'st is cross and full of sin."

Poor Trollop had no objection, and Racilia for the last time found herself alone in her apartment. A large wyatt window opened on the lawn, and a vine tree clustered about the frame. It was open. She had been sitting for an hour in a lounging chair drawn close to it, and gazing upon the white light that glanced upon her through the branches, when they were suddenly parted by a man's hand, and an old friend stood before her. I don't know how to account for it, whether it is that there exists a prescience in love—that what we wish, we do not fear—or that a possibility will often take the hue of certainty to an impassioned mind; but it is true enough that although she started, and blushed, and turned pale at this sudden apparition, Racilia did not scream nor even appear greatly amazed. The window was only a few inches from the ground; but one glance from her was sufficient to deter him (I am not sure if he intended it) from entering the room. He stood holding the vine branches in one hand, gazing on her with intense interest, and extending the other towards her. She hung back reproachfully.

You have, no doubt, reader, often admired the art of the actors in our theatres in very difficult situations. When a crisis of a peculiar nature is induced, and a picture formed on the scene which it would be very injurious to the general effect to dispart or break up; in short, when the dramatist has brought his principal characters into a situation so nice that his invention fails him, or certain venerable rules will not allow him to write them out of the dilemma, the aid of the house carpenter is called in; he blows a whistle; two long-legged fellows in red velvet wheel out a couple of scenes, which close on the tableau amid the applause of the admiring audience. As I feel a desire to calculate upon the imagination of my reader in the present instance, perhaps they will suffer me to blow my little whistle, and get over the mere words of the scene that ensued. There was a passionate entreaty—mur-murs of disregarded rites—still more earnest remembrances of holier vows, vowed in the sight of heaven—more solemn—more binding—because the heart and the soul were on the lips that uttered them; all this, and more than mere prose has any business to tell, ended in the eager youth leading the trembling bride forth through the window—down the lane—into a chaise and four—and—where neither have been heard of since. It was a scene for John Fletcher to write, and for one whom I would, if I dared, name to fascinate an audience with.

Poor Trollop was greatly surprised when he found that he had been divorced without his consent. He opened his eyes, shook his head three times, but his noddle was empty. To this day he can make nothing of it.

NEW JOURNALS.

New political and new literary journals are addressed to us from the principal cities of our country, and we perceive that they are recommended to the public in several of the daily prints. Without feeling the least professional jealousy or apprehension, we shall express the opinion, that the utility of them is quite problematical. It is desirable that the patronage of the nation should be confined to the older periodical works, which are sufficiently numerous, and which, if they should be liberally fostered, might be improved to a condition and character far superior to what the new undertakings of the kind are likely to attain. The subdivision of patronage leaves all in a comparatively meagre and inefficient state; the ready, undistinguishing adoption of mere novelty represses zeal, damps resolution, and prevents systematic and comprehensive effort, that looks to durable and increasing success. Incapacity and presumption, too, are thus encouraged; they enter the lists as they would embark in a lottery, knowing that the prizes are not reserved for talents, experience, and knowledge.

A morbid love or habit of expedition is remarked in the Americans; there is likewise an excessive, inconsiderate readiness for novelty. We have observed the prevalence of the latter, in relation even to the shops and trades. Custom is often suddenly withdrawn from superior artisans and old establishments, to be given to new, merely as such; without reflection upon long continued endeavours to please and provide, or upon the capital and hopes invested, or upon all that is due to kind and reciprocal dealings for a considerable period. We would not preclude fair competition, nor discourage improvement; but the abandonment or neglect of what is already good, and would, with enlarged patronage, be better, for what is simply new and unlikely to excel at any time, cannot be commended as just in itself, profitable to the individuals on either side, or beneficial for the country. The tolerance or support of more journals, for instance, than are needed in a community, is a positive evil in various respects. That kind of editorship which the public most wants and ought to covet—educated, sagacious, discriminating, decorous, and in-trepid—cannot be procured or long retained by a small stipend, or a general indifference—a paltry gain or slight interest will satisfy common-place mediocrity or manual industry alone.

Besides, there can be no real independence of the press where patronage is much subdivided, or indiscriminately bestowed, or given, preferably, to mere party-prejudices and designs. The situation of the conductor is too precarious to admit of an unreserved discussion of all questions of national or municipal concern—of the indication of all abuses, and full resistance to all irregular or inordinate schemes or wishes. Several of the most important topics are taboo: it would be in vain for him to reason—the more forcibly and honestly he should argue, the more certainly would he be immolated. No journals are less entitled to be called free than those which acknowledge the epithets administration or opposition; if they do not exist through funds contributed to maintain them in a prescribed or stipulated course of doctrine and action, they studiously minister to the aims of particular men or associations; they push aside truth and right, as they eagerly contend for party objects. We do not hesitate to say, that the only real freedom of the press, at this time, is enjoyed in London and Paris. The editors and writers of the principal papers in those capitals have nothing to fear from individuals or combinations—owing to the peculiar manner in which the papers are spread and paid, their pecuniary interests are safe; they possess all the scope, moral and physical, and all the consideration and authority, which they can require for their purposes; and in them scholarship, information, taste, vigour, style, are indispensable. We might cite, as examples, the London Morning Chronicle and the Paris Journal des Debats; how bold and elevated their tone, how deep and ample their disquisitions, how keen and comprehensive their vigilance and notice! The articles which we copy from time to time from the Chronicle, may be taken as specimens. A similar journal, upon a broad scale, raised above individual or sinister influences, directed to the general good alone, and supplied by competent politicians, critics, and moralists, would be a signal blessing to this country, the value of which could not fail, we think, to be ere long duly appreciated, notwithstanding the clamour, alarm, prejudice, antipathy, calumny, jealousy, which the courage of its strictures, doubts, or investigations, the impartiality of its decisions, the range of its observation, and the general merits of its texture might create during the first months or years of its powerful actions.

In opening just now the National Intelligencer, of Thursday, we find among the toasts given at the late public dinner of the Columbia Typographical Society, the following, by an ex-editor, which coincides with the sentiments we have ventured to express:

"The periodical publications of our country—may we hear less of their freedom, and see more of their independence."

We hear, indeed, of the thing, to satiety; all the changes were rung upon it at this very dinner; but the reality of the case does not warrant the boasts, nor harmonize with the genius of our political institutions.

National Gazette.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Moore's Life of Byron.—Public curiosity is alive to devour this long promised and now forthcoming biography. The intimate relations of friendship subsisting between the author of the Corsair, and his biographer, must invest his sketch of the noble bard with peculiar and thrilling interest, and impart to his opinions and facts an authenticity and character, independently of the inherent attractions of his composition, which could not be hoped for from any other hand. A part of the work has already reached the press of those untiring literary caterers, the Harpers, and the whole will be issued as soon as the remainder arrives. Numerous letters, and occasional original poems of Byron, which have never yet met the eye of the public, and which are reported to be not inferior to his best published productions, will appear in these volumes, and a portrait, engraved from an approved original picture, will give them an additional claim to notice.

The Daily Sentinel.—A prospectus for a new paper under this title, has been lying for some time on our table. Its professed object is to sustain the interests, and promote the moral and general advancement of the mechanic classes. It is to be conducted by Messrs. James G. Brooks, late of the Courier and Enquirer, and Edward V. Sparhawk, formerly of the Morning Herald. Of the propriety or probable success of an additional daily journal, it is impossible for us at this time to express any very decided opinion. Thus much, however, we feel warranted in asserting, that if talent and industry can accomplish its success, the new journal has secured it in the services of the very gifted gentlemen announced as its editors.

The New-York Medical Inquirer.—We have read with attention and with pleasure the first number of this magazine, and conscientiously recommend it to public patronage. A work of this kind cannot but prove useful in every family, for in addition to facts and speculations relating exclusively to medical science, and therefore likely to benefit the professors of that science only, it is the intention of the editors to disseminate in their columns matters of more general interest. To heads of families, and particularly to mothers, it will be found peculiarly valuable; for in it they will find remedies of easy and simple application, for all the ordinary casualties and diseases to which children are subject, and what is of still greater importance, sound advice and sensible suggestions for their mental as well as physical government.

Williams's Annual Register.—We have seen the table of contents of a new work, now in the press, entitled "The New-York Annual Register, for 1830," edited by Edwin Williams, of New-York. This work, which will be condensed into a duodecimo volume of about three hundred pages, and is offered at the moderate price of one dollar bound, will contain a body of statistical and other information relative to this state, constitutions, public officers, attorneys and counsellors, clergy, counties, towns, colleges, academies, banks, and various useful tables of information relative to the government of the United States. It will be issued from the press of Jonathan Leavitt, about the twentieth instant; and should this effort be crowned with success, it will be published annually, with many improvements. Such a work is much wanted.

The possessive case.—Among the numerous violations of grammatical rules, which are every day met with in our public papers, that of the possessive case, in singular words ending with an s, is the most common. For instance, in the prospectus of the New-York Annual Register, now before us, it is printed, "Williams' Register;" whereas, it should be written and spoken "Williams's," in three syllables. So we have seen, "Boreas' breath is rude," instead of "Boreas's;" "a man fit to bear Atlas' burden," instead of "Atlas's," &c., although the same writer would not say "A Scottish lass' breast-knot," but would place an s after the apostrophe. And so they ought in all cases, unless the word be in the plural number, as "Ladies' Gazette," "Misses' Magazine," &c. But even in such instances, errors are often committed: for the above words should always be written in the singular number, whenever they are qualified by a preceding adjective. Thus: "The reading, or the studious Lady's Gazette;" "The fashionable gentleman's shoe-maker;" "The young man's companion;" "The young lady's monitor;" "The industrious mechanic's bank," &c. It is a pity that good grammarians are so careless in this respect; we say careless, because every school-boy knows the rule.

The New York City Dispensary.—This new edifice, lately erected for the accommodation of this very laudable institution, has been completed, and was regularly opened on Monday last. On this interesting occasion the annual report was read, and an appropriate address delivered, by the Rev. Mr. Schroeder, to a highly respectable and gratified audience. We shall advert hereafter to these documents. Of the general merits of this institution and its claims to support, we have repeatedly expressed our opinions in the strongest terms; and we avail ourselves of the present rigorous season, to renew our solicitations in behalf of its claims. The number of persons who obtained relief from it last year was nearly eleven thousand.

Literary premiums.—Elisha J. Roberts, esq., editor of the Craftsman, a very interesting paper published at Rochester, in this state, has offered the following premiums for contributions adapted to his journal:

For the best address to the people of the United States, on the subject of popular commotions, based upon the prevailing excitement in the western district of New-York, and other parts of the Union, embracing historical facts connected with the masonic institution, space unlimited, fifty dollars.—For the best original tale, founded on facts connected with the history of America, forty dollars.—For the second best, twenty dollars.—For the best poem, not exceeding two hundred lines, thirty dollars.—For the second best, fifteen dollars.—A competent committee will decide upon the merits of the various articles offered, and award the premiums.

Offers for the prizes must be made previous to the first day of February, 1830. The successful articles for the first premiums, unless of too great length, will be inserted in the first number of the second volume, which will be published on the second Tuesday in February; and those for the second will follow them in regular succession.

East River Bridge.—We believe the project of building a bridge across the East river has been abandoned. Bridges are beautiful ornaments to cities situated on narrow streams; but to bind the noble East river with one, would be to render a really useful object insignificant; besides, we think a bridge to Boston would be as profitable to the proprietors as a bridge to Brooklyn.

View of the Bowling-green.—The next number of the Mirror will contain this long promised engraving. Our subscribers will find themselves amply compensated by its excellence for the delay which has attended its appearance.

The music.—Will our readers have the kindness to examine the music on the last page? We think we have never before seen any thing in type so perfectly beautiful.

Second verse.

Where soft gales, from beds of flowers,
Fragrant incense bear, love,
Sweet as eastern maiden's breath,
Wilt thou meet me there, love?
Where soft gales,

Liquid notes around us ring,
Rapture to the full heart bring,
Wilt thou meet me there, love?

TO MY BROTHER.

A STRANGE dull weight is on my heart,
A heaviness I cannot quell,
I cannot bid it hence depart;
Whate'er its source, nought can dispel
The deep and utter weariness
Which doth my hopeless heart oppress.
All things upon it fall like lead—
Grief hath no sting and joy no gladness—
Alike to every feeling dead—
To hope or fear, delight or sadness.
'Tis true there is a troubled sense
Of something painful which doth throw
Its gloomy shadow, dark and dense,
O'er all around; but 'tis not woe—
For sorrow's keenly piercing dart
Can never reach again my heart,
And for delight, what now is left
To me of hope or gladness here?
Already is my life bereft
Of all that would have made it dear!
I look around and cannot see
Aught that can bring one pleasant thought,
One thrill of hope or joy to me;
With gloom is each remembrance fraught,

Save one sweet thought—there still is one
Which fate is powerless to destroy—
One thought I yet can dwell upon
With melancholy joy!—
My brother! though my heart is tame
And cold to what 'twas wont to be,
Still to the music of that name
Vibrates one chord, which yet is free
From the benumbing influence
Which hath in torpor wrapped each sense,
The only heart that ever turned
With undiminished love to mine,
Which never my affection spurned,
Which loves me still is thine!
And oh! how sweet to know that yet
In this cold world is beating still
One heart which will not mine forget,
Though darkly rise the clouds of ill!
Nor would I heed the gathering gloom,
Nor at my wayward fate repine,
My brother, had my evil doom
But nought to do with thine:
Alas! and must thou share a fate
So dreary and so desolate?
Yes! even in life's morning, we
Are doomed to see our prospects fade,

To deeply feel the vanity
Of which this world is made.
Already that young lip of thine
Hath caught my own desponding tone—
The dreary lot which must be mine,
Would it were mine alone!—
The spirit's early hopelessness,
The grief which none will soothe or share,
I know that I was born for this,
And this I yet might learn to bear;
But thou, my brother, thou, whose path
A sister's fondness deemed would be Free from the sullen gloom which hath
Long o'er her own formed heavily;
The promise of whose gifted mind
I've marked with all a sister's pride,
Deeming the riches there enshrined,
Would mock thy power to hide;
That yet around thy cherished name
Some future day of pride should see
The fresh and fadeless wreath of fame
Entwined eternally—
Oh, must these dreams be vain, and thou
Be doomed to share so dark a fate,
And thy aspiring spirit bow
And droop beneath misfortune's weight?

Must thou too wear
The sullen light
And see thy days
In bitterness
Ah, no! a sister
A brighter life
Thou shalt see
Whate'er
If bright
Few look
For I am one
Soon dies within the heart
I care not, it is nought to me
So I but live within
When taken
If
From

STANZAS.

I LOOKED on the face of the summer-deck'd earth,
With its gorgeous herbage, its bright-hued flowers;
And it smiled as fair as when first its birth
Mark'd young creation's hours:
But a cloud passed over the sunny sky,
And the wind arose with a wailing cry;
Like a feeble infant's half-uttered moan,
Yet gathering its strength as it speeded on;
Till the trees that lifted their trunks on high,
Like columns supporting the vaulted sky,
Were borne like gossamer by on the blast,
And earth was laid bare as the storm swept past.

I looked on the ocean—each little wave
Leapt gladly up 'neath the sunny ray;
And the music hid in each secret cave
Awoke with its magic lay.
The tempest arose, with its voice of might;
It summoned the waves to a fearful fight.
Like evil spirits the dark clouds came,
Each hurling its red bolt of living flame.
Then wildly to combat the elements rushed,
Till spent with its fury, the tempest was hushed;
Nor left one trace of its madness behind,
Save the throb of the ocean, the wail of the wind.
I turned to look on a nobler sight—
The glorious tablet of manhood's brow
Still marked with the impress of heaven's own light,
Though earth-stained and faded now.
That brow was writhed with its thoughts of pain,
And passion had swollen each starting vein.
More fearful the light of that lurid eye
Than the flashing of swords as they gleam on high;
Till passion, tamed by itself, grew mild,
And the strong man wept like a wayward child.
Oh what is the madness of earth and of seas
To the fearful fury of storms like these:
The tempests of nature at length find rest,
But when sleep the storms of the human breast?

LANTHE.

"VAIN THE WATERS."

Vain the waters roll between us,
Cherished of my soul so long;
Sunny days in bliss have seen us—
Still the silken tie is strong;
Other links are round me twining,
Other lights in love are shining;
But in vain their witchery,
As remembrance circles these.
When the bright moon through yon azure
Tracks her way in pathless light,
When to music's sybil measure
Pleasure wakes the revel night,
Still one thought, in fancy gloaming,
Flutters in the moon's pale beaming,
Or amid that festal glee
In remembrance circles thee.
Never on my path is springing
One fair bloom of summer hours,
But to thee its leaves are flinging
Memory of our childhood's bowers;
Still the red rose there is blushing,
Still the crystal wave is gushing,
And one bliss awakes for me
As remembrance circles thee.

NORNA.

GLORY.

There is a leaf whose life is fed,
Not by the dew of heaven,
Not by the sunlight nourished,
Not by the shades of even;
It springs not by the green-wood tree,
Nor by the valley stream:
Soldier, the leaf is bright for thee,
And for thy spirit's dream;
Soldier, the wreath is twined for thee,
But oft in bitter mockery.
It comes but as the starry light,
Upon the wild and desert gloom;
A sun-beam o'er the midday blight,
To paint yet not to revive its bloom.
What is it that the brow is crown'd
With the fresh green leaf of victory?
What is it that the shield is bound
With the bloom of the olive tree?

'Tis strewing o'er an aching breast,
The mockery of the laurel's green;
With the tell-tale swell of the sensa at rest,
Where the tempest-blast has been.
'Tis placing on a withered stem
The spring-flower's young and opening bloom;
'Tis gathering the mountain gem
To sparkle on the lonely tomb.

HINDA.

GREECE.

Land of the pencil and the lyre,
The marble and the dome!
Whose name is to the muse a fire,
Whose temples are a home:
Clime of a wealth unbought!
Where genius long enshrined
His treasury of thought,
The Peru of the mind!
Land of that forgotten fow:
The breathing rampart-rock
That towered a Pelion to the view,
When burst the battle shock!

Chime of the fair and brave!
When will the tale be o'er,
Of warriors in the grave?
Of maidens in their gore?

Land of the fettered slave!
Thy bonds shall burst asunder—
Freedom is on the wave—
Hark to her echoing thunder!
The red-cross banner gloaming—
And Gallia's white-field streaming—
And the black-eagle screaming—
Sweep o'er th' Aegean sea;
The Moslem horde is shrinking—
The crescent's glory sinking—
And the land of song is free!

LINES TO A LADY,

On hearing her sing "Araby's Daughter," accompanied by the piano.

Once more—that strain once more,
Lady, in thy soft kindness repeat—
Than sleep to wearied nature far more sweet,
When day's stern toils are o'er.

Still midst the ivory keys
Fling thy light fingers in their magic power,
And on my raptured spirit richly shower
Those heaven-caught melodies.

It is a praise to be
The humblest captive to thy hallowed art,
Yielding in child-like gentleness of heart,
All liberty to thee.

Thy voice is like the play
Of evening zephyrs in the summer bowers,
That give a freshness to the sleeping flowers,
Which drooped beneath the day.

Thus when thy passing skill
The hidden depths of harmony reveals,
From my young heart an unknown joyance steals
Each thought of future ill.

The world has then no chain
Can hold the spirit from its joyous flight,
For, springing upward in its native might,
It breaks each link in twain.

Oft in the night's still reign,
Borne on imagination's daring wing,
I've heard the dancing spheres in concert sing,
And thine is like their strain.

Then, lady, sing once more
Thy flying fingers mid the ivory keys,
And still sweet tones of seraph melodies
O'er my rapt spirit pour!

PROTEUS.

CHILDE HAROLD.

He was a dreamer!—on his way
He went—a melancholy man;
Joy's sunbeams round him did not play
After his pilgrimage began;
With kindling thought he passed along,
And darkening sorrow o'er him hung
A gloom that woke his lyre to song,
And woke sad tones its chords among.
Yet he was not a loved one here;
Pleasures and kindred passed away;
He pour'd no sigh—he shed no tear
Above their cold and wasting clay;
He bowed not to the gloomy blast
That gathered round his upright form,
When wind and cloud and tempest past,
Midst the stern glories of the storm.
He bowed not, when the foaming wave
Upheaved his bounding bark beneath;
When the sea oped its yawning grave,
Like the appalling jaws of death;
And when Italia's sunny skies
Bent sweetly o'er his wanderings,
A vacancy was in his eyes,
And sadness on his wild harp strings.
Young hope had flown him—and his cheek
With "cadent tears" and grief was worn,
With sorrows that he would not speak,
Though his heart's finest chords were torn—
Affections crush'd, and deep vows broken,
Had to his wayward lot been given;
And time had stolen each gentle token
That blessed his childhood's cloudless heaven.
These had been his—and on his brow
The shade of deep emotions fell,
As, leaning o'er his vessel's prow,
He mark'd the blue waves rise and swell;
As on his dim and tearful sight
Sad fading in the distant blue,
Albion's pale cliffs, all glimmering white,
Pierced the far haze in glory through.
But now he sleeps—and in that sleep
No tongue may tell what dreams have come!
But fame and grief their vigils keep
Above his last and silent home.
His wandering feet shall press no more
The thorny paths they once have trod;
His fitful pilgrimage is o'er:
Leave the calm sleeper to his God.

EVERARD.

TO THE CRITICS.

Who seeks for spots in Sol, must gaze
Through mediums that obstruct his ray;
So jealous envy's jaundiced eye
Hides beauties, trivial faults to spy.
We own our work has some defects,
'Tis what each candid mind expects;
But has it marks of taste and talents:
In mercy let that strike the balance.

VIEWS IN THE CITY OF NEW-YORK.

THE BOWLING-GREEN.

A RAPID increase of population, the natural consequence of great commercial prosperity, has left but few green spots to cheer the eye amid this artificial wilderness of brick and marble. Of these, the Battery, the Bowling-green, and the Park, are the most conspicuous and ornamental. The peculiar beauties and attractions of the Battery, heightened as they are by local circumstances, are familiar to all our citizens, and daily become a theme of eulogium in the mouth of every stranger, especially of such as approach the city by water; and its history is too intimately connected with that of our revolutionary struggle, to require a single remark. But the modest Bowling-green, (with a view of which the present number of the Mirror is embellished) is involved in somewhat more obscurity, from which it is our present purpose to rescue it; a task in which we feel the more interest, as there is some reason to believe that it will one day become the site of a magnificent national monument, the ornament and pride of that section of the city.

Historians inform us that in the year 1620, king James I. gave the Dutch permission to build some cottages on the banks of the Hudson, for the convenience of their vessels engaged in trade with Brazil; and that, under this licence, they settled a colony, and erected a strong fort on the south-western point of the island Manhattan. This fortress was called Fort Amsterdam, which was indeed the name given by these first settlers to the whole island. But more than half a century afterwards, when the English had by treaty obtained permanent possession of the country, the name of the colony was changed to New-York, in honour of the original patentee, the duke of York, brother to Charles II. Whether the fort was altered, improved, or entirely rebuilt, by the English, we are not informed; but early in the reign of George I. we find a fortress, on the same site, denominated Fort George, within the walls of which was the governor's residence, the secretary's office, and a house of worship, called the King's Chapel; which buildings, together with an extensive range of barracks and stables outside the walls, were all destroyed by fire at the commencement of the celebrated negro plot, in the year 1741.

Fort George, as our readers are probably aware, stood at the lower extremity of Broadway, on a commanding eminence, which has since been levelled; its former site being now partially occupied by a row of handsome brick buildings, south of the Bowling-green, and fronting on State-street. The original position of the south-west bastion of this celebrated citadel was designated, only a few years since, by a marble monument, erected for that purpose, near the center of the Battery promenade. Why a landmark of so much interest to the antiquary and historian has been since removed or destroyed, we are at present unable to say; we only know that "it was, and is not."

In front of the fort was an open field, where the colonial soldiers used to parade, and which, from its proximity to a market, was subsequently denominated "Market Field." Hence the derivation of Marketfield-street, recently and more appropriately changed, by the corporation of this city, to that of Battery-place. This field was first enclosed with a plain pale-fence, of irregular oblong figure; which, lying directly in front of the fort, was any thing but an ornament to the eye of those who approached the governor's mansion within the walls. A part of this field now constitutes the Bowling-green, which derived its appellation from having been appropriated, as a place of amusement, to the game of "bowls," more commonly called "nine-pins."

During the riotous proceedings which took place in almost every part of the country, in opposition to the celebrated stamp-act, this spot was selected by the whigs of New-York for the scene of one of their patriotic achievements. On the first of November, in the year 1765, the day on which the noxious act was to go into operation, a great concourse of people assembled in the evening, proceeded to fort George, took out the governor's carriage, and after drawing it through the principal streets, marched to the Common (the present Park) where a gallows had been previously erected, on which they suspended his effigy, having in his right hand a stamped bill lading, and in his left a figure intended for the devil.

had hung for a considerable time, they carried it, together with the appendages and the gallows, in procession, the carriage preceding, to the gate of the fort, and from thence to the Bowling-green; where, under the very muzzles of the guns of the fort, they burnt the whole, amidst the acclamations of some thousands of spectators. Ten boxes of stamps, which arrived afterwards, were committed to the flames, on the same spot, by the indignant populace.

In the year 1771, the present ellipsis was laid out, and enclosed with an iron railing; which, on regulating the streets, after the revolution, was elevated with its stone foundation, about eighteen inches. The railing is said to have cost eight hundred pounds, or two thousand dollars, which, in those days of simplicity and economy, was no inconsiderable sum. The original design of this enclosure was the protection of an equestrian statue of George III. made of bronze and gilt; which, four days after the declaration of independence, was prostrated by the boisterous patriots of those times. The pediment of Rhode Island marble, with its defaced inscription, remained on the spot until within a few years. This beautiful area is highly susceptible of improvement and embellishment, and must, sooner or later, claim the attention of our corporation to that end. While the royal statue occupied its centre, it was justly considered a great ornament to that part of the city. May we not hope to see the deficiency supplied by an equestrian statue of the father and saviour of his country?

In the view which accompanies this number of the Mirror, is included part of Broadway, on the right, and the buildings, before alluded to, on the left. Between these is seen a small section of the Battery and a bird's-eye glimpse of the bay in the distance. We think it will be acknowledged a faithful delineation, and highly ornamental to the present volume.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE SCEPTIC—AN OLD MAN'S STORY.

THE first time I ever met Charles Annesley was on the day that I first entered a public school. He was just of my age, and I still recollect the envy with which I looked upon his fine countenance and well-knit frame, as contrasted with my own delicate and sickly appearance. He was, like myself, the only son of a widow; but, while I was the spoiled and petted heir to a princely fortune, he was entirely dependent upon the labour of his mother, who, by the most unremitting exertions, could procure for him that education which she was so proud to bestow. Though differing so widely in fortune, and still more in character, (for Charles was gifted with intellect of the highest order,) yet we soon became intimate friends. The natural propensity which ever induces the strong to tyrannize over the weak, rendered a protector necessary to one who, like myself, had been an invalid from childhood, and that protector I found in Charles Annesley; while the ambition which I felt to distinguish myself for mental, since I could not for corporeal, endowments, enabled me to keep pace with him in our various studies. He was one of those frank and joyous beings who seem to shed the sunshine of their own spirits upon every surrounding object, and to live in an atmosphere of perpetual enjoyment. Full of high-toned and honourable feeling, the idea of a base or mean action never entered his thoughts, and he looked forward with undoubting hope to the day which would enable him to repay, with something more than gratitude, the exertions of his inestimable mother. Such was Charles Annesley, as I then knew him. But the years of our boyhood soon passed away, and we entered the world by such different paths that it was no longer possible to continue our intimacy. Charles retired to a distant part of the country, where his profession might enable him to procure a subsistence, while I sought, in the more genial climes of France and Italy, to gain that health which had been denied me from my cradle. Separated so widely, it was impossible to communicate with each other even by letter, and we soon became strangers.

It was not until after a lapse of ten years that I again beheld my old school-fellow, during which time I had visited most of the countries of Europe, and finally taken up my abode in London. One day I had just completed my toilet, and was preparing for a morning lounge, when my servant announced Mr. Annesley. I started at the name; but had it not been for the warm pressure of the hand and the exclamation, "Edward, have you forgotten your friend Charles?" I should never have known it. He was mutual; for it was as difficult for him to recognize me, in my thin and pale visage of the sickly student, as it was for me to identify the attenuated figure and sharpened features of the person whom I now beheld, with the healthful and joyous being whom I had known and loved in early years. Our interview was long and interesting. I had been a wanderer by sea and land, and I gave Charles a full and frank detail of my adventures; but when it became his turn to narrate, I observed an evident embarrassment, and an apparent wish to avoid minute investigation. In a very hurried manner he told me that soon after his settlement in ———, he had married; that his children had all died in infancy, and that he had now visited England to take possession of a large fortune, bequeathed to his wife by a long-forgotten uncle, who had been a flourishing London tradesman.

"But your good mother, Charles," said I, "where is she?"

An indefinable expression of anguish dwelt for a moment upon his features as he replied,

"She is dead!"

"Alas!" said I, "she should have lived to witness your prosperity; to reap the reward of her more than maternal affection."

He started up, his countenance filled with an almost maniacal expression of horror and agony; but restored to himself by my look of astonishment, he said,

"Pardon me, Edward, there are circumstances connected with the death of my mother upon which I dare not dwell; and any allusion to the subject almost drives me to madness."

He extended his hand, I pressed it warmly; for I respected even the extravagance of filial grief; and soon after we parted.

The next evening I visited him by appointment. I was extremely anxious to behold his wife—the elegant, the gifted, the intellectual woman, who alone (as I supposed,) could have won the heart of my fastidious friend; and it was with no small degree of disappointment, therefore, that I looked upon the lady to whom he now presented me. She possessed a face of infantine beauty, manners of infantine simplicity, and, as I soon found, a mind of infantine weakness. Her attire was exceedingly rich; but I could not avoid thinking that she looked very like a child which had been "dressed up for company" and told to "sit still and behave prettily," for she was continually smoothing the folds of her silk dress, tightening the clasps of her bracelets, playing with her rings, and showing off all those awkward little airs which, to a practised eye, so soon betray the "uninitiated of fashion."

During the course of a long evening, I had still more reason to wonder at my friend's choice. Her intellect was evidently of the lowest order; it was impossible to find any subject which might come within the limited range of her ideas, and at last, in utter despair of making any remark suited to her incapacity, I asked whether she had yet visited any of the churches of the metropolis?

"O no," was her reply, "we never think of going to such places; since Charles joined the deists, as my father calls them, we have never been to church."

"The deists!" exclaimed I, involuntarily.

"Yes," said she, "that is the name which prejudiced people have given them, but their true name is 'freethinkers.' I can tell you, Charles is a great man among them; he is one of their best lecturers, and"—

A look of scarce-suppressed rage, from Charles, suddenly silenced her voluble communications; she hung her head like a faulty child, and, retreating to a corner of the room, could not again be induced to join in the conversation.

When I left them, and had leisure to reflect on all that had passed; on the vague hints thrown out by Charles; on the information afforded me by his wife respecting the change in his principles, and on the horror evinced by him when I alluded to his mother, I could not avoid believing that some fearful secret was preying on his heart. The more frequently I saw him, the more strongly I was confirmed in this belief. Some times he was exceedingly moody and melancholy, at others, full of reckless and extravagant gaiety; and I soon found that the greater part of his time was consumed in the wildest dissipation. In vain I exerted all the privileges of friendship; in vain remonstrated and reasoned; he at length told me, and never shall I forget his countenance then, that he was a confirmed sceptic.

"For," said he, grinding his teeth as if in agony, "I should go mad if I were convinced that I am in error."

Shortly after this he left London, and all communication between us again ceased. By accident I learned that Charles Annesley stood foremost in the ranks of the profligate of Paris, and was especially noted for his connexion with a set of men who had established what they termed "a school of philosophy." Of this new sect Charles was the chief, the modern Epicurus; nor was there wanting a Leontium in the person of the beautiful but depraved Madame Zulani, who had long figured as an actress on the Parisian stage.

About six years after our last meeting, as I was one day passing by one of the courts of justice, I observed a great crowd collected about the door; and what particularly struck me was the number of well-dressed and genteel-looking persons who mingled with it. Impelled by curiosity, I pushed my way through the throng, and entered the court. The case was one of life and death. The prisoner, according to the evidence given, had quarrelled with his more fortunate antagonist at the gambling-table, and in a fit of passion, stabbed him with a small dirk which he wore concealed in his bosom. Though the murder had been committed from the momentary impulse of passion, yet the previous bad character of the prisoner, whom they addressed by the name of William Annesley, and the fact of his wearing a concealed weapon, were circumstances that went very far towards convicting him. After a long and patient investigation, the jury pronounced him guilty of murder. The criminal had hitherto sat with his face buried in his hands, and his whole figure concealed by a loose great-coat; but when he heard the words "guilty of murder," he started up, and in a low, deep voice, which was distinctly heard by every one present, and seemed to pervade every corner of the room, exclaimed "murder!" then sinking back into his former position, seemed as motionless as if turned to stone. The transient glance which I obtained of his figure, thrilled me with horror; for I could scarcely avoid believing that in the miserable being who now appeared to answer for the life of a fellow-creature, I beheld my misguided friend. But when, on being asked what he had to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon him, he arose; and, drawing up his tall figure to its full height, looked with unquailing eye on the face of the judge, as he replied, "Nothing—I am guilty of murder!"—then I could no longer doubt that I beheld the wretched Charles Annesley. I stood as if spell-bound, while the judge put on the fatal cap, and commenced the sentence which was to doom him to an ignominious death; but my heart grew sick, my brain reeled, and scarcely conscious of what I did, I hurried from the court.

Early next morning I was at the prison. Charles instantly recognised me; but it was long before I could induce him to lay aside his sullen moodiness and look on me still as a friend. Even after I had somewhat conquered his reserve, he still remained silent with regard to every thing connected with himself, and during the succeeding days, though he knew me to be striving to obtain his pardon, he never betrayed the least interest, or evinced the least anxiety as to the result. At length it was hinted to me that he would be pardoned; but that, in order to inflict something approaching to an adequate punishment, his pardon would be granted only at the foot of the gallows. To this information was added an injunction against affording the slightest hope to the criminal; and with these terms I was compelled to remain satisfied. During all this time Charles had appeared absorbed in thought and utterly regardless of what was passing, and it was not until the night before the day appointed for his execution that he thus addressed me:

"You have expressed much anxiety, my dear Edward, to become acquainted with the events of my life, and I would not willingly repay your kindness with ingratitude; but my time is short, and I must be brief."

He then told me of many apparently unimportant circumstances which had led to the change in his principles; and as I listened to the detail of the trivial occurrences which had produced so awful a result; as I traced the first errings of one whose "heart was formed for virtue, warped to wrong," I felt more strongly, than I had ever done before, the imperative duty of checking the slightest deviation from the path of rectitude. Alas! how can the first leanings towards error fail of being fatal to such natures as ours, where

"Right and wrong so close resemble,
That what we take for virtue's thrill
Is often the first downward tremble
Of the heart's balance into ill."

Like all new converts, Charles had been desirous of making proselytes; and his wife and mother appeared to him the fittest subjects for his experiment. The weak-minded creature whose beauty had awakened his passion, and whose ignorance and simplicity had seemed to him her surest safeguards, soon became the willing disciple of her husband's convenient doctrine; but with his mother he found more difficulty. She was a woman of strong mind, and under any other circumstances, would probably never have yielded up her faith; but Charles was her idol; and how could she oppose his fine-sounding reasons, his unanswerable arguments, especially when aided by his earnest and affectionate eloquence?

Till the trees that lifted their trunks on high,
Like columns supporting the vaulted sky,
Were borne like gossamer by on the blast,
And earth was laid bare as the storm swept past.

I looked on the ocean—each little wave
Leapt gladly up 'neath the sunny ray;
And the music hid in each secret cave
Awoke with its magic lay.
The tempest arose, with its voice of might;
It summoned the waves to a fearful fight.
Like evil spirits the dark clouds came,
Each hurling its red bolt of living flame.
Then wildly to combat the elements rushed,
Till spent with its fury, the tempest was hushed;
Nor left one trace of its madness behind,
Save the throb of the ocean, the wail of the wind.

I turned to look on a nobler sight—
The glorious tablet of manhood's brow
Still marked with the impress of heaven's own light,
Though earth-stained and faded now.
That brow was writhed with its thoughts of pain,
And passion had swollen each starting vein.
More fearful the light of that lurid eye
Than the flashing of swords as they gleam on high;
Till passion, tamed by itself, grew mild,
And the strong man wept like a wayward child.
Oh what is the madness of earth and of seas
To the fearful fury of storms like these:
The tempests of nature at length find rest,
But when sleep the storms of the human breast?

LANTHE.

"VAIN THE WATERS."

Vain the waters roll between us,
Cherished of my soul so long;
Sunny days in bliss have seen us—
Still the silken tie is strong:
Other links are round me twining,
Other lights in love are shining;
But in vain their witchery,
As remembrance circles thee.

When the bright moon through yon azure
Tracks her way in pathless light,
When to music's sybil measure
Pleasure wakes the revel night,
Still one thought, in fancy gleaming,
Flutters in the moon's pale beaming,
Or amid that festal glee
In remembrance circles thee.

Never on my path is springing
One fair bloom of summer hours,
But to thee its leaves are flinging
Memory of our childhood's bowers:
Still the red rose there is blushing,
Still the crystal wave is gushing,
And one bliss awakes for me
As remembrance circles thee.

NORNA.

GLORY.

There is a leaf whose life is fed,
Not by the dews of heaven,
Not by the sunlight nourished,
Not by the shades of even;
It springs not by the green-wood tree,
Nor by the valley stream:
Soldier, the leaf is bright for thee,
And for thy spirit's dream;
Soldier, the wreath is twined for thee,
But oft in bitter mockery.

It comes but as the starry light,
Upon the wild and desert gloom;
A sun-beam o'er the mildew-bligh,
To paint yet not revive its bloom.
What is it that the brow is crown'd
With the fresh green leaf of victory?
What is it that the shield is bound
With the bloom of the olive tree?

'Tis strewn o'er an aching breast,
The mockery of the laurel's green;
With the tell-tale swell of the seas at rest,
Where the tempest-blast has been.
'Tis placing on a withered stem
The spring-flower's young and opening bloom;
'Tis gathering the mountain gem
To sparkle on the lonely tomb.

HINDA.

GREECE.

Land of the pencil and the lyre,
The marble and the dome!
Whose name is to the muse a fire,
Whose temples are a home
Clime of a wealth unbought!
Where genius long enshrined
His treasury of thought,
The Peru of the mind!

Land of that unforgotten few!
The breathing rampart-rock
That towered a Pelion to the view,
When burst the battle-shock!

Clime of the fair and brave!
When will the tale be o'er,
Of warriors in the grave?
Of maidens in their gore?

Land of the fettered slave!
Thy bonds shall burst asunder—
Freedom is on the wave,
Hark to her echoing thunder!
The red-cross banner gleaming—
And Gallia's white-field streaming—
And the black-eagle screaming—
Sweep o'er the Aegean sea;
The Moslem horde is shrinking—
The crescent's glory sinking—
And the land of song is free!

LINES TO A LADY,

On hearing her sing "Araby's Daughter," accompanied by the piano.

Once more—that strain once more,
Lady, in thy soft kindness repeat—
Than sleep to wearied nature far more sweet,
When day's stern toils are o'er.

Still midst the ivory keys
Fling thy light fingers in their magic power,
And on my raptured spirit richly shower
Those heaven-caught melodies.

It is a praise to be
The humblest captive to thy hallowed art,
Yielding in child-like gentleness of heart,
All liberty to thee.

Thy voice is like the play
Of evening zephyrs in the summer bowers,
That give a freshness to the sleeping flowers,
Which drooped beneath the day:

Thus when thy passing skill
The hidden depths of harmony reveals,
From my young heart an unknown joyance steals
Each thought of future ill.

The world has then no chain
Can hold the spirit from its joyous flight,
For, springing upward in its native might,
It breaks each link in twain.

Oft in the night's still reign,
Borne on imagination's daring wing,
I've heard the dancing spheres in concert sing,
And thine is like their strain.

Then, lady, fling once more
Thy flying fingers mid the ivory keys,
And still sweet tones of seraph melodies
O'er my rapt spirit pour!

PROTEUS.

CHILDE HAROLD.

He was a dreamer!—on his way
He went—a melancholy man;
Joy's sunbeams round him did not play
After his pilgrimage began;
With kindling thought he paced along,
And darkening sorrow o'er him flung
A gloom that woke his lyre to song,
And woke sad tones its chords among.

Yet he was not a loved one here;
Pleasures and kindred passed away;
He pour'd no sigh—he shed no tear
Above their cold and wasting clay;
He bowed not to the gloomy blast
That gathered round his upright form,

When wind and cloud and tempest past,
Midst the stern glories of the storm.
He bowed not, when the foaming wave
Upheaved his bounding bark beneath;

When the sea oped its yawning grave,
Like the appalling jaws of death;
And when Italia's sunny skies
Bent sweetly o'er his wanderings,

A vacancy was in his eyes,
And sadness on his wild harp strings.
Young hope had flown him—and his cheek
With "caden's tears" and grief was worn,

With sorrows that he would not speak,
Though his heart's finest chords were torn—
Affections crush'd, and deep vows broken,
Had to his wayward lot been given;

And time had stolen each gentle token
That blessed his childhood's cloudless heaven.
These had been his—and on his brow
The shade of deep emotions fell,

As, leaning o'er his vessel's prow,
He mark'd the blue waves rise and swell;
As on his dim and tearful sight
Sad fading in the distant blue,

Albion's pale cliffs, all glimmering white,
Pierced the far haze in glory through.

But now he sleeps—and in that sleep
No tongue may tell what dreams have come!
But fame and grief their vigils keep
Above his last and silent home.

His wandering feet shall press no more
The thorny paths they once have trod;
His fitful pilgrimage is o'er:
Leave the calm sleeper to his God.

EVERARD.

TO THE CRITICS.

Who seeks for spots in Sol, must gaze
Through mediums that obstruct his rays;
So jealous envy's jaundiced eye
Hides beauties, trivial faults to spy.
We own our work has some defects,
'Tis what each candid mind expects;
But has it marks of taste and talents:
In mercy let that strike the balance.

VIEWS IN THE CITY OF NEW-YORK.

THE BOWLING-GREEN.

A RAPID increase of population, the natural consequence of great commercial prosperity, has left but few green spots to cheer the eye amid this artificial wilderness of brick and marble. Of these, the Battery, the Bowling-green, and the Park, are the most conspicuous and ornamental. The peculiar beauties and attractions of the Battery, heightened as they are by local circumstances, are familiar to all our citizens, and daily become a theme of eulogium in the mouth of every stranger, especially of such as approach the city by water; and its history is too intimately connected with that of our revolutionary struggle, to require a single remark. But the modest Bowling-green, (with a view of which the present number of the Mirror is embellished) is involved in somewhat more obscurity, from which it is our present purpose to rescue it; a task in which we feel the more interest, as there is some reason to believe that it will one day become the site of a magnificent national monument, the ornament and pride of that section of the city.

Historians inform us that in the year 1620, king James I. gave the Dutch permission to build some cottages on the banks of the Hudson, for the convenience of their vessels engaged in trade with Brazil; and that, under this licence, they settled a colony, and erected a strong fort on the south-western point of the island Manhattan. This fortress was called Fort Amsterdam, which was indeed the name given by these first settlers to the whole island. But more than half a century afterwards, when the English had by treaty obtained permanent possession of the country, the name of the colony was changed to New-York, in honour of the original patentee, the duke of York, brother to Charles II. Whether the fort was altered, improved, or entirely rebuilt, by the English, we are not informed; but early in the reign of George I. we find a fortress, on the same site, denominated Fort George, within the walls of which was the governor's residence, the secretary's office, and a house of worship, called the King's Chapel; which buildings, together with an extensive range of barracks and stables outside the walls, were all destroyed by fire at the commencement of the celebrated negro plot, in the year 1741.

Fort George, as our readers are probably aware, stood at the lower extremity of Broadway, on a commanding eminence, which has since been levelled; its former site being now partially occupied by a row of handsome brick buildings, south of the Bowling-green, and fronting on State-street. The original position of the south-west bastion of this celebrated citadel was designated, only a few years since, by a marble monument, erected for that purpose, near the center of the Battery promenade. Why a landmark of so much interest to the antiquary and historian has been since removed or destroyed, we are at present unable to say; we only know that "it was, and is not."

In front of the fort was an open field, where the colonial soldiers used to parade, and which, from its proximity to a market, was subsequently denominated "Market Field." Hence the derivation of Marketfield-street, recently and more appropriately changed, by the corporation of this city, to that of Battery-place. This field was first enclosed with a plain pale-fence, of irregular oblong figure; which, lying directly in front of the fort, was any thing but an ornament to the eye of those who approached the governor's mansion within the walls. A part of this field now constitutes the Bowling-green, which derived its appellation from having been appropriated, as a place of amusement, to the game of "bowls," more commonly called "nine-pins."

During the riotous proceedings which took place in almost every part of the country, in opposition to the celebrated stamp-act, this spot was selected by the whigs of New-York for the scene of one of their patriotic achievements. On the first of November, in the year 1765, the day on which the noxious act was to go into operation, a great concourse of people assembled in the evening, proceeded to fort George, took out the governor's carriage, and after drawing it through the principal streets, marched to the Common (the present Park) where a gallows had been previously erected, on which they suspended his effigy, having in his right hand a stamped bill of lading, and in his left a figure intended for the devil. After it had hung for a considerable time, they carried it, together with the appendages and the gallows, in procession, the carriage preceding, to the gate of the fort, and from thence to the Bowling-green; where, under the very muzzles of the guns of the fort, they burnt the whole, amidst the acclamations of some thousands of spectators. Ten boxes of stamps, which arrived afterwards, were committed to the flames, on the same spot, by the indignant populace.

In the year 1771, the present ellipsis was laid out, and enclosed with an iron railing; which, on regulating the streets, after the revolution, was elevated with its stone foundation, about eighteen inches. The railing is said to have cost eight hundred pounds, or two thousand dollars, which, in those days of simplicity and economy, was no inconsiderable sum. The original design of this enclosure was the protection of an equestrian statue of George III. made of bronze and gilt; which, four days after the declaration of independence, was prostrated by the boisterous patriots of those times. The pediment of Rhode Island marble, with its defaced inscription, remained on the spot until within a few years. This beautiful area is highly susceptible of improvement and embellishment, and must, sooner or later, claim the attention of our corporation to that end. While the royal statue occupied its centre, it was justly considered a great ornament to that part of the city. May we not hope to see the deficiency supplied by an equestrian statue of the father and saviour of his country?

In the view which accompanies this number of the Mirror, is included part of Broadway, on the right, and the buildings, before alluded to, on the left. Between these is seen a small section of the Battery and a bird's-eye glimpse of the bay in the distance. We think it will be acknowledged a faithful delineation, and highly ornamental to the present volume.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE SCEPTIC—AN OLD MAN'S STORY.

THE first time I ever met Charles Annesley was on the day that I first entered a public school. He was just of my age, and I still recollect the envy with which I looked upon his fine countenance and well-knit frame, as contrasted with my own delicate and sickly appearance. He was, like myself, the only son of a widow; but, while I was the spoiled and petted heir to a princely fortune, he was entirely dependent upon the labour of his mother, who, by the most unremitting exertions, could procure for him that education which she was so proud to bestow. Though differing so widely in fortune, and still more in character, (for Charles was gifted with intellect of the highest order,) yet we soon became intimate friends. The natural propensity which ever induces the strong to tyrannize over the weak, rendered a protector necessary to one who, like myself, had been an invalid from childhood, and that protector I found in Charles Annesley; while the ambition which I felt to distinguish myself for mental, since I could not for corporeal, endowments, enabled me to keep pace with him in our various studies. He was one of those frank and joyous beings who seem to shed the sunshine of their own spirits upon every surrounding object, and to live in an atmosphere of perpetual enjoyment. Full of high-toned and honourable feeling, the idea of a base or mean action never entered his thoughts, and he looked forward with undoubting hope to the day which would enable him to repay, with something more than gratitude, the exertions of his inestimable mother. Such was Charles Annesley, as I then knew him. But the years of our boyhood soon passed away, and we entered the world by such different paths that it was no longer possible to continue our intimacy. Charles retired to a distant part of the country, where his profession might enable him to procure a subsistence, while I sought, in the more genial climes of France and Italy, to gain that health which had been denied me from my cradle. Separated so widely, it was impossible to communicate with each other even by letter, and we soon became strangers.

It was not until after a lapse of ten years that I again beheld my old school-fellow, during which time I had visited most of the countries of Europe, and finally taken up my abode in London. One day I had just completed my toilet, and was preparing for a morning lounge, when my servant announced Mr. Annesley. I started at the name; but had it not been for the warm pressure of the hand and the exclamation, "Edward, have you forgotten your old friend Charles?" I should never have known him. Our surprise was mutual; for it was as difficult for him to recognise the slight frame and pale visage of the sickly boy in the robust form and bronzed cheek of the man who now stood before him, as it was for me to identify the attenuated figure and sharpened features of the person whom I now beheld, with the healthful and joyous being whom I had known and loved in early years. Our interview was long and interesting. I had been a wanderer by sea and land, and I gave Charles a full and frank detail of my adventures; but when it became his turn to narrate, I observed an evident embarrassment, and an apparent wish to avoid minute investigation. In a very hurried manner he told me that soon after his settlement in —, he had married; that his children had all died in infancy, and that he had now visited England to take possession of a large fortune, bequeathed to his wife by a long-forgotten uncle, who had been a flourishing London tradesman.

"But your good mother, Charles," said I, "where is she?"

An indefinable expression of anguish dwelt for a moment upon his features as he replied,

"She is dead!"

"Alas!" said I, "she should have lived to witness your prosperity; to reap the reward of her more than maternal affection."

He started up, his countenance filled with an almost maniacal expression of horror and agony; but restored to himself by my look of astonishment, he said,

"Pardon me, Edward, there are circumstances connected with the death of my mother upon which I dare not dwell; and any allusion to the subject almost drives me to madness."

He extended his hand, I pressed it warmly; for I respected even the extravagance of filial grief; and soon after we parted.

The next evening I visited him by appointment. I was extremely anxious to behold his wife—the elegant, the gifted, the intellectual woman, who alone (as I supposed,) could have won the heart of my fastidious friend; and it was with no small degree of disappointment, therefore, that I looked upon the lady to whom he now presented me. She possessed a face of infantine beauty, manners of infantine simplicity, and, as I soon found, a mind of infantine weakness. Her attire was exceedingly rich; but I could not avoid thinking that she looked very like a child which had been "dressed up for company" and told to "sit still and behave prettily," for she was continually smoothing the folds of her silk dress, tightening the clasps of her bracelets, playing with her rings, and showing off all those awkward little airs which, to a practised eye, so soon betray the "uninitiated of fashion."

During the course of a long evening, I had still more reason to wonder at my friend's choice. Her intellect was evidently of the lowest order; it was impossible to find any subject which might come within the limited range of her ideas, and at last, in utter despair of making any remark suited to her incapacity, I asked whether she had yet visited any of the churches of the metropolis?

"O no," was her reply, "we never think of going to such places; since Charles joined the deists, as my father calls them, we have never been to church."

"The deists!" exclaimed I, involuntarily.

"Yes," said she, "that is the name which prejudiced people have given them, but their true name is 'freethinkers.' I can tell you, Charles is a great man among them; he is one of their best lecturers, and"—

A look of scarce-suppressed rage, from Charles, suddenly silenced her voluble communications; she hung her head like a faulty child, and, retreating to a corner of the room, could not again be induced to join in the conversation.

When I left them, and had leisure to reflect on all that had passed; on the vague hints thrown out by Charles; on the information afforded me by his wife respecting the change in his principles, and on the horror evinced by him when I alluded to his mother, I could not avoid believing that some fearful secret was preying on his heart. The more frequently I saw him, the more strongly I was confirmed in this belief. Some times he was exceedingly moody and melancholy, at others, full of reckless and extravagant gaiety; and I soon found that the greater part of his time was consumed in the wildest dissipation. In vain I exerted all the privileges of friendship; in vain remonstrated and reasoned; he at length told me, and never shall I forget his countenance then, that he was a confirmed sceptic.

"For," said he, grinding his teeth as if in agony, "I should go mad if I were convinced that I am in error."

Shortly after this he left London, and all communication between us again ceased. By accident I learned that Charles Annesley stood foremost in the ranks of the profligate of Paris, and was especially noted for his connexion with a set of men who had established what they termed "a school of philosophy." Of this new sect Charles was the chief, the modern Epicurus; nor was there wanting a Leontium in the person of the beautiful but depraved Madame Zulani, who had long figured as an actress on the Parisian stage.

About six years after our last meeting, as I was one day passing by one of the courts of justice, I observed a great crowd collected about the door; and what particularly struck me was the number of well-dressed and genteel-looking persons who mingled with it. Impelled by curiosity, I pushed my way through the throng, and entered the court. The case was one of life and death. The prisoner, according to the evidence given, had quarrelled with his more fortunate antagonist at the gambling-table, and in a fit of passion, stabbed him with a small dirk which he wore concealed in his bosom. Though the murder had been committed from the momentary impulse of passion, yet the previous bad character of the prisoner, whom they addressed by the name of William Annesley, and the fact of his wearing a concealed weapon, were circumstances that went very far towards convicting him. After a long and patient investigation, the jury pronounced him guilty of murder. The criminal had hitherto sat with his face buried in his hands, and his whole figure concealed by a loose great-coat; but when he heard the words "guilty of murder," he started up, and in a low, deep voice, which was distinctly heard by every one present, and seemed to pervade every corner of the room, exclaimed "murder!" then sinking back into his former position, seemed as motionless as if turned to stone. The transient glance which I obtained of his figure, thrilled me with horror; for I could scarcely avoid believing that in the miserable being who now appeared to answer for the life of a fellow-creature, I beheld my misguided friend. But when, on being asked what he had to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon him, he arose; and, drawing up his tall figure to its full height, looked with unquailing eye on the face of the judge, as he replied, "Nothing—I am guilty of murder!"—then I could no longer doubt that I beheld the wretched Charles Annesley. I stood as if spell-bound, while the judge put on the fatal cap, and commenced the sentence which was to doom him to an ignominious death; but my heart grew sick, my brain reeled, and scarcely conscious of what I did, I hurried from the court.

Early next morning I was at the prison. Charles instantly recognised me; but it was long before I could induce him to lay aside his sullen moodiness and look on me still as a friend. Even after I had somewhat conquered his reserve, he still remained silent with regard to every thing connected with himself, and during the succeeding days, though he knew me to be striving to obtain his pardon, he never betrayed the least interest, or evinced the least anxiety as to the result. At length it was hinted to me that he would be pardoned; but that, in order to inflict something approaching to an adequate punishment, his pardon would be granted only at the foot of the gallows. To this information was added an injunction against affording the slightest hope to the criminal; and with these terms I was compelled to remain satisfied. During all this time Charles had appeared absorbed in thought and utterly regardless of what was passing, and it was not until the night before the day appointed for his execution that he thus addressed me:

"You have expressed much anxiety, my dear Edward, to become acquainted with the events of my life, and I would not willingly repay your kindness with ingratitude; but my time is short, and I must be brief."

He then told me of many apparently unimportant circumstances which had led to the change in his principles; and as I listened to the detail of the trivial occurrences which had produced so awful a result; as I traced the first errings of one whose "heart was formed for virtue, warped to wrong," I felt more strongly, than I had ever done before, the imperative duty of checking the slightest deviation from the path of rectitude. Alas! how can the first leanings towards error fail of being fatal to such natures as ours, where

"Right and wrong so close resemble,
That what we take for virtue's thrill
Is often the first downward tremble
Of the heart's balance into ill."

Like all new converts, Charles had been desirous of making proselytes; and his wife and mother appeared to him the fittest subjects for his experiment. The weak-minded creature whose beauty had awakened his passion, and whose ignorance and simplicity had seemed to him her surest safeguards, soon became the willing disciple of her husband's convenient doctrine; but with his mother he found more difficulty. She was a woman of strong mind, and under any other circumstances, would probably never have yielded up her faith; but Charles was her idol; and how could she oppose his fine-sounding reasons, his unanswerable arguments, especially when aided by his earnest and affectionate eloquence?

"My wife," continued Charles, "is now the guilty companion of my French valet; but, my mother—how can I tell you the horrible tale!"

He turned away, and his frame shook as with a strong convulsion; then, by that almost fearful self-command which he could so well exert, he recovered himself, and I recognised the same low deep voice which had thrilled me with horror in the court-room as he resumed,

"My mother became like myself a sceptic; but she had many terrible misgivings of conscience, and these so agitated her feeble frame, that she was soon laid upon her dying bed. Then began my punishment. Hour after hour she lay moaning and writhing in mental agony; and though she uttered not a word of reproach, yet well could I understand the looks which she constantly turned upon me. One night after the most frightful agitation, she had fallen into a deep sleep; I stood gazing on her, for a sort of fascination seemed to chain me to her bed-side, when I beheld a fearful change come over her face; terrible convulsions shook her frame, and she again lay apparently exhausted. Some person spoke to me; I answered I know not what; but the sound of my voice aroused her; she opened her eyes wildly, and with almost supernatural strength started up, and shrieking, 'Charles, give me back my hope of heaven!' flung herself frantically forward and fell upon my bosom in the agonies of death! They tried to loosen her hand from my neck; but the stiffening fingers held me with a death-grip—the dead face lay like a mountain on my breast—O God! that I could but forget that moment!"

He dashed himself on the floor of the cell, writhing like a crushed worm as he cried out, in a voice of agony,

"My mother! you have made me an outcast on the face of the earth—that dying cry I have never ceased to hear—eternity—oh, can there be an eternity? must I listen to that awful cry through countless ages?"

Exhausted by his anguish, he fell in utter senselessness, and summoning the jailer to his assistance, I left him; for my own heart was too horror-stricken to offer consolation.

The next day had been fixed upon for the execution. Determined not to witness his degradation, I had concerted with one of the principal officers that after the farce of a pretended punishment was over, Charles should be conducted to his residence where I would meet him and provide for his departure from the country. At an early hour I was at the officer's house, but the appointed time passed by and they came not. At length, about two hours later, I heard a bustle in the street; but I remarked that there were no outcries, no shouts, such as are usually heard in a London mob. Fearful of beholding the ignominy of my misguided friend, I remained fixed to my seat, not daring even to turn my eyes towards the window, when I heard a great hurrying to and fro, and directly heavy steps ascended the stairs. I listened with almost breathless anxiety—the door opened and two men entered bearing the lifeless body of my friend. The shock was too great, and I sunk fainting on the floor. When I recovered I learned that he had been brought to the gallows, had ascended the scaffold, the fatal cord was adjusted, and the crowd were hushed in awful silence awaiting the final ceremony when the pardon was suddenly produced—but it was too late! He was yet unsullied by the touch of the executioner, but the springs of life had been too rudely jarred—the retribution of heaven had been more speedy than the justice of man; and a lifeless corpse was all that remained of the gay, the gifted, the misguided Charles Annesley.

FRIDAY.

ALTHOUGH the idea of Friday being an unlucky day, is supported by respectable authority, both among the ancients and moderns, we still feel inclined to be a little sceptical on the subject. It is true that we read of a monarch and a warrior, who would never commence any enterprise of importance on a Friday, or on the thirteenth of January, which he considered equally unfortunate. But a fortunate friend of ours was born on Friday, the thirteenth of January; and one of the most auspicious events of his life had its origin on a Friday. But we have still stronger reasons for our infidelity as respects this proverb. The first human being was created on Friday, or the sixth day of the week. Whether his unlucky helpmate was created on the same day, we are not positively informed; but it may be reasonably inferred from the assertion that immediately follows, "male and female created he them." A double portion of manna was given on Friday to the Hebrew pilgrims, while they sojourned in the wilderness; and whoever has seen West's celebrated picture, will acknowledge that the whole human race were once infinitely benefited on a Friday. Why, then, should the sixth day of the week be stigmatized as unlucky? The day on which man was created, and the day also, on which he was redeemed? The present year commenced on Friday, and may it prove a prosperous and happy one to all the readers of this paragraph.

THE ÆOLIAN HARP.

"The sweetest spirit of a lovely sound."—Byron.

Harp of the winds of heaven!
Fanned by their thousand wings,
What spirit's breath is kissing now
Thy faintly murmuring strings?
That wild and wailing music
It hath no earthly tone,
Its strange and solemn melody
Earth may not call her own.
Is it the wild winds sighing,
Which that sad air composed?
Or some imprisoned Ariel,
Within thy frame enclosed?
Which breathes its mournful freedom
In that low plaintive strain—
Splices of broken melody
Poured on the ear in vain?
Is it thy voice, sweet spirit!
Whose breath now hushes these strings,
Which waits in that low mournful sound
The doom of earthly things?
Wails for the loved and lovely,
The dark cold earth beneath;
And pours its requiem, wild and sweet,
Over the dead of death.
And yet a deeper sadness
For those who still live on,
Who bear the burden still of life
When all its soul is gone!
Low, distant, and unearthly,
In silence dies the strain;
And now a richer melody
Flows on the air again.

Like some aerial chorus
Of spirits floating near,
A full rich flood of harmony
Swells on the rapturous ear.
If aught of earthly music
Is e'er in sounding there,
Methods that all things beautiful
And good, and rich and rare;
And all of high and holy
That on this earth is found,
Send up to heaven their grateful breath
Of praise in that sweet sound!
Thou wind, whose gentle breathings
So softly sweep these strings,
Art thou the same impetuous one
Which oft destruction brings?
Which on the stormy ocean
Tells of impending doom,
And bids the shrieking mariner
Find in the deep, a tomb?
Thy voice, which now breathes music,
Hath then a sadder tone,
And wails no thrill of deep delight
But wails alone.
Alas! how slight and viewless
A line may separate
All that we hope and wish and love,
From all we dread and hate.
And from joys swiftest sources
Too often sorrow springs;
Oh world! thou art a mystery,
And full of wondrous things!

REVOLUTIONARY RECOLLECTIONS.

It is matter of deep regret, that so many of the facts of a subordinate though highly interesting nature, to which this mighty event gave birth, are for ever lost. If a judicious collection could be made of only a small portion of the numerous instances of enterprise, bravery, fortitude, and privations, which are well known to have taken place, it would be one of the most entertaining, instructive, and useful bequests that could be given to posterity. It is doubtful if any other event in the history of nations called forth so many heroic deeds, so many noble virtues, and so many sublime sentiments. All the prominent transactions, and many of the painful vicissitudes of that eventful period, are faithfully recorded by the historian, and they will be cherished in everlasting remembrance, and form the proud trophy of every succeeding generation. There yet survives a remnant of that noble band of patriots, whose blood, and long and faithful services, and numerous and severe sufferings, were the price of our liberty. These holy fathers are wont to describe some of the interesting scenes to which they were eye-witnesses and in which they partook; and in listening to these details, how often has my blood been made to thrill and the tear to start involuntarily into my eye. Neither the dignity of history, nor the limits which the historian must always prescribe to himself, will admit of descending to minutiae; and yet no reader was ever found who was not interested in the perusal of those simple annals which portray individual character, and paint the noblest virtues of the human heart in colourings which are true to nature. Would it not repay any man of competent abilities to collect and arrange such unrecorded facts as are still treasured up by those veterans, who have such strong claims upon us, and who have such deep hold upon our affections and our sympathies? It could scarcely fail to reward the undertaker very liberally, whilst it would be in a high degree honourable to our country. A circular addressed to the surviving officers of the army and others who took an active and zealous part in the revolutionary struggle, would be the means of preserving from oblivion some of the most interesting transactions that ever took place, and such as were among the important agencies and efficient means to insure our independence.

I shall here record a fact that happened during one of those fierce conflicts which shed so much lustre on the American arms. Perhaps no other was more strikingly characterized by daring bravery and firmness of spirit than the celebrated battle of Bennington. It was here that the immortal STARK made his memorable declaration to his brave companions, and which has been so charmingly described by our inimitable poet Halleck.*

Colonel F., I believe a native of Vermont, who resided many years in New-York, but whose noble spirit long since fled to

* When on that field his band the Hessians fought, Briefly he spoke before the fight began—
"Soldiers! those German gentlemen are bought
"For four pounds ten and seven pence per man,
"By England's king—a bargain, as 'tis thought.
"Are we worth more? Let's prove it now, we can—
"For we must beat them, boys, ere set of sun,
"Or Mary Starke's a widow!"—It was done.

happier realms, performed the duty of adjutant on that occasion. He related to the writer the following fact, of which he was an eye-witness, and which I believe is without any parallel in the records of battles:

Major W. H., an officer who was distinguished for his bravery and gallant spirit, had under his command about three hundred "green mountain boys"—a most significant appellation in those days—all of whom were sharpshooters, accustomed to the field, and strangers to fear. This corps was posted on an advantageous piece of ground, partly concealed by bushes. The enemy were duly apprised of their position, and it was deemed important to dislodge them. Accordingly a formidable detachment, estimated at about five hundred strong, was ordered to march against them. They advanced upon a charge, thinking to decide the contest without much loss and with little difficulty. The Americans, undismayed, were prepared to receive them. Major H. gave peremptory orders to his troops to reserve their fire until the word of command; the enemy, therefore, rushed on without interruption until they had approached within a few rods of this Spartan band, when, pursuant to order, so deadly a fire was poured into their ranks, that those who escaped retreated in dismay and confusion. The surviving officers, and they were few in number, soon rallied their forces, and brought them a second time to the charge, advancing to the line of their comrades who had fallen, when they received a second fire not less destructive than the first. The enemy were completely panic struck, and fell back in wild disorder. The few remaining officers, however, who behaved with dauntless bravery, and probably thirsting for vengeance, rallied their troops once more, although but few were left, and brought them a third time to the charge. The issue of this attempt was not less fatal than the others; for after receiving the third fire, the survivors fled in terror and despair, and soon surrendered themselves prisoners of war. Their astonishment was past utterance, when they found that out of the whole force with whom they had been associated, no more than thirty-six remained! The others lay stretched upon the field in mute silence, presenting a terrible memento of the power and unyielding spirit of freemen, when summoned to battle in defence of their invaded rights.

Immediately after the issue of the engagement, my informant repaired to that part of the field which had been attended with such fatal consequences to the enemy. He was horror-struck on witnessing the scene that presented itself to his view. And his declaration to the writer of this article was, "I never beheld so awful a spectacle as here greeted my eyes. It was a winnow of dead men from one end of the line to the other!" The contrast of the "green mountain boys" was scarcely less striking, as but few of them were injured.

It may not be improper to add, that Major H., whose enterprising and chivalrous spirit was well known to the Canadians and Indians, was long the object of incessant watchfulness; and a farther incentive was given by the diabolical baseness of the Canadians, who offered a considerable bounty for his scalp. Unhappily they succeeded too well in their schemes. Major H., in company with a small party of his companions in arms, fell into an ambush, where most of them were killed. He was butchered in a dreadful manner, and his scalp borne off to Canada. A surviving officer, who was severely wounded, but whose life was spared, witnessed the horrid transaction. Major H. was not less distinguished for private worth and for the exercise of all the manly virtues, than for his noble conduct in the field. His death occasioned unspeakable regret to every person who knew him, and particularly so among the officers of the northern army, by whom he was universally and most deservedly esteemed.

BRIDAL RETORT.

Richard Dickinson, or, as he was familiarly called for shortness, Dick Dick, was a wild chap, who had fooled away a handsome patrimony before he was twenty-five years of age. About this time his old maiden aunt—Rose Dickinson—from whom he had some "golden expectations," took it into her head to marry a young Irish fortune-hunter, named Manners, who, in his turn took good care that Dick should not handle a farthing of the old lady's fortune. On the morning after the wedding, the young escape-grace called on his aunt to offer his congratulations on the auspicious event, which he did in the following words: "Your grateful nephew hopes to see the young bride well, however he may detest the Manners of an Irish groom." To which address the blushing bride promptly replied: "My grateful nephew will doubtless see the old Bridewell, unless he mend his manners, and associate less with stable grooms." Dick turned on his heel and whistled "Coal-black Rose."

We have been led into these remarks by the neglect and scorn which, for years, American genius has met from Americans. We have observed, with shame, that we have never appreciated nor rewarded the breathings of the American muse, till English critics had pointed out their beauties, and commanded us to admire their genius. We should be mentally, as we are politically, free from foreign thralldom. It is a blot on our escutcheon, that we should await the decision of foreign critics, and be guided by their verdict, regarding the works of our own writers. Why should we import opinions, who have the same ability to judge as the most favoured nations under the sun? It is high time that we should arouse ourselves from this lethargy, and learn to judge in matters of taste, as well as in those of weightier import. We have had, and still have, names that future ages will look back to with pride, and glory that they were Americans; but with how much more satisfaction would posterity cherish their memories, if this generation extended to them that protection and support, which would enable them to prosecute with ardour the bent of their genius; that they might bequeath to future ages, works that would be a monument of their time, and names that would "notch the centuries" of our republic in the memory of succeeding generations?

After these preliminary remarks, we shall now come to the subject of our sketch.

MARY ELIZABETH AIKIN, eldest daughter of the late John Aikin, of Dutchess county, was born in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., the capital of that county, as near as we can learn, about the year 1807. Her father, who was descended from an ancient Scottish family, after passing with great credit his elementary studies, entered Yale college, where he graduated in 1798; and as a reward for his scholastic attainments, was elected a member of the Phi Beta Kappa. On leaving college, Mr. Aikin commenced the study of law, in which profession, his talents, his industry, and his courteous demeanor, soon elevated him to the head of the bar in Dutchess county. He was a partner of Stephen Hoyt, esq. who is now a resident of this city. Mr. Aikin lived esteemed and respected, and died several years ago, deeply regretted, and his memory is still cherished by a large portion of his native state. In early life, Mr. Aikin married Miss Cooke, daughter of the late Mr. Cooke, of Fishkill, Dutchess county, N. Y., a gentleman farmer, of large property. In those days a gentleman farmer was as proud a title as a baron of the olden time. Mr. Cooke was liberal and kind-hearted even to a fault; the oldest and proudest families in the state still remember his hospitable mansion, and the late Colonel De Veaux used to call him "the only hospitable man in Dutchess county." During the revolutionary war, Mr. Cooke was a staunch tory. He was an advocate of the royal cause; and to the last hour of his life, many years after our national independence was achieved, he never omitted a day, to pray for king George III. His daughter, Mrs. Aikin, now resides in Gorham, Ontario county, N. Y. Her family consists of Mary Elizabeth, the subject of this sketch; William, who has just been admitted to the practice of medicine at Gorham, and Sarah, whose writings, under the signature of HINDA, have been so universally admired.

Of the early history of Mrs. Brooks, we know little or nothing. There is, we presume, little to know. Her infantine years were doubtless passed, as the days of childhood are generally passed by those of her sex—in study and seclusion. At a very early age, as we have been informed, Mrs. Brooks evinced a great partiality for reading, especially books of poetry, and every amusement of infancy was neglected to pore over "the songs of other years." At what age she commenced "the rhyming mood," we have not been informed. The first production of her muse which she considered worthy of publication—and which came under the review of the writer of this—was a beautiful poem, entitled "A Romance," which appeared in the Literary Gazette, on the nineteenth of August, 1826, under the signature of NOBNA. Anonymous as it was, its great poetic beauty called forth from the editor a warm eulogium. On the twenty-sixth of the same month, another poem, entitled "Histories," was also published; and week after week she continued to contribute to that paper. Her writings daily improved in sweetness and in beauty, and the productions of her genius elicited much applause. Though many inquiries were made to discover the author's name, still none but her sister HINDA, was privy to her secret, till long after her signature became distinguished, when by a chance, unnecessary to relate here, her name became revealed to the editor and one or two of his most intimate friends. She still continued a constant contributor to the Literary Gazette, and after its discontinuance, to the Morning Courier. Her poetry, as beautiful and varied as her own fancy-thoughts, was extensively copied throughout the Union, and nearly every paper, of literary reputation, joined with the Morning Courier, in awarding to NOBNA almost unbounded applause, for her numerous and elegant productions.

On the twenty-third of January 1829, Mary Elizabeth Aikin was married, in New-York, to James G. Brooks—a writer as universally known as he is highly appreciated. We need not pass a comment upon his writings here; for in the Lives of the Poets, published with portraits in the Mirror of the twenty-sixth of January 1828, Mr Brooks's likeness and name bore a conspicuous place. He was one of the original founders and editors of the Morning Courier, from which journal he voluntarily retired soon after its junction with the Enquirer, and is now to be senior editor of the Daily Sentinel, a paper on the eve of appearing in this city. Mr. and Mrs. Brooks, shortly after their marriage, published a volume of poetry, entitled "The Rivals of Este, and other poems." The Rivals of Este, from which the book takes its title, with many minor poems, occupying one hundred and twenty-seven pages, are from the pen of Mrs. Brooks: a poem, entitled Genius, with many minor productions, most of which were published several years ago, under the signature of Florio, are from the pen of Mr. Brooks, and occupy the remainder of the volume.

Since the publication of that volume, Mrs. Brooks has written much, and many of her productions have been published in the daily papers of this city.

In this place we deem it fitting to give a short sketch of Mrs. Brooks's studies and accomplishments, since she appeared before the world as a poetess, and also to express our estimate of her genius.

Of unobtrusive and retired habits, Mrs. Brooks delights more in the seclusion of her study, than in seeking display or admiration in the busy rounds of society. Her time is passed in improving her mind, and in giving the forms of things unknown, a shape, a local habitation, and a name. It is natural to suppose that the congeniality between her mind and that of her husband, makes her delight in the eagle-soarings of the muse, and she indulges her mood in strains that continue to charm every one capable of admiring the flowers of poesy. We understand that since she wrote the Rivals of Este, and La Verna, the two longest productions before the public, she has completed one or two other poems of length, and in proper time will doubtless give them to the world.

Notwithstanding the time that Mrs. Brooks devotes to her favourite pursuit, she still finds leisure to improve herself in the graver, as well as in the lighter studies and accomplishments of a lady. She is a proficient in the French and Latin languages; she is thoroughly versed in music, and touches the piano with science, taste, and skill; her paintings (in water colours) of landscapes and flowers have claimed much admiration—and her deep knowledge of botany, has enabled her, by her own pencil, to arrange the rarest and most beautiful flowers in a large volume to which she has given an appropriate title.

Her course of general reading has been extensive. She delights more in history, travels, biography, and poetry, than in the imaginative novel or romance; in one word, from what we have heard, and from what we know, we are convinced that there is not in the city, nay, in the Union, a lady of her age, who better deserves the title of scholar, than Mrs. Brooks. We admire her the more for her attainments, because she is free from a bluish tinge; she never aims at a display of knowledge, and even those most intimately acquainted with her, never hear from her lips a word breathed of her own productions.

Before we pronounce any one a poet, we should first know what constitutes poetry—this is perhaps a truism—there are few who do not feel the charm of poetry, but who can give a proper definition? We have read many, but none correspond with our estimate. Burke has given it the most poetical; he says, "poetry is the art of substantiating shadows, and lending existence to nothing." We would define it thus: poetry is a description of animated or external nature, told in figurative, impassioned, yet natural language: rhyme is an attribute, not an essential of poetry. Let either of these definitions be correct, Mrs. Brooks is a poetess. There is a delicacy of feeling, a refinement of sentiment, a deep and impassioned tone, in all her writings, that denote a mind full-fraught with poesy. In her style there is no redundancy, no seeking of round about expressions for the sake of the rhyme, and her rhythm flows "as regular as rolling water;" her thoughts breathe, as it were, spontaneously, like the richest and rarest flowers that beautify the banks of Helicon. There is a splendour in the drapery with which she adorns her pictures—an ease, a felicity of touch, and a skillful blending of light and shade; yet the drapery, the touch, and the colouring, sometimes render her unmindful of the theme, which is thereby occasionally wrapped in obscurity, and makes the reader anxious to move aside the gorgeous folds, so much is he charmed by the glimpses he obtains of the story.

Her thoughts partake more of a metaphysical than a descriptive character; she indulges not so much in the portraiture of external nature as in the delineation of human passions. Her descriptions of pride, revenge, ambition, love, and hate, are strongly drawn; and in these more, perhaps, than in any other of the passions, she has indulged. For one of her years, it is a matter of wonder that she has been able to strike with so much force and skill many of the most secret chords of the heart.

Though she has not indulged much in description, yet her similes are often drawn from the field and forest; and the taste and beauty with which she has used them, to illustrate and adorn her writings, mark hers a mind of uncommon force and vigour, and show that she has an eye for the bright and beautiful.

Mrs. Brooks's pictures of love are not in the mawkish and lack-a-daisical tone, so fashionable now-a-days, which is a great recommendation; in her lay they are breathed forth in a noble and dignified strain, such as becomes the holiness of the passion. The poetic character of this age is emphatically that of passion—description has tired, the pastoral no more delights, and the elegiac is too grave. The hundreds of poetasters who have sprouted up in this country as well as in England, describe passion, not as it is in nature, but as they see it through the medium of their jaundiced sight, or as they judge of it with their morbid feelings. In this class we rank Miss Landon. With some few bright exceptions, this is the age of the affectation of passion, not of passion's genuine self—and in the exceptions we embrace Mrs. Hemans and Mrs. Brooks.

In many of her poems, Mrs. Brooks has shown a strength and nerve beyond the usual power of her sex; her pictures of blood and battle are sometimes startling, from their vividness, their force, and truth; in short, she has written many passages that the brightest of the train of song might be proud to acknowledge; yet again, in others, she has shown a feebleness that, compared with herself, are unworthy of her muse. Her faults, and they are principally to be found in the writings that preceded the publication of the Rivals of Este, are a carelessness of construction and an inelegance of style, a too frequent use of adjectives and adverbs to qualify her nouns and verbs, which lead us to believe that she was in the habit of writing rapidly, and bestowing no labour afterwards, in revision or correction. These faults, however, have, with a few exceptions, been avoided in her later productions. We may apply to her mind her own beautiful couplet:

"Sparkling as ocean wave; yet deep
As things beneath its surface sleep."

We may add here, that her poems have been copied extensively in England; and the applause with which they have been received by English critics, has even exceeded the approbation bestowed upon them in her native land. More than one of the first poets of England have written to this country their exalted opinion of her genius. Several of her songs, too, have been set to music; and we believe there are few ladies who will not find on their pianos the beautiful song of "O come, my love, along the sea:" the melody is by Norton.

Thus far we have regarded Mrs. Brooks only as a poetess; but she has written many beautiful sketches in prose; these were principally published in the Morning Courier, under the signature of N—a. They claimed much admiration, and like her poetry, were extensively copied. We remember them as bright, fanciful, and racy compositions, but not being before us in a tangible shape, we are unable to speak of them more critically. This subject, interesting to us, as doubtless it will be to our readers, has already occupied so much space, that we are unable to give extracts as copious as we could wish, to prove the correctness of our verdict—to show that our praise does not exceed her merit—but we shall find room for a few passages.

As a specimen of the sublime, a quality seldom seen in poetry at the present day, the following Hebrew melody equals the best of Byron's or Moore's:

Jeremiah, x. 17.

From the halls of our fathers in anguish we fled,
Nor again will its marble re-echo our tread;
For a breath like the siroc-hawblasted our name,
And the frown of Jehovah has crushed us in shame.

His robe was the whirlwind, his voice was the thunder,
And earth at his footstep was riven asunder;
The mantle of midnight had shrouded the sky,
But we knew where He stood by the flash of his eye.
Oh, Judah! how long must thy weary ones weep,
Far, far from the land where their forefathers sleep;
How long ere the glory that brightened the mountain
Will welcome the exile to Siloa's fountain?

To support our position, that she has shown a strength and nerve beyond the usual power of her sex, we quote the two following verses from one of her minor poems:

Rush on, rush on, thou fathomless, thou deep and timeless flood,
Thou gush of passions, hopes, and fears, rush on to ill or good;
Fain would I woo the apathy, more icy than the chain
That only flings its fetters o'er the surface of the main.

But no; go ask the torrent why it holds its fierce career,
Ask the red bolt that cleaves the sky, what points its pathway here;
Then ask that chainless tide of heart, in its first gush warm and free,
What sweeps its wild and wayward course to the wave of Eternity.

To the third stanza of "The Rivals of Este," which gives a fanciful description of Italy, we refer, for the beauty of her colouring and the felicity of her touch. We recommend our readers to the volume; we have no room to copy it.

The description of the fight between Este and his rival, is in forcible and impassioned language; it is a picture of blood and battle.

Yet see! what sabre sweeps before him,
What eye of fire is flashing o'er him?
Borne on the fury of the fight,
With hostile front they near unite—
It was the grapple fierce and strong,
Of deep and unforgiven wrong;
The clasp of injury and hate,
Above the ruins they create;
With arm to arm, and breast to breast,
Unyielding, motionless they rest—
But frowning brow, and swelling vein,
The close, more close, convulsive strain;
The lip compressed, the gathering glow
Told struggle, desperate below—
Nor shout, nor shriek, nor taunting word,
Nor curse, nor agony was heard;
Till wavering, reeling to and fro,
Together bound, down, down they go,
Heading upon the ground below.
More furious grew the combat then,
As either strove to rise again;
The sabre steel flashed quick between,
Skillful to fathom or to screen;
Till false for once—and from the side
Of Este gushed the crimson tide.
"Now yield!"

"No, never!"—Este said—
And as the sullen words he sped,
His nerveless hand essayed to grasp
The steel that trembled in his clasp.

The following is a beautiful and pathetic passage; it is spoken by the love-sick nun in La Verna:

My life has been one fevered sweep
Of passion o'er my soul;
While phantoms in that sullen keep,
Uproused them from their fitful sleep,
And reason's stern control;
Yet chide me not; the wildest wave
Finds in the ocean depths a grave,
Perchance it sought before;
And Time as fierce a flood will see
Slumber in voiceless apathy;
Peace to the torrent o'er!
I look upon the days gone by,
And thought is weariness;
They brought for me no smile nor sigh,
But one intensest agony.
Hath stolen their power to bless:
For aye was phrensy in the dream,
For ever burning in the beam!
Father, we parted! he, to wrong
The heart that loved so well, so long;
And I, in holy shades to rear
A pang; at last it triumphs here.

The following is one of the many poems which have appeared in the daily papers, since this volume was published. It will appeal forcibly to many a heart:

STANZAS.

"Thou too art gone, thou loved and lovely one."—Byron.

I trod my own bright home last night;
The breeze was fresh, the floweret fair;
All stood enwrapped in fairy light—
Thou wast not there.

Soft woke my childhood's careless chord,
And wreaths we did together twine,
And deep, sweet murmuring voices poured—
All, all but thine.

The merry lights flashed sunshine then,
And hearts were there in primal glee;
I heard the thrilling notes again,
And turned for thee.

There gushed the stream, there blushed the grove,
All bright affection's hallowed spot,
And bound with thousand links of love—
But thou wast not.

Oh, parted far! yet fancy's chain
Clings close through many a cloud and care;
And when my night home wakes again,
Oh meet me there!

We cannot find further space for extracts of length; we shall now content ourselves with a few detached thoughts, selected from her volume—they are sparkling gems.

"He stood, the only thing of breath."
"Breathless as fond affection keeps
Her silent watch where childhood sleeps."
"Many a bright and laughing morrow
"Cradling in the sigh of sorrow."

"Scarce one light echo woke to sound."
"And steps as light as music fall
"To catch the voice of love."
"It comes, when summer skies are bright,
"On the hush of the morning breeze.
"And eyes are dim, and furrows now
"Have cradled many a care;
"And light flash sunshine on the brow,
"To wake but shadows there."
"Come when the ocean wave, fiercely driven,
"Meets the red bolt ere launched from its heaven."
"So still, and pale, and beautiful,
"Even as the visioned phantasy
"Crowning the weary heart to cull
"A poppy wreath for memory."
"Life is for me a broken tone."

Without much pains we might go on and multiply such passages of surpassing beauty, till the taste pall with very richness, but we desist, recommending, in the strongest terms, those who have not yet read Mrs. Brooks's poems to hasten to the mental banquet which she has spread for them.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

We trust we are pardonable for feeling a little self-complacency on presenting the present number of the Mirror to our readers. It is original throughout; for even Horn's beautiful melody, which enriches the last page, is now published for the first time.

Absence of mind.—It is a generally received opinion, that absence of mind is a frailty attending profound knowledge, or uncommon genius. We do not intend to discuss the question in this place; but will, nevertheless, venture an opinion, that it is more frequently the result of a weak understanding, or a long seclusion from active life. Many of the greatest scholars have undoubtedly had their eccentricities, but these have been much exaggerated; or, if they have ever actually occurred, have probably taken place in the history of less wise and distinguished persons. Newton has been saddled with many a dunce's blunders. It is said, that having a favourite cat, who was in the habit of coming into his study, he cut a large hole in the door in order to save himself the trouble of rising to admit her; but, remembering afterwards, that she had a couple of kittens, he added two little holes for their especial accommodation. He also called upon his servant to move back the grate when the fire became too warm for his convenience; and it is related that once, while apparently listening to the remarks of a lady, he took her hand very gravely, as if about to pop the tenderest of questions; but, instead of placing it upon his heart, or pressing it to his lips, he proceeded forthwith to introduce her little finger into his pipe, for the purpose of knocking out the ashes. But these are idle reports. The biographer of Sir Isaac Newton states, that "notwithstanding his anxious care to avoid every occasion of breaking his intense application to study, he was at a great distance from being steeped in philosophy; on the contrary, he could lay aside his thoughts, though engaged in the most intricate researches, when his other occupations required it; and, as soon as he had leisure, resume the subject at the point where he had left off."

In 1696 he obtained, through the influence of his friends, the office of warden of the mint, and, three years after, was appointed master; he applied himself promptly to the duties of his occupation, and was of signal service when the money was called in to be re-coined. He was not distinguished by any eccentricities, but was in company affable and candid, and thought neither his merit nor his reputation sufficient to excuse himself from the duties of social life. How much credit, therefore, these idle stories deserve, every reader can judge; but there is one related of Kant, the German philosopher, which is amusing, and tolerably well authenticated. From all accounts, he must have been a singular personage. He has written, "like brave men, long and well," but in a style so entirely original, that a dictionary was published in Germany, exclusively to illustrate the meaning of his expressions.

He was walking to and fro one night at Leipsic, wrapped in profound cogitations. The bright moonlight streamed down through the trees, and cast their long distinct shadows across the path. The company observed the professor striding along, inattentive to all surrounding circumstances. While his course lay on the plain, which was bright in the moonshine, he moved very much in the method of the rest of his fellow-creatures, but whenever he crossed the shadow of a tree, he leaped over it, with much exertion. "Why, man," said one of his friends, "what are you jumping about here for, at such a rate?" "I cannot conceive," replied Kant, "how you pass over these ditches with so much ease."

The Revised Statutes.—We have heard much talk respecting the "Revised Statutes." The clerks of the different courts wear rather grave faces at the mention of the "Revised Statutes." The ward court justices move with the slowness becoming all great bodies, and may be seen behind their desks, diving into the "Revised Statutes;" and the lawyers profess that they positively do not know, for they have scarcely looked through the "Revised Statutes." Landlords inquire how they are to collect their rent by the "Revised Statutes;" and a poor man gravely asked us, the other day, if proceedings of courts, imprisonment for debt, lottery-offices, and lawyers, were not pretty much abolished by the "Revised Statutes."

Great alterations have certainly been effected; and for the benefit of those who have not had an opportunity of giving them an attentive perusal, we enumerate a few of the leading acts. The ladies are hereafter to be admitted to equal privileges with the men, and may vote and hold all offices. Whiskers are abolished, except as hereinafter provided; any person wearing the same shall execute a bond to the congress of the United States, in the penalty of a hundred thousand dollars, conditioned that such person is tame and will not bite. The Indians are to be invited to erect a settlement in this city, and all that part of New-York lying south of Canal-street and Chatham-square, and between the North and East rivers, is to be appropriated to their accommodation. An university is to be established for the purpose of educating children by steam, for which a patent has been granted to professor Fire-Engine. It is now placed beyond a doubt that the course of all the arts and sciences with all the polite accomplishments, may be effected by the time they arrive at the age of seven years. The great well is to be dug in Thirteenth-street, until it comes out on the other side of the globe, in which case a communication is to be established by means of buckets and air-balloons with the inhabitants of Russia in Asia, by which it is confidently expected a glorious supply of water will be obtained from the Pacific ocean, and several ships of the line have been despatched for the purpose of negotiating a treaty with the emperor of China.

The late Mr. Gilfert.—Every one knows the immense difference between the estimation in which a tenth-rate author's works are held by himself and by the public; but this different way of viewing the same subject is, perhaps, never exhibited with so much dramatic effect as between the author of a play and the manager of a theatre. One of this species of writers presented a sort of a tragedy to the late Mr. Gilfert, who, though a man of great talent in his way, believed one opera at any time better than ten tragedies, looked upon Mozart as a greater man than Shakspeare, and liked the "poetry of sound" better than any other poetry whatever. The author examined the bottom of the bills every morning, expecting to see his play announced as forthcoming with "new scenery, machinery, dresses, and decorations," but looked in vain. Time rolled on, till at last waxing impatient, he called at the Bowery theatre, asked to speak with Mr. Gilfert, and inquired if his piece was in a state of forwardness? "What piece?" said Mr. G. The author gave the name, when Mr. G. looking at him over his spectacles, said he knew nothing about it; but added, by way of consolation, that he believed it was lost. "Lost!" exclaimed the author, who expected some dreadful convulsion of nature would attend such a catastrophe as the loss of his tragedy; "lost! my tragedy lost! impossible." Mr. G., who thought it was no such serious matter, seemed rather surprised by this burst of tragic passion, and by way of allaying it, beckoned the author into his private room, where, acting upon the supposition that one play was just as good as another, he pointed to a pile of about fifty unread or rejected dramas, and as a compensation, requested the author, as he expressed it, to "take his pick!" This only made matters worse, when Mr. G., desirous of terminating the business handsomely, made what he thought a most generous offer, by desiring him to accept a five-act in return for his three-act play, "or by —," continued he, using an exclamation not proper to be repeated, "you may take two of them!" The author, who had an elevated opinion of himself, and thought "his words were sparks of immortality," was about to reply in high dudgeon, when, on turning them over, the name of his own piece met his view. He took it up, put it in his pocket, buttoned his coat, looked supercilious, hemmed, and wished Mr. G. a good morning. "Baron Von Carlos," as Gilfert was frequently called, returned the salutation, expressing, at the same time, his surprise, that any gentleman should be foolish enough to neglect the opportunity of getting so good a bargain as two tragedies for one.

THE DRAMA.

THE Christmas holidays spread cheerfulness and festivity over private circles, and created dulness and desertion in public places, the theatres especially. Good eating and drinking, and bad vocal, and worse instrumental music are prevalent all around, and their united attractions are too powerful for the sons and daughters of Thespis to make head against. For these two or three weeks past, when we have stepped into the Park on an evening, nothing worthy the name of an audience has been visible. A few friendless, invitationless-looking individuals, to be sure, were gathered together, or rather distributed around, like angels' visits, or plums in a boarding-school pudding, "few and far between." The performers seemed to feel the unkindness of the public; Mrs. Sharpe's laugh had lost its gaiety, and Mr. Woodhull stormed and swore in a more modulated tone of voice than is his wont when a full house witnesses his misdeeds; Mr. Barnes twisted his face but once where he used to twist it twice, and Mr. Barry's pleasant smile withered to a sardonic grin. Mr. Richings was the only one whose spirits seemed untouched, and his action was as impressive, and his emphasis as correct as ever. (By the way, Richings is improving wonderfully in comedy—his tragedy is still a very destructive business.) The serious parts of the play went off very naturally, but in the comic scenes it was hard work to be facetious and merry. The audience evidently sympathized with the actors, and took a melancholy interest in what was going on; a feeling of desolation weighed down their spirits, and many gentlemen sought relief in tobacco. They laughed not, neither did they applaud; for applause would have seemed an insult, and laughter a mockery. One person indeed once, and once only, broke the solemn silence by unthinkingly clapping his hands together; but it sounded so abrupt and startling, and reverberated so dolefully through the empty boxes, that he looked a good deal alarmed and a little ashamed of what he had done. Two or three critics were lounging discontentedly about the lobbies with their hands in their pockets; and of the two door-keepers, one was asleep, the other buried in profound reflection.

Even the regular actors of the theatre, old and deserved favourites with the public, have for the most part made their annual appeal in vain. Mrs. Sharpe, who deserves a real benefit, if ever woman deserved one, though not neglected, was by no means patronized to the extent she merits, although Shakespeare and Forrest were put in requisition to furnish a rational evening's amusement. The only thing that has been decidedly encouraged was Mr. Barnes's goose; and this actor really deserves much credit for his profound insight into human nature. Deeply impressed with the truth of that truest of all proverbs, that "birds of a feather flock together," he produced on the stage a goose of extraordinary dimensions, which attracted to the theatre a numerous assemblage of friends, admirers, and relatives of that interesting bird; thus adding one more to the many examples of the uncommon soundness of the above adage.

The fact is, the drama is invariably at a low ebb every year about this time. Theatricals in New-York depend more upon strangers than those of any other city in the Union, and this is the season when scarcely any are present. The country merchants have taken up their winter quarters in their respective villages, and the southern belles, beaux, and men of business, have, like birds of passage, passed on to milder latitudes. The inhabitants too, have been busily employed with balls, concerts, and private parties, and thus the theatre is deprived of its principal means of support. The worst of the season is, however, over, and a visible change for the better is now taking place. Mrs. Austin has commenced a short engagement, and no one is more deservedly a favourite with the public than this delightful songstress. To say that Mrs. Austin warbles like a night-ingale, would not now convey any definite idea, for the same thing is said of every singer that makes a noise; but the expressive word warble is peculiarly applicable to the rich combination of sounds that this lady occasionally pours forth, and some of her notes are in truth most mellifluous and bird-like. The spring campaign, it is said, will be opened with more than ordinary vigour. C.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SONG.

From a prose translation of Sir William Jones.

THE blushing morn, with roses veiled,
Advances from her eastern bower,
And dew-drops, by her breath exhaled,
Tremble like pearls upon each flower.

Haste, loved companion! bring the wine,
And breathe with me the ambrosial air,
(A gale from paradise divine)
While we the crystal goblet share.

The rose upon her emerald throne
Reigns in that bower to lovers true;
Let then our chalice be o'erflown,
With liquor of her ruby hue.

Why at the banquet still abide?
Dost thou not view the dawning day?
Open thy gates, oh keeper, wide!
Companion, why so long delay?

Oh, youth beloved, pour to thy fair,
And bid the bright libation flow;
And, wise one, let thy evening prayer
Spread like the vine, and fervid glow.

Like Hafiz, seize the kiss divine,
From the pure lips of maid most dear;
'Tis sweet as is the balmy wine,
More precious than a peri's tear.

ELOISA.

STANZAS.

There's ne'er a flower that lifts its head
O'er fragrant wild, or garden bed,
That tells not with its sweetest breath
And freshest hue, of life and death!

The day that has the sunniest morn,
With song of birds, and perfume born;
Oh! what avails its joy and light?
It rises but to set in night!

And fairest hope, and gayest thought,
Though with youth's sweetest fancies fraught;
Who, who but owns how short their stay?
They flatter, shine, and pass away!

And thou, my boy, on whose fair brow
Exultingly I gaze e'en now;
With my fond smile is breathed a sigh,
To think that thou wert born to die!

And those, at whom I do not gaze,
For these are not as former days!
What need I more than think of thee,
To know that joy must cease to be?

Oh, wo! to feel in early youth,
With fullest force the solemn truth,
That quickly fades life's dearest part—
The saddest fastens on the heart!

ISABEL.

RESEMBLANCE.

I cannot love her—every tress
Which o'er her forehead strays,
Stamps on my soul with deeper stress,
The dream of other days;
Yet o'er that brow I've fondly gazed,
And o'er that golden hair,
And pressed its threads with lips that praised—
It seemed like Ida's there.

I cannot love her—cold and mute
My heart to passion's spell,
Yet I have listened to her lute,
As though I loved her well;
And whispered 'twas a peri's tone
Which melted on her tongue;
And every word was rapture's own—
'Twas thus that Ida sung.

I cannot love her—every glance
Her eye hath on me cast,
Serves but to strengthen and enhance
The memory of the past.
Yet I have told her stars ne'er set
In such deep lustrous blue,
And prayed her gaze one moment yet—
Ah! it was Ida's too.

I cannot love her—thus I'd said,
And coldly turned away—
When first her brow she meekly laid,
Where erst another's lay;

But oh! while bending o'er that cheek,
Meet for a spirit's shrine,
I could not turn—I could not speak—
Ida, 'twas so like thine.

Quench—quench this meteoric gleam,
Mocking a planet's light.
Enough! 'tis past—'twas but a dream—
Welcome oblivion's night!
I do not love her—'twere a spot
Upon affection's sun;
I love but one—and she is not—
I cannot love but one.

HARP OF THE ISLE.

TO MY LITTLE DAUGHTER EMILY.

Ada! sole daughter of my house and heart,
When last I saw thy young blue eyes, they smiled,
And then we parted, not as now we part,
But with a hope.—Child Harold.

Earliest pledge of my affections,
Promise of my future days,
Object of my soul's reflections,
Idol of my prayers and praise;
While, last night, you smiling slumbered,
On my bosom lay thy head;
Ah! how many must be numbered
Ere again you share that bed?

And this parting morn thou'st feasted,
Pillowed on thy father's knee;
Many a tear-cup must be tasted
Ere such joy return for me.

When thou wakest on the morrow,
Heaved o'er ocean's deep abyss,
Wilt thou not, in wondering sorrow,
Seek thy father's morning kiss?

But no! my parting words can only
Sadness o'er thy features roll;
Leave we then for scenes more lonely,
Themes too dark for thy young soul.

Yes, I waive a father's duty
Sooner than, with sorrow's sign,
Dim one feature of that beauty,
Praised by other lips than mine.

For thou'rt full of lovely childhood,
Fair as heaven's expanded bow,
Glad as lark in summer wildwood,
Mayst thou long continue so!
There's a weary path before thee,
Full of thorns and full of tears;
But thou'rt a loving mother o'er thee,
To direct thy future years.

Come! receive thy father's blessing,
Daughter of my hope below;
Come! 'tis all that's worth possessing,
Which that father can bestow!

May the God of power direct thee
O'er the Atlantic's broad abyss!
May the God of love protect thee
From such trying hour as this!

May the path that leadeth ever
Heaven-ward, by thy step be trod,
Till thou reachest Siloa's river,
Flowing by the throne of God.

AUTUMN REFLECTIONS.

Come to me, from the vistas of the past,
Ye countless hopes that beckoned me along;
Come with your glories that so briefly last,
With the sweet richness of your treacherous song;
The twilight hour is here—the solemn breeze
Wakes its revelation of the autumnal hour;
The leaf is sinking from the yellow trees,
The glow departeth from the leafless bower.

And here with leaves and mournful streams around,
Choked with the honours from the forest cast;
Here, listening to the melancholy sound
Of the innumerable boughs, in hidden blast;
Here throng my memories back, a mournful train,
To springs of other years—to dreams that now
Seem but the echo of the wind-harp's strain,
Stirring the heart and shadowing the brow.

Where are these glories? where, at this lone hour,
Are the glad hopes of my departed years?
Each dream unfolded, like a matchless flower,
Till leaf and odour passed away in tears!
And still I weep not: for upspringing yet
From the deep chambers of my restless heart,
Come the fond visions I may ne'er forget,
While babbling memory can her spells impart.

EVERARD.

A MOTHER'S PRAYER.

Oh, heavenly Father! by that name
Which thou hast chosen, e'en above
Those which thy boundless power proclaim;
That name of mercy and of love,
Which bids us all our wishes speak,
Our woes impart, our wants declare,
Let me address thee now, and seek
To utter thus a mother's prayer:

Grant, heavenly Father, to my child,
A heart submissive to thy will;
Thankful for good, and reconciled
By love to every seeming ill;
Still may it feel and understand
That all alike thy love declare,
The cheering smile, the chast'ning hand;
Oh, answer thus a mother's prayer.

Guide, heavenly Father, guide its feet
Far from ambition's dangerous height;
The throne where virtue keeps her seat,
Be this its homage and delight:
Preserve its steps, in thoughtless youth,
From pleasure's flower-concealed snare;
Direct them to the paths of truth,
In answer to a mother's prayer.

Keep, heavenly Father, keep its heart
Pure, humble, ardent, and sincere;
Teaching the hand when to impart,
The eye to shed the pitying tear;
With virtuous fortitude supplied,
Undazzled by the tinsel glare
Of fashion, folly, and of pride—
Oh, answer thus a mother's prayer.

Spared, heavenly Father, may I be,
To mark awhile its rising sun,
If so it seemeth good to thee,
If not, thy better will be done.
This, then, the only boon I crave,
Grant that my child these gifts may share,
And thank thee, on a mother's grave,
For answering a mother's prayer.

POPULAR TALES.

THE BACHELOR'S BRIDAL.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SELWYN."

It is perhaps the most natural, as well as most powerful excuse that can be offered for the shade of misanthropy which is apt to creep, with advancing years, over the best and kindest spirits, that they have read in their pilgrimage through life so many bitter commentaries on the errors or vices of humanity. Youth hears of injustice, infidelity, and treachery. It neither believes nor understands, and goes on its jocund way unsaddened and unwarned. But the man of declining years has seen their harrowing traces on the brow of worth and the cheek of beauty, and conviction is reluctantly forced upon him. Out of very pity for one brother of his species, he begins to despise, if not to hate, another; and under the strong abhorrence of individual falsehood, is even heard to say in his haste, "all men are liars!"

If there be among the children of deceit or levity, a character more fitted than another to give rise to this uncharitable feeling, it is surely that of the man who, having set himself in sober sadness, and with all the energies of a perhaps powerful and commanding intellect, to win and monopolize the affections of a fair woman, his equal in birth and station, conceives himself warranted by any change, short of personal unworthiness in the object of this well-assorted connexion, to withdraw his promise, and make shipwreck of her happiness! And if the cause be, as is too often the case, sordid love of gold, or diminution of worldly advantages, is there a term base enough to characterise so ignoble a breach of plighted faith? Oh! that the broken hearts and ravaged minds of hundreds of the noblest, and loveliest, and most innocent of heaven's creatures could suffice to brand, with inexpiable infamy, a crime, whose toleration amongst us is a disgrace to civilized society! Theoretically, I ever abhorred it "with a perfect hatred," till I gathered from the lips of him whose peace the stroke had shattered, even at the rebound; the history of one of the many hearts broken by the perfidy of the world's "honourable men." I will give it in the words of the narrator, a brave and high-minded officer, on whose manly frame grief and disappointment had done the work of a hundred battles, and whose blighted hopes and joyless existence, formed a living commentary on the text of which I have made choice.

"It was after a residence of nearly fifteen years in India," said Colonel Merton to me, when months of silent sympathy had entitled me to confidence, "that I felt, for the first time during an interval of intense professional excitement, the wish to revisit my native country. It was no sooner formed than it became irresistible. I fancied my health affected by every moment's delay, and looked on the monotonous objects around, with hourly and increasing disgust. Leave of absence, after such a period of active service, was readily granted; but its limited nature (for I was in the king's service) and an impatience to enjoy European scenes and associations, combined to make me prefer, to some months' imprisonment on ship-board, the harassing journey over land, across the desert. It was performed with its usual unvarying features of discomfort, privation, and fatigue. These, a soldier can despise: when there is something to be done, he is always ready to suffer; but the passive endurance of solitude is not his forte.

"I need not enlarge, to any one who has ever felt the vivid pleasures of contrast, on the bliss it was to tread, after the purgatory of an Alexandrian merchantman, and the still more annoying confinement of a Maltese lazaretto, the delicious shores of Naples! I did not think it had been in my harassed soldier-frame, and languid toil-worn spirit, to feel so happy; and I hailed my long-forgotten sensations as an earnest of enjoyments even more heartfelt and consoling. The only drawback on my present satisfaction, was the want of a companion; though the sense of solitude, which weighed so heavily amid the bustling myriads of the Toledo, was often welcome when treading the lone shores of Baiæ and the silent tombs of Pompeii.

"I had spent one bright and balmy spring-morning amid the latter unspeakably interesting remains, and had identified myself so completely with their ancient inhabitants, as to feel absolutely startled to find (on looking in, for a second time, on what is termed the Basilica) its verdant area occupied by a gay group of English travellers; for whose mid-day repast, fallen pillars, and their yet unfinished capitals (for Pompeii when overwhelmed was but breathing from the ravages of an earthquake) furnished classical accommodations.

"I began by feeling angry at the intrusion, and ended by envying the intruders—so very sociably did they seem to enjoy their frugal banquet, in a spirit of subdued and tranquil cheerfulness, which did not in the least degree outrage the sanctity of a people's sepulchre. I really longed to join them, and felt convinced I should have been made welcome; but the frank, fearless spirit which, on the banks of the Ganges, would have prompted the proposal, shrunk abashed before the chilling influence of my native Thames; and I sat down quietly, behind a yet erect column, to contemplate the pleasing spectacle of domestic enjoyment, and listen to the sound of my country's language—now, for the first time, saluting my ear from many a cheerful and almost familiar voice.

"In this pleasant group was one, whose peculiar sweetness of tone thrilled at once upon my heart, and came in at intervals, with its rich mellow tenor, between the shrill youthful treble, and deep bass of the family dialogue, just as the speaker herself—a graceful, elegant woman, of about eight-and-twenty—formed, as it were, the connecting link between a pleasing-looking couple advanced in life, and young people of various ages, from ten to twenty. I was just thinking that I would have given the world to hear this lady sing, when one of the youngest of the group—a slender, fair-haired girl—hung coaxingly around her, and with privileged importunity, seemed to anticipate my wishes, by entreating for a song. A guitar was soon brought from the carriage; and never, surely, did the appropriate airs from "L'Ultimo Giorno di Pompeii," find their way more resistlessly to the heart. They were sung with taste, and skill, and science; and thus I had heard them at San Carlos the night before. But what were taste, skill, and science behind a row of stage lamps, and amid the thunder of an orchestra, compared with the feeling and pathos which now woke the desolate echoes of Pompeii, and commemorated, upon its site, a city's overthrow! I listened in breathless ecstasy, and felt as if I had never understood till then why I was surrounded by roofless edifices and tenantless dwellings!

"The song ceased—the spell was broken; and the party, warned by the lengthening shadows, arose to depart. I looked on their preparations with indefinable interest, although with the feeling that I should, in all probability, never see them again; and I felt a childish pleasure in moving, when they were gone, to the spot which they had so recently occupied. Here, among the debris of their miscellaneous repast—half hid beneath orange-peel, sandwich papers, and empty wine flasks, my eye was soon attracted by a red morocco volume, apparently a sketch-book, forgotten by one of the party. I snatched it up, in the joint hope of being yet in time to restore it, and of getting, perhaps, a soft word of thanks from the delightful mezzo soprano—when the songstress herself, aware of her loss, re-entered the Basilica to recover it.

"As I walked towards her with the book, I read, inscribed on its cover, the letters 'Louisa Ormond;' and their talismanic power as effectually transported me back some dozen of years, to the bloody field of A—, as the surrounding objects had before carried me a couple of thousand, to the fall of Pompeii. Encouraged by the sweet smile and slight blush, with which the property was claimed and received, I found voice to ask if indeed I had the unexpected pleasure of speaking to Miss Ormond, of F— Hall?

"The same," answered the fair artist, with a flush of surprise, and quickness of expression foreign to her general manner: 'does any one here know me?'

"I was unaware," replied I, 'till this moment, that one, for whom I am entrusted with a sacred commission, was within my reach. May I be permitted to acquit myself of a long cherished duty, by waiting upon you when it may suit your convenience to receive me?' So saying, I handed her my card, and received one in return, indicating the name of the friends with whom she was residing, at a well-known hotel on the Chiaï.

"Just at that moment, one of her young companions came back in quest of her. I resigned her to his privileged guardianship, and stood routed to the spot, pondering on the marvellous coincidences which, in real life, laugh to scorn the timid contrivances of fiction. Twelve years ago, on the banks of the Ganges, I had received a packet, to be delivered, should I return alive, to a young lady in England; and lo! on this identical person I had stumbled amid the ruins of Pompeii, when, but for a song, I should never have thought about her, and but for a lost scrap of paper, should never have found her out! Of course, I thought now about her, quite as much as such a concatenation of circumstances warranted; that is to say, all night, and all next day, till it was time to go and call upon her.

"On arriving at the Albergo delle Croalle, the handsome suite of apartments occupied by the family, I was introduced to the head of it—a benevolent, sensible looking man, whose frankness at once informed me why the task of receiving me had in the first instance devolved upon him.

"Your absence from your native country, Colonel Merton, has probably kept you ignorant of some painful circumstances in Miss Ormond's history, which induce her partial friends to shield her from every possible source of sudden agitation. Her health is at all times delicate, and her spirits are only recovering from a shock of the severest kind. This being the case, you will perhaps allow me the parent's office, of judging how far the communication you alluded to yesterday may safely be hazarded. If it comes from one quarter, I could almost take upon me to say, it is equally ill-judged and fruitless."

"It comes from one, sir," said I, 'long removed, by death, from the possibility of offending, and who, I am sure, would gladly have forfeited life to avert from Miss Ormond the shadow of pain or displeasure. Did you ever hear her speak of her cousin, Edmund Lyttelton?'

"Often. She regarded him with sisterly affection, and was much affected by his untimely fate."

"It was with more than fraternal feelings that poor Edmund remembered his fair cousin," said I, with a sigh. "Living, she shared his youthful heart with glory; and his dying words were of her alone. Could she, do you think, without danger, afford me the melancholy satisfaction of consigning to her own hands tokens of boyish affection, endeared by youthful associations, and hallowed by the early grave of him by whom they were treasured?"

"Certainly," said Mr. Owenson, with the air of one relieved from secret uneasiness. "My dear young friend, whose feelings have been wounded in the tenderest point by unkindness, can only, I think, be soothed by testimonials of innocent attachment from one whose memory she cherishes, but to whose loss she has long been resigned, I will, however, just prepare her, if you will excuse me—

"But ere the good man had time to leave the room, Miss Ormond entered it, with somewhat of the hurried manner of one who anticipates a scene, and wishes it over.

"My dear Louisa," said Mr. O., 'this gentleman is from the East Indies, and was the commanding officer and intimate friend of poor Edmund. He has a message from the dear fellow, to deliver to his cousin Louy. I am sure it will be welcome, as well as its bearer. You will look in upon us frequently, sir, I hope,' added he, as he left the room. 'Any friend of Edmund Lyttelton's I shall ever be proud to see.'

"Miss Ormond," said I, when alone with the lovely woman, whose slight air of absence and pre-occupation convinced me more than words, that there were no overwhelming feelings connected with her cousin's memory, 'I need not tell you that there never beat in human bosom, a braver or a softer heart than Edmund Lyttelton's! That heart, from very childhood, was yours; and a passion, too boyish, probably, to excite in your breast any corresponding feelings, kept its hold of his while life remained. If he loved glory, and ardently pursued it, it was to become more worthy of you: he sacrificed life in the pursuit, and his last words to me were, "When you go to England—no matter when—find out Louisa Ormond. I would fain see she should one day know, that it was for her Edmund Lyttelton lived and died! Here are two memorials of her, which it was sweet to me to steal in secret as her lover, because I feared she would have given them but too readily to her cousin—a lock of her dark brown hair, and the unfinished purse she was netting the night I left home. It is an emblem of my own brief, incomplete career. Perhaps she may live to finish it yet, for Edmund's sake, and we may meet at length where all is perfect and as it should be!"'

"Soft, quiet tears began to glide down Miss Ormond's pale cheek; and I said, 'I do not wonder you should be moved at such an affecting proof of constancy in one so young.' 'Constancy!' repeated she after me, as if it were a word of whose meaning she was doubtful, or had never heard—'Poor Edmund! there are few like him.'

"I began to feel that the scene had gone quite far enough, and to long for a diversion. It was opportunely afforded by the entrance of some of the children; and I hurried away, promising to repeat my visit ere long.

"An invitation from the kind Mr. O. anticipated my intentions. We suited each other; and I became an almost daily guest. Louisa Ormond, whose temporary agitation soon subsided into her wonted sweet serenity, behaved to me with an engaging frankness that quite won my heart, and talked to me so amiably of her lost cousin, that I soon ceased to wonder at his boyish adoration. I was past the age of romance; but not beyond the sphere of its widely spreading influence—and not Edmund himself, in the devotion of eighteen, could soon have outdone his veteran comrade in arms, in his admiration of Louisa Ormond.

"Women in India—idols as they are often made—have a sort of artificial existence, which always acted on me as a repellant. Condemned by the climate to much of the inaction of eastern sultanas, they often seem to emulate their listless inanity. They do not lend, as in England, a charm and a grace to a thousand little domestic duties; nor are there in a monotonous country, and burning climate, external objects to draw forth the sympathies of a cultivated mind. When I roamed with Louisa Ormond to the tomb of Virgil, or the villa of Cicero, I had but to look in her face to see the moral spirit of the scene; its natural beauty reflected both these, and I felt as if I had for the first time, an adequate notion of what a woman might or should be.

"I was soon a lover, and a doting one. All saw it, save Louisa, and all saw it with seeming satisfaction. That of Owenson was open and undisguised, like all his sentiments; but when, at length, I burst the bonds of reserve so natural to a lover of six-and-thirty, and asked him, with faltering voice, and downcast eyes, what hope he could honestly give me of success—he shook his head, and said—"Merton! I wish I could flatter; but it is not my way, and truth is kindness. Louisa Ormond will never love again. Her heart has been crushed and blighted irrecoverably, by the infamous conduct of a villain—but she has affections left, as I and mine can testify, richly worth cultivating; and with time and perseverance, I doubt not her esteem and hand may be yours. If this will content you, my best efforts shall be used to promote your views; but if you insist on more, I advise you to leave Naples without delay. Names and particulars I have solemnly promised never to divulge;

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

indeed, why should I, when all has long since been irrevocably at an end, and the destroyer of her peace married to another? Suffice it that Louisa was engaged to one, base enough to desert her when, from an opulent heiress, she became the orphan of a ruined man! She is too meek to hate—she despises and forgives him—but she does not forget! There are things in life not to be forgotten—and a five years' betrothment to one of the most fascinating of men, even ingratitude and infamy cannot cancel like a dream. But my wife and myself have always said, there might be a balm even for such wounds, in a rational, well-placed attachment; and with you, even we hope Louisa may yet be happy. Give her time—allow for natural repugnance to revive bitter recollections—and all, I trust, will yet be well!

"I shrink from inflicting on myself the torture of describing how all this gradually took place. Why should I? I am not the first who has mistaken gratitude for affection, and the torpor of death for the wholesome slumbers of returning health. Louisa, first shocked, then softened by my importunities, slowly gave way before the sincerity of my affection, the silent participation of her friends, and the forgotten luxury of being understood, appreciated, and idolized. It was amid the delicious exuberance of an Italian spring, that my blossoms of hope slowly expanded; and having lingered at Naples till the heats of summer surprised us, we agreed to pass the sultry season at Sorrentum, and return early in autumn to England, where the claims of relations, and professional business, imperiously demanded my presence.

"I would fain have persuaded Louisa to be mine in Italy—to let the sunny region which had witnessed our first strange meeting, be the scene of our blissful union; but I urged in vain; and with something of superstitious horror she always answered, 'I cannot be married in Italy.' Her friends, like myself, regretted this; as, like me, they had misgivings about her return to England, which they could have wished her to revisit under happier auspices, and a husband's protection; but her reluctance was so deep and unfeigned, that it was impossible not to give way.

"The convenience of transporting the very large family of Mr. O., and the delicacy of Louisa's health, to whom the confinement of a carriage was peculiarly distressing, induced us to resolve on proceeding to England by sea. A large English merchantman was about to sail from Naples, which proved an additional temptation, and we all embarked under the most favourable auspices. The season, however, was somewhat advanced, and the tempests of the Mediterranean are as sudden as violent. One overtook us ere we could clear the Italian coast; and after some days of imminent peril, the captain was glad to find shelter (though far out of his destined course) in the bay of Genoa. My alarm during the storm had been cruelly embittered by the idea of perishing without having received the hand of Louisa, and I flattered myself she too—though serene amidst tempest as at all other times—would have clung to me yet more confidently had our mutual vows been exchanged. At last, I guessed it was so; for when, on a trifling delay seeming likely to occur at Genoa, for repairs to the ship, I again urged our landing, and being married, (should there be an English clergyman in that city,) she ceased to oppose; but with a look of mild resignation, which has haunted me ever since, said, 'It is of no use to struggle, since it is to be.'

"We went ashore the moment the subsiding waves permitted; and almost thought Naples eclipsed by the less extolled magnificence of the site of Genoa la Superba. To me it was all one bright enchanted palace! for there my vows were to be ratified, and my happiness placed beyond the power of fortune and the elements. O vain and foolish mortals! not the fairy castles of an Italian summer heaven, are more false and fugitive than your base projects, and short-sighted hopes!

"I flew to the house of the consul, where, when a clergyman can be procured, English service is performed; and learned with transport, that after a considerable interregnum, there was now an officiating minister, in the person of a beneficed clergyman, travelling for his health, and a temporary resident in Genoa. I acceded (although with the stipulation of absolute privacy) to the consul's polite request that I would, as is customary, use the sanction of his roof for the ceremony. The next day but one was named, and the dean of — duly requested to officiate.

"People talk of presentiments! but to me, elation of mind will ever be the most fearful of presages. I should shudder even yet to see any one so blindly, madly happy, as I was when I had made all these arrangements, and extorted Louisa's sweet, yet reluctant acquiescence in them.

"Those who deal in omens, might have drawn auguries in favour of their belief, from one slight circumstance, which disturbed me. On joining, about ten minutes before the time fixed for the ceremony, the assembled family in the saloon of our inn—a close, ill-aired apartment—I found Louisa, who was too superior to all affectation to feign petty inconvenience, evidently suffering from more than mental agitation, indeed, just recovering from a fainting fit. Seeing me alarmed, she smiled, and assured me her illness had proceeded from a very trifling cause, and was merely occasioned by the overpowering scent of the huge bouquet of orange flowers which the dear children had provided, as indispensable at all continental marriages. We made light of this trifle; but 'trifles light as air' sink into the mind with leaden pressure, when misfortune drives them home!

"The carriage came to the door—I put in Louisa; we both trembled; hers was the chill, nervous anticipation of impending evil; mine, the feverish tremor of hope deferred. My beloved was enveloped in one of the graceful mezzaros of the Genoese ladies, the texture of which, although the finest to be procured, was sufficiently thick to prevent her distinguishing objects, had she even been disposed to look around her. Her thoughts were otherwise occupied at this solemn moment—after silent greetings from the consul's family, we ranged ourselves before the handsome, imposing looking dignitary, whose frigid, aristocratic exterior, inspired me with no great prepossession in his favour. I half regretted my impatience, and grieved that it had defrauded my own venerable white-haired tutor in England, of his sacred office—but it was too late! The ceremony began—it ended! Ere a sentence was accomplished, Louisa lay motionless, and to all appearance, dead, in my arms. The dean of — was the faithless lover, whose perfidy had produced such overwhelming effects upon her mind. That mind was a second time his victim! and I am for life, a sad, solitary bachelor!"

LITERARY NOTICES.

FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS.

THE publication of a further portion of the Letters of Mrs. Montague, of which four volumes have already appeared, will shortly be resumed, under the editorial care of her near relation, Mathew Montague, esq. They will embrace a correspondence with Dr. Johnson, Burke, Malone, George Stevens, Arthur Murphy, Oliver Goldsmith, Windham, Garrick, Young the poet, and most of the wits and critics of the time in which Mrs. Montague lived.

The Garrick papers and letters, from which some interesting extracts have already appeared, will, we are happy to understand, be published in a few days. The most curious, and indeed most valuable portion of the letters, have never yet seen the light. They consist of familiar and critical epistles from Dr. Johnson, and other eminent and highly influential persons, who were contemporaries with the English Roscius. They will be illustrated with notes by a gentleman well acquainted with the literature and the arts of that period.

Allan Cunningham's History of the British Painters, is entirely out of print, nearly ten thousand copies having been sold. The freedom taken with the works of certain artists, and the spirit of independence, manifested in favour of art generally, has occasioned the work to be extremely popular.

The value of the copyright of dramas has been exceedingly diminished within the last twenty years. Formerly five hundred pounds, and, in one or two instances, nearly a thousand pounds, have been given by a bookseller for a successful play; and in those days three hundred pounds was the minimum price. Now, there is scarcely an instance where a bookseller has been bold enough to give fifty pounds, that the result of the sale has not terminated in a loss.

Richard Lander, the faithful attendant of the late lamented Captain Clapperton, during his last African expedition, has been ever since his return sedulously engaged in preparing for the press, an account of his own wanderings and personal adventures in that inhospitable clime, which are reported to be of a very novel description. With what intensity the spirit of enterprise and travel animates the heart of this young man, may be conceived from the fact that, though he was the only survivor of the expedition under Captain Clapperton, he has just undertaken a commission from government to proceed again to the same mysterious and perilous region, on a mission to explore the course of the Niger.

A third edition of the Laconics is in the London press, and will soon be published.

LESLIE.—In Blackwood's Magazine for December, there is a review of the London Annuals for the present year, in which the fine print of our countryman Leslie, in the Amulet, is noticed as follows:—"Is this from some divine picture of one of the inspired masters of old, the Sisters of Bethany? No: the picture is by a living power—one who will take his place among the immortals; for the name of Leslie will never die while genius is hallowed on earth, and held in reverential remembrance. We wish that we—even we—had been asked to try to express some of the emotions that flow back and forwards in our soul, to and from that holy conception, so holily realized; yet, perhaps, it is better not, for feeling with us has not always words at will; and the sight of the Saviour addressing Mary and Martha has touched a chord in a female heart that gives forth excellent music—though music from no mortal lips can worthily hymn the benignity imagined there."

GLASS.—Professor Farady, of London, continues to make progress in bringing his method of manufacturing glass for optical purposes to perfection. It is one of the most important advantages of his plan, that he can make his new glass free from flaw with greater certainty in large pieces than in small. He has just finished two disks of the largest size his present furnace will allow, viz. seven inches square. One of these is about to be ground and fitted to a telescope of twenty-five feet tube; and he is preparing to construct a larger furnace, that will furnish pieces of perfect flint glass of still larger dimensions.

THE RAIL ROAD.—The rail road from Pratt-street to the Carrollton viaduct presented on Saturday a scene of enlivened and animating interest. A vast crowd of persons, attracted by the beauty and mildness of the day, and a number of members of congress, including several members of the committee on internal improvement, visited the road, and enjoyed the pleasure and novelty of a ride in the cars. The members of congress, accompanied by several of the directors of the rail road company, making a party of about twenty persons, were conveyed from the commencement of the road to the bridge in about seven minutes. The distance between the bridge and the road was traversed by the car, on its return, with an increased number of passengers, in exactly five minutes. This is computed to have been at the rate of sixteen miles an hour. A train of four carriages, containing from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and thirty-five passengers, and making an aggregate weight of twelve tons and a half, was then drawn to the bridge by a single horse, at the rate of seven or eight miles an hour. We extract from the American of this morning the following further particulars:—When the members arrived on the ground, the carriages were absent on a trip to the viaduct. This afforded them an opportunity of examining the road, and the manner in which the rails are laid; and by the time these examinations were concluded, the carriages returned in handsome style, the first two containing about sixty passengers, drawn by one horse, and the remaining three, also drawn by one horse, with about eighty passengers. The great ease and rapidity with which these trains were seen to move, excited admiration and even astonishment in the minds of the spectators; and, in the language of some who had not before personally witnessed the advantages possessed by rail roads, tended more directly to establish the fact of those advantages by this single practical exhibition, than whole volumes of theory. An active business was done by the carriages on Saturday, the number of persons who were present in the afternoon alone being upwards of a thousand. Of course, many who went for a ride were obliged to return without being gratified.

STEAM CARRIAGES.—Even with a velocity of thirty miles an hour, journeys would be performed with a rapidity, the very thought of which makes the head giddy. In the latitude of St. Petersburg or Stockholm, a person starting at sunrise in June from the western part of Europe, and travelling at this rate westward, would add one hour to his day! Supposing the vehicle to proceed at half the velocity during the night, six hundred miles could be passed over in twenty-four hours. Three days would thus carry the traveller from Calais to Constantinople; and four days would suffice to transport him from the midst of civilization in Amsterdam, to a Tartar horde on the banks of the Wolga! Mr. Gurney has not entered into any specific contract as to the time for "the entry" of his steam-coaches on any line of road. We have heard that a stage waggon is now constructing on the same principle, which will carry fifteen tons, and go at the rate of six miles an hour.

THE RAMBLER.

AN HOUR AT THE READING-ROOM.

—“Got thee glass eyes,
—And like a scurvy politician, seem —To see the things thou dost not.”

THE press—the newspaper press—is a very fine thing; there is no denying that. It says itself that it is a “great moral engine,” the “destroyer of darkness and despotism,” the “disseminator of light and knowledge,” the “nurse of freedom,” in fact, the sovereign remedy for the numerous disorders to which this incurable old world is and has so long been subject; and it surely ought to know, for it lays claim to much infallibility. But, in simple truth, it must be owned that these “moral engines” do at times contain a little more roguery, quackery, calumny, sycophancy, amazing impudence, and monstrous misrepresentations, than is to be found anywhere else in a printed shape; but at the same time the press does not consider this as in any way detracting from the high character to which it coolly lays claim. Shakspeare, emphatically enough, uses the term “measureless liar;” but in our day to say that a man “lied like a newspaper at election time,” would be more emphatic still. No derelictions from truth can possibly exceed in variety and monstrosity the editorial department at this sinful period; and no lover ever more willingly believed his mistress against the evidence of his senses, than do political partisans their favourite journals on such occasions. Common sense is at discount, and its quiet appeal stands but a slender chance of being heard amid the hectoring, bullying tumult of popular commotion; while reason and reflection go together to the bottom in the storm of roaringrodomontade and furious declamation, which is raging all around. But the most decidedly amusing thing is, after all is over, the fools duped and the rogues rewarded, the way in which the different journalists come forward and declare, with an air of virtuous sincerity, that “the conduct of the press, during the late election, has been highly disreputable, and cannot fail to prejudice the country in the eyes of foreign nations!”

In England there prevails a custom to a much greater extent than here, which considerably heightens the ridiculous on those occasions, namely, of affixing mottoes to the head of the several prints. These, for the most part, consist of trite and moderate truisms, and nothing can be more striking than the contrast between the political text at the beginning, and the comment upon it in the body of the journal. For example, one of the most violent party papers in the united kingdom is headed, “party is the madness of many for the gain of a few!” Another, “open to all parties and influenced by none,” when it is notorious that it is pledged to support a certain faction and their doctrines, right or wrong. But the most inappropriate of all with which to preface these lying vehicles, is at the same time the most common, to wit, “truth is mighty and will prevail!” The force of contrast can go no further.

Whatever be the evil of newspapers, they are, however, a thousand fold overbalanced by the good of which they are productive. Here, on one small table, lies the daily history of this busy world! In the olden times, years elapsed before the most important events travelled beyond the narrow bounds of the country in which they occurred; and a pilgrim from the Holy Land was the only gazette from which our forefathers could ascertain the list of killed, wounded, and promotions. Now, all that passes on earth or ocean is assiduously gathered into these little sheets, and placed before a man every morning as regularly as his breakfast: at least it is so in this part of the globe. Further westward they are subject to greater vicissitudes, and the stream of knowledge is there withheld from the thirsty inhabitants for reasons the most ludicrous and contradictory. At one time the conductor of a paper has no paper on which to print his paper, or no money, or his family is sick, or his journeyman is drunk, or he has to get in his crop of hay, or plant his field of corn, and a hundred other excuses that sound very strange to the denizens of crowded cities. An Ohio editor, a little while ago, quietly informed his subscribers that he had taken unto himself a wife, and that his wife insisted upon a jaunt into the country, consequently no paper could be published until his return; and the world and its concerns were actually brought to a stand-still with the inhabitants of this district until the hen-pecked editor got through his honey-moon. Another, in Indiana, took the judicious precaution of telling his patrons that “he could not promise regularity,” but pledged his word that his paper should be published “now and then!” Indeed, it seems they there make newspapers just when and how they please, and the proprietors “trade them out” so much news for so much pork, or anything else they may want in the way of household necessaries. The number of different journals in these states is often boasted of as a matter of pride, though if two-thirds of them were swept away, and the remainder circulated three times the number of copies each, a much more respectable and independent press would be the consequence. Numbers of them are worse than nothing; and the public patronage is divided into so many channels that the conductors of each have to fight and wrangle, and beg and pray, for their several shares, in a most unseemly manner; and many of them are so afraid of offending (in local matters especially,) and losing what little they have, that they write not what they think, but what they think will please; thus sacrificing integrity to interest in a way by no means honest or creditable, or reconcilable with the tremendous noise they make about their independence.

This has been called the “age of bronze,” the “age of cant,” the “age of quackery,” and a number of ages besides, but the “age of magazines and newspapers” is perhaps as characteristic a title as any other; and they, together with novels, light literature, quotation dictionaries, and “learning-made-easy” works in every branch of science, are certainly exercising a wide influence over the public such as it is. The fact is, the world is getting very wise. The springs of knowledge are opening on every side; and it is the opinion of many that in a short space of time, there will be no such thing as a foolish person on the face of the earth. The old heathen fable of the goddess of wisdom springing fully armed and matured from the head of Jupiter, is a type of the present times; and it is really astonishing to mark the preternatural acquisition of wisdom going on all around. Study is unnecessary, and time and labour are almost annihilated. You will meet people who are perfect dunces at the latter end of January, and before the middle of March they are poets, philosophers, metaphysicians, literary lions, or what not. The process is simple: it is only necessary to attend two or three courses of popular lectures, read a few of the latest fashionable novels, the reviews, the magazines, and you are straightway one of the wise men of the year 1830. It might be thought that there is something superficial in all this; but the confidence with which every one supports his own opinions, and the contempt he evinces for all who lived before him, or differ from him, is the best proof of the solidity and superiority of his own intellectual endowments. Many, indeed, think themselves wiser than either Solomon or Shakspeare, for the excellent reason that these two worthies knew nothing of gas or steam-boats; and they have a way of considering all the inventions of the age as adding so much to their individual merits; at every new discovery exclaiming, “astonishing! what wonderful fellows we are!” If there is any truth in the line—

these are truly awful times. No one is totally destitute, and the mystery of making a little go a great way was never so thoroughly understood, or so universally practised as now. Literary men who associate only with their equals, know nothing about the quantity of superficial information and genuine ignorance afloat in general society; and the manner in which hundreds without an original and scarcely an acquired idea, contrive to pass for well-informed people, is truly mysterious. The neglect of all but living authors is astonishing; and if any young man, along with the current literature of the day, has contrived to peruse Pope's Essay on Man, Goldsmith's Deserted Village, Gray's Elegy, Young's Night Thoughts, and Thomson's Seasons, he is looked upon as a “little superior to any thing going,” in the literary way, a “real smart fellow,” and a great reader. To say nothing of the graver works of history, which it is the duty of all to make themselves familiar with, there are hundreds, with no very modest pretensions either, who know no more of Dryden than his “Alexander's Feast,” and that only because it forms a component part of almost every school-book; or of Pope, further than his Essay, which for some reason or other has acquired a more extended reputation than that of his other works; or Swift or Butler; and of such poets as Massinger, Ben Jonson, Beaumont, and Fletcher, they are completely ignorant. Even Shakspeare is little known amongst this class except by his acting plays, and of these I have heard some quote with great satisfaction, passages as worthy of particular admiration, which, after all, were only the interpolations of Tate and Cibber. Notwithstanding this, they will spend time enough in devouring every new production, good, bad, or indifferent, that is issued from the press, though it might, perhaps, be rather difficult to tell wherein consists the superior profit and pleasure to be derived from Devereux and Horace Smith, in preference to Sterne, Fielding, and Smollett. It has become a case of necessity for those who desire to maintain or acquire any sort of a book-reading reputation to peruse every Waverley novel on its first appearance; yet it is to be doubted if these immortal works are by great numbers more than half appreciated; at least it is very amusing to hear the common remark, that “they like all the Waverley novels excepting the Scotch,” and to observe the preference almost invariably given to Ivanhoe, Kenilworth, and those written in pure English. Poor Burns is another, it is to be feared, more talked of than read; at least there are hundreds that chatter about his being a great poet, who, when asked what he has written, will answer, “Auld lang syne,” and “Bruce's Address,” and beyond this they know little, and care less. One gentleman in particular I knew, who on the strength of having read his “Cotter's Saturday-night” through, pretended an overweening admiration for him, and affirmed (truly enough) that his songs were the best of songs; yet on afterwards hearing repeated the following lines from perhaps the finest of them, breathing as it does the very soul of delicate, impassioned tenderness and mournful recollection—

“How sweetly bloomed the gay, green birk,
How rich the hawthorn's blossom,
As underneath their fragrant shade
I clasped her to my bosom!
The golden hours, on angel wings,
Flew o'er me and my dearie,
For dear to me, as light and life,
Was my sweet Highland Mary,”

he very innocently inquired, “whose is that?” Perhaps the beautiful address of Halleck to the wild rose of Alloway, has done more for the fame of Burns in this country with thousands, than the glorious works of the poet himself.

Altogether, the publications of the day are in a great degree sought after and read, to the exclusion of the approved and standard authors of former times; and though many of them are well deserving attention, perhaps of all the host of clever authors that have sprung up in England within the last twenty years, the works of Scott, Byron, Moore, Wordsworth, and Campbell, will alone be familiar in the mouths of succeeding generations. Coleridge is indeed a splendid poet, but the “Ancient Mariner” and “Cristabel,” though replete with passages of wonderful power, will never, it is to be feared, be popular poems. C.

EXTRACT FROM A JOURNAL.

NATURE is full not only of beauties but of wonders. She has common charms to strike every eye whenever the understanding is sufficiently matured to remark ordinary appearances. The spirit of the observer finds itself in a vast arena decorated by an invisible hand with sweet, impressive, and sublime splendour. His imagination can frame nothing beyond. But study lends him new faculties. It enlarges his comprehension. It multiplies and expands his capacities, and he is led on from this spacious temple of glory, into others deeper, wider, more magnificent. He penetrates into the inner regions of her system, and becomes acquainted by means of scientific calculations and instruments, with her forms, causes, and elemental structure. There is a singular satisfaction in the belief that every thing around, being the production of a mighty intelligence, possesses mysteries and value unseen by the common eye. These discoveries render the progress of knowledge a continual series of triumphs. In the shaded light and unbroken quiet of his closet, enterprises are formed by the student, and brought into operation to explore the undiscovered worlds in science. Labour is endured, arduous struggles continued, and victories at length accomplished.

One accustomed to this species of reflection, finds companionship in the most solitary ramble. The objects and incidents of the country, the trees and various plants of the wood, the animals and insects which cross his way, have all a meaning. He communes with nature in a kind of language in which she continually unfolds to his comprehension some pleasing secret, some cunning and admirable purpose, some soft beauty, or wonderful and perfect machinery. She is full of treasures—beautiful and hidden treasures. The accidental fracture of a stone reveals the pure flashing crystal embodied in the coarse fragment. I remember one mellow summer afternoon, how delighted I was during a long perambulation upon this island. I had become fatigued with exertions, and the bustle and confinement of business produced a feverish excitement, which I suddenly resolved to soothe by treating myself to a holiday. In a little time I had left the brawling crowd with its rushing, thundering, and discordant tumults far behind, and my very soul rested in the dear and grateful quiet and freshness of nature. The hum of the great city came sometimes with the breeze, but it was mingled into a drowsy and subdued murmur, which pleased me like music. On I went, over hill and dale, seeking out the loneliest spots; sometimes crossing the shadows of a forest, and again tracing the silvery windings of a brook. A release from hateful restraint had given my mind an impulse verging, perhaps, to the opposite extreme. I was dreamily disposed to put the cold thoughts of the world to sleep, and yield myself to the influence of imagination. I was therefore at no pains to correct the errors of fancy, but believed for the time that the voice of the waters told of conscious mirth and purity, that the stirring branches were agitated with an emotion of enjoyment, that the speckled fish, glistening through the stream, darted with the joy of careless bliss and beauty, and that the motions every where perceptible around, sprang from feelings similar to those of human beings. A large bee swept by me upon murmuring wings. What a beautiful creature! His gorgeous apparel might shame a king; and what a poet's life is his! To extract the distilled and precious juices from the bosom of fresh flowers—to be for ever among purling brooks, velvet leaves, and fragrant places. Then along the water I observed strange plants fringing its borders. Many of them are considered worthless. I recalled the lines of the friar in Romeo and Juliet, which I had read a hundred times with never-tiring pleasure.

"The grey-eyed morn smiles on the frowning night,
Checking the eastern clouds with streaks of light;
And flecked darkness like a drunkard reels
From forth day's path-way, made by Titan's wheels:
Now ere the sun advance his burning eye,
The day to cheer, and night's dank dew to dry,
I must fill up this orier cage of ours,
With baleful weeds, and precious-juiced flowers.
Many for many virtues excellent;
None but for some, and yet all different.
O, mickle is the powerful grace, that lies
In herbs, plants, stones, and their true qualities;
For naught so vile that on the earth doth live,
But to the earth some special good do give;
Nor aught so good, but, strain'd from that fair use,
Revolts from true birth, stumbling on abuse;
Virtue itself turns vice, being misapplied;
And vice sometimes by actions dignified.
Within the infant rind of this small flower
Poison hath residence, and medicine power:
For this being smelt, with that part cheers each part;
Being tasted, slays all senses with the heart.
Two such opposed foes encamp them still
In man as well as herbs, grace and rude will.
And where the worse is predominant,
Full soon the canker death eats up the plant."

These lines passed through my mind as I gazed along the range of various plants with whose properties I was unacquainted, and the rough fragments of rock which had probably lain there uninterruptedly for thousands of years, since they had been thus scattered about by some vast convulsion. And as I remembered all the fair essences, the rich sweets, the ripe delicious fruits, which were distilled out of the coarse earth and invisible air by the ordinary operation of nature, I could not but indulge the idea that the time would perhaps arrive when new and more precious juices would be extracted from the materials now trodden carelessly under foot. Fragrance to shame myrrh and frankincense, wines of more exquisite flavour and refined exhilaration, and medicines to diminish the benumbing and awful diseases which prey upon my fellow-creatures, and thus to contract the extent of the dominion which anguish now exercises over the world.

The sun was setting. He had been obscured by several dark blue clouds, edged with a line more brilliant than silver. Gradually they changed into fantastic forms and burning tinges, till as his golden orb emerged from the heavy masses, his crimson floods streamed through the trees upon the level sward. The sky reddened with his expiring splendour, which touched even the distant east with dashes of rosy painting, then slowly descending, his dazzling disk disappeared calmly as a high immortal spirit bowed in death.

Light is a mystery, as well as a beauty. Whether it is a fluid in itself, or only the vibration of another ethereal matter, has been the subject of discussion among the learned; yet they have detected many of its extraordinary properties, sufficient to increase their wonder to a very high degree. With its visible and ordinary qualities all are acquainted. They have watched it sleeping upon the blue ocean, and filling the great circle of the sky; the rainbow, the leaf of the flower, the unfolding hues of the cataract, the capricious flashes of the diamond, are so common as to be no longer the topics of remark, scarcely of notice. But suppose some being created upon a summer night, with developed faculties, wondering at himself and all around, with what sensations would he witness this beautiful wonder breaking over sky and earth. What an incomprehensible essence; how divine in its shape and attributes. Is it not a gift worthy of a God? It comes upon the heavens like the messenger of a Deity, a sign of his existence, and a token of his nature. It is a language in which the universe is revealed. But a closer examination unfolds new subjects of astonishment. How delicately are its secret rays interwoven with each other; how they are blended in innumerable and ever-varying combinations; how fine must each particle be. A single fact will partially illustrate my meaning. By the aid of the microscope you discover that many atoms of matter are themselves worlds for other living, breathing beings. Millions of them together would not form a point visible to the naked eye. Each one of these is organized as perfectly as an elephant, with the various corporeal members necessary for the common functions of life; a heart beats in his bosom, and veins conduct the blood through the different parts of his body. The blood which circulates through his system is a fluid. Science teaches that a fluid is composed of balls which must be to the creature itself nearly as a grain of sand is to the world. Yet this fluid is transparent, and consequently through the interstices of these particles the rays must pass, each being composed of seven different rays, and each of those subject to different degrees of refraction.

The motion of this singular body is in the opposite extreme, and where the other perplexes the mind with an idea of minuteness difficult to comprehend, this astonishes by the conception of vastness which it occasions. Nature works equally with unlimited power upon a large or small scale, and conceals prodigies as extraordinary in the portion too small for sight, and in that too great and distant. The motion of the earth is startling, and it is difficult to realize the idea that we revolve around her axis at the rate of a thousand miles an hour. Her course around the sun is yet more incomprehensible, as she advances nineteen miles upon her orbit in one second, or, sixty-eight thousand miles an hour. But this is the pace of a snail compared with the velocity of light, which traverses one hundred and ninety-two thousand miles in one second, or, one billion three hundred and eighty-eight millions, eight hundred and eighty thousand miles in two hours! The reader, unless accustomed to numbers, cannot realize the amount of a billion by the mere mention of the name. If a person were to count one hundred every minute, and to continue at work ten hours each day, he could not reckon a million in less than seventeen days. It would take him forty-five thousand years to count a billion, and mathematicians tell us if we suppose the whole earth to be peopled as Britain, and to have been so from creation, and that the whole race of mankind had constantly been telling from a heap of a quadrillion of dollars, they would have scarcely yet reckoned the thousandth part of that quantity. Yet light, moving at the rate of more than a billion of miles in two hours, strikes the eye, "the softest and the frailest thing" in nature; for whose sensibility there is no name, and is thus reflected with a touch so delicate as to occasion only a pleasure. A ray of light comes from the nearest fixed star in a year. There are others from which it travels in a million of years, and here the region of human ken terminates. Nothing can penetrate the immense void beyond but imagination. From these stupendous regions how strange it is for the human being to picture himself "crawling between heaven and earth," moved with anger, hate, envy, and pride. To come back again to the little difficulties, the vain triumphs, the brief small circumstances of life, to converse with a coquette, a fop, a "dog in office," to mingle with the promiscuous crowd of creatures who call themselves lords of creation.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

IRISH ANECDOTE.

In the autumn of 1825, some private affairs called me into the sister kingdom; and as I did not travel, like Polyphemus, with my eye out, I gathered a few samples of Irish character, amongst which was the following incident.

I was standing one morning at the window of "mine inn," when my attention was attracted by a scene that took place beneath. The Belfast coach was standing at the door, and on the roof, in front, sat a solitary outside passenger, a fine young fellow, in the uniform of the Connaught rangers. Below, by the front wheel, stood an old woman, seemingly his mother, a young man, and a younger woman, sister or sweetheart; and they were all earnestly entreating the young soldier to descend from his seat on the coach.

"Come down wid ye, Thady," the speaker was the old woman. "Come down now to your ould mother. Sure it's flog ye they will, and strip the flesh off the bones I giv ye. Come down Thady, darlin'!"

"It's honour, mother," was the short reply of the soldier; and with clenched hands and set teeth, he took a stiffer posture on the coach.

"Thady, come down—come down now ye fool of the world—come along down wid ye!" The tone of the present appeal was more promptly and sternly pronounced: "It's honour, brother!" and the body of the speaker rose more rigidly erect than ever on the roof.

"O Thady, come down! sure it's me, your own Kathleen, that bids ye. Come down, or ye'll break the heart of me, Thady, jewel; come down, then!" The poor girl wrung her hands as she said it, and cast a look upward, that had a visible effect on the muscles of the soldier's countenance. There was more tenderness in his tone, but it conveyed the same resolution as before.

"It's honour, honour bright, Kathleen!" and, as if to defend himself from another glance, he fixed his look steadfastly in front, while the renewed entreaties burst from all three in chorus, with the same answer.

"Come down, Thady, honey!—Thady, ye fool, come down!—O Thady, come down to me!"

"It's honour, mother!—It's honour, brother!—Honour bright, my own Kathleen!"

Although the poor fellow was a private, this appeal was so public, that I did not hesitate to go down and inquire into the particulars of the distress. It appeared that he had been home on furlough, to visit his family, and having exceeded, as he thought, the term of his leave, he was going to rejoin his regiment, and to undergo the penalty of his neglect. I asked him when the furlough expired.

"The first of March, your honour—bad luck to it of all the black days in the world—and here it is, come sudden on me like a shot!"

"The first of March!—why, my good fellow, you have a day to spare then—the first of March will not be here till to-morrow. It is leap year, and February has twenty-nine days."

The soldier was thunder-struck. "Twenty-nine days is it!—You're sartin of that same!—Oh, mother, mother!—ill luck fly away wid yere ould almanack—a base cratur of a book, to be deceaven one, after living so long in the family of us!"

His first impulse was to cut a caper on the roof of the coach, and throw up his cap, with a loud hurrah! His second was to throw himself into the arms of his Kathleen, and the third was to wring my hand off in an acknowledgment.

"It's a happy man I am, your honour, for my word's saved, and all by your honour's means. Long life to your honour for the same! May ye live a long hundred—and leap-years every one of them!" Hood's Comic Annual.

SATIRE ON EMIGRATION.

"Squampash Flats, 9th November, 1827.

"DEAR BROTHER,—Here we are, thank heaven, safe and well, and in the finest country you ever saw. At this moment I have before me the sublime expanse of Squampash flats—the majestic Mudiboo winding through the mist—with the magnificent range of the Squab mountains in the distance. But the prospect is impossible to describe in a letter! I might as well attempt a panorama in a pill-box! We have fixed our settlement on the left bank of the river. In crossing the rapids we lost most of our heavy baggage, and all our iron work: but by great good fortune we saved Mrs. Paisley's grand piano and the children's toys. Our infant city consists of three log-huts and one of clay, which, however, on the second day, fell in to the ground landlord. We have now built it up again; and, all things considered, are as comfortable as we could expect, and have christened our settlement New London, in compliment to the old metropolis. We have one of the log-houses to ourselves—or at least we shall have when we have built a new pig-sty. We burnt down the first one in making a bonfire to keep off the wild beasts, and for the present the pigs are in the parlour. As yet our rooms are rather usefully than elegantly furnished. We have hollowed the grand upright, and it makes a convenient cupboard; the chairs were obliged to blaze at our bivouacs, but, thank fortune, we have never leisure to sit down, and so do not miss them. My boys are contented, and will be well when they have got over some awkward accidents in lopping and felling. Mrs. H. grumbles a little, but it is her custom to lament most when she is in the midst of comforts. She complains of solitude, and says she could enjoy the very stiffest of stiff visits. The first time we lighted a fire in our new abode, a large serpent came down the chimney, which I looked upon as a good omen. However, as Mrs P. is not partial to snakes, and the heat is supposed to attract those reptiles, we have dispensed with fires ever since. As for wild beasts, we hear them howling and roaring round the fence every night from dusk till daylight, but we have only been inconvenienced by one lion. The first time he came, in order to get rid of the brute peaceably, we turned out an old ewe, with which he was well satisfied; but ever since he comes to us as regular as clock-work for his mutton; and if we do not soon contrive to cut his acquaintance, we shall hardly have a sheep in the flock. It would have been easy to shoot him, being well provided with muskets; but Barnaby mistook our remnant of gunpowder for onion seed, and sowed it all in the kitchen garden. We did try to trap him into a pit-fall, but after twice catching Mrs. P. and every one of the children in turn, it was given up. They are now, however, perfectly at ease about the animal, for they never stir out of doors at all; and, to make them quite comfortable, I have blocked up all the windows and barricaded the door. We have lost only one of our number since we came; namely, Diggory, the market-gardener, from Glasgow, who went out one morning to botanise, and never came back. I am much surprised at his absconding, as he had nothing but a spade to go off with. Chippendale, the carpenter, was sent after him, but did not return; and Gregory, the smith, has been out after him these two days. I have just dispatched Mudge, the herdsman, to look for all three, and hope he will soon give a good account of them, as they are the most useful men in the whole settlement, and, in fact, indispensable to its existence. The river Mudiboo is deep and rapid, and said to swarm with alligators, though I have heard but of three being seen at one time, and none of those above eighteen feet long; this, however, is immaterial, as we do not use the river fluid, which is thick and dirty, but draw all our water from natural wells and tanks. Poisonous springs are rather common, but are easily distinguished by containing no fish or living animal. Those, however, which swarm with frogs, toads, newts, eels, &c. are harmless, and may be safely used for culinary purposes. In short, I know of no drawback but one, which, I am sanguine, may be got over hereafter, and do earnestly hope and advise, if things are no better in England than when I left, you, and as many as you can persuade, will sell off all, and come over to this African paradise. The drawback I speak of is this; although I have never seen any one of the creatures, it is too certain that the mountains are inhabited by a race of monkeys, whose cunning and mischievous talents exceed even the most incredible stories of the tribe. No human art or vigilance seems of avail; we have planned ambuscades, and watched night after night, but no attempt has been made; yet the moment the guard was relaxed, we were stripped without mercy. I am convinced they must have had spies night and day on our motions, yet so secretly and cautiously, that no glimpse of one has yet been seen by any of our people. Our last crop was cut and carried off with the precision of an English harvesting. Our spirit stores (you will be amazed to hear that these creatures pick locks with the dexterity of London burglars) have been broken open and ransacked, though half the establishment were on the watch; and the brutes have been off to their mountains, five miles distant, without even the dogs giving an alarm. I could almost persuade myself at times, such are their supernatural knowledge, swiftness, and invisibility, that we have to contend with evil spirits. I long for your advice, to refer to on this subject. I am, dear Philip, your loving brother. AMEROSÉ MAWE.

"P.S.—Since writing the above, you will be concerned to hear the body of poor Diggory has been found, horribly mangled by wild beasts. The fate of Chippendale, Gregory, and Mudge, is no longer doubtful. The old lion has brought the lioness, and the sheep being all gone, they have made a joint attack upon the bullock-house. The Mudiboo has overflowed, and Squampash flats are a swamp. I have just discovered that the monkeys are my own rascals, that I brought out from England. We are coming back as fast as we can." Ibid.

THE STEAM ENGINE.

The following animated description of the powers of the steam engine is from the pen of Dr. Arnolt, in his work on the Elements of Physics.—"In the present perfect state of the steam engine, it appears a thing almost endowed with intelligence. It regulates with perfect accuracy and uniformity the number of its strokes in a given time, and counts or records them, moreover, to tell how much work it has done, as a clock records the beats of its pendulum; it regulates the quantity of steam admitted to work; the briskness of the fire; the supply of the coals to the fire. It opens and shuts its valves, with absolute precision as to time and manner; it oils its joints; it takes out any air which may accidentally enter into parts that should be vacuum; and when any thing goes wrong, which it cannot of itself rectify, it warns its attendants by ringing a bell! Yet, with all these talents and qualities, and even when possessing the power of six hundred horses, it is obedient to the hand of a child. Its aliment is coal, wood, charcoal, or other combustible materials; it consumes none while idle; it never tires, and wants no sleep; it is not subject to malady when originally well made, and only refuses to work when worn out with age. It is equally active in all climates, and will do work of any kind—it is a water-pumper, a miner, a sailor, a printer, a cotton-spinner, a weaver, a blacksmith, a miller, &c.; and a small engine, in the character of a steam-pony, may be seen dragging after it on a rail-road a hundred tons of merchandise or a regiment of soldiers, with greater speed than that of our fleetest coaches. It is the king of machines, and a permanent realization of the genii of eastern fable, whose supernatural powers were occasionally at the command of man."

PHYSICAL EDUCATION.

To illustrate the beneficial effects produced on muscular strength, on health, and on the animal spirits, by temperance and exercise, reference is made to the system of training which is practised in Europe, to prepare men for boxing. The results attributed to this system are almost incredible.

"The period of daily exercise abroad is at least four hours, and within doors at least two hours. A prominent object is to keep the body and mind constantly occupied through the day. No ardent spirits are allowed. The food is small in quantity. Eight hours of sleep are allowed; and temperance in all things strictly enjoined. By these means, it is said, the appetite becomes uniformly good, the mind cheerful, the strength astonishingly increased, and the sleep sound and refreshing. The lungs become strong, the skin smooth, and the spirits lively. The bones become hard like ivory, and not easily broken. The form is improved, the movements are graceful, and life itself much prolonged."

However exaggerated the effects which are thus ascribed to the system of training, may appear to those who have paid no attention to the subject, we are perfectly convinced that were the same plan which is pursued with the view of fitting individuals for a demoralizing exhibition of brute force, to be generally adopted as a means of improving the health and vigour of the constitution, man would be in a great measure emancipated from physical suffering, and his existence, with the full possession of his active powers, prolonged far beyond what is now esteemed the utmost bounds of human life. LETTER WRITING.

Pope's letters, though extremely elegant, are failures as letters. He wrote them to the world, not to his friends; and they have therefore, very much the air of universal secrets. Swift has recorded his own sour mind in many a bitter epistle; and his correspondence remains a stern and brief chronicle of the time in which he lived. Cowper has unwittingly beguiled us of many a long hour, by his letters to Lady Hesketh, and in them we see the fluctuations of his melancholy nature more plainly than in all the biographical dissertations of his affectionate editor. But we must not make catalogues, nor indulge longer in this eulogy on letter writing. We take a particular interest, we confess, in what is thus spoken aside, as it were, and without a consciousness of being overheard; and there is a spirit and freedom in the tone of works written for the post, which is scarcely ever to be found in those written for the press. We are more edified by one letter of Cowper than we should be by a week's confinement and hard labour in the metaphysical Bridewell of Mr. Coleridge; and a single letter from the pen of Gray is worth all the pedler-reasoning of Mr. Wordsworth's Eternal Recluse, from the hour he first squats himself down in the sun, to the end of his preaching. In the first, we have the light, unstudied pleasantries of a wit and a man of feeling—in the last, we are talked out of all patience by an arrogant old proser, and buried in a heap of the most perilous stuff and the most dusty philosophy. NAPOLEON AND ISABEY.

I called one morning on Isabey to see his fine collection of portraits, which have now, in a great measure, become historical. I found him in his atelier, working upon that splendid picture which is destined to connect the name of the artist with most of the distinguished characters of his day.* In a moment I found myself surrounded by the almost living likenesses of all the celebrated men and beautiful women at that time assembled in Vienna. I saw the portrait of young Napoleon, which Isabey was just finishing, when I first met him at Schœnbrunn; also a likeness of the prince de Ligne, animated by all the fine expression of the original, and a full-length of Napoleon himself, walking in the gardens of Malmaison. "Then he really had the habit of walking with his arms crossed in this manner?" said I. "Unquestionably," replied Isabey; "and that together with his other remarkable habit of stooping his head, at one time, well nigh proved very fatal to me. During the consulate, I had been dining one day with some of Bonaparte's young aides-de-camp at Malmaison. After dinner we went out on the lawn fronting the Chateau, to play at leap-frog, you know that was a favourite college game of ours. I had leaped over the heads of several of my companions, when a little further on, beneath an avenue of trees, I saw another, apparently waiting for me in the requisite position. Thinking I had not completed my task, I ran forward, but unfortunately missed my mark, springing only to the height of his neck, I knocked him down, and we both rolled along the ground to the distance of at least six yards. What was my horror on discovering that the victim of my unlucky blunder was no other than Bonaparte himself! At that period he had not even dreamed of the possibility of a fall; and this first lesson was naturally calculated to rouse his indignation in the utmost degree. Foaming with rage, he rose and drew his sword, and had I not proved myself a better runner than a leaper, I have no doubt but he would soon have made an end of me. He pursued me as far as the ditch, which I speedily cleared, and, fortunately for me, he did not think fit to follow my example. I proceeded straight to Paris, and so great was my alarm, that I scarcely ventured to look behind me until I reached the gates of the Tuileries. I immediately ascended to Madame Bonaparte's apartments, for the persons of the household were accustomed to admit me at all times. On seeing my agitation, Josephine at first concluded that I was the bearer of some fatal news. I related my adventure, which, in spite of my distress, appeared to her so irresistibly comic, that she burst into a fit of laughter. When her merriment had somewhat subsided, she promised, with her natural kindness of heart, to intercede with the consul in my behalf. But knowing her husband's irascible temper, she advised me to keep out of the way until she should have an opportunity of appeasing him, which to her was no very difficult task, for at that time Napoleon loved her most tenderly. Indeed, her angelic disposition always gave her a powerful ascendancy over him, and she was frequently the means of averting those acts of violence, to which his ungovernable temper would otherwise have driven him.

"On my return home, I found lying on my table an order not to appear again at the Tuileries: and it was during my temporary retirement, that I finished the portrait you were just now looking at. Madame Bonaparte, on presenting it to the consul, obtained my pardon and my recall to court. The first time Bonaparte saw me after this affair was in Josephine's apartments, and, stepping up to me good-naturedly, he patted me on the cheek, saying, 'Really, sir, if people will play tricks, they ought at least to do them cleverly: 'oh heaven!' said Josephine, laughing, 'if you had seen his look of terror, when he first presented himself to me, you would have thought him sufficiently punished for his intended feat of agility.'"

Isabey related this anecdote with all his peculiar animation and drollery; and he accompanied the story with such expressive gestures and attitudes, that he seemed to bring the whole scene visibly before me. I could imagine I saw Napoleon rising from the ground, to vent his rage, like angry Jupiter hurling his thunderbolts. Trar. Jour.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.

This expression is familiar to us all, and is even habitually used in governments where the press, so far from being free, is under a strict imprimatur, a vigilant censorship, and an unqualified veto of the lordlings of the land, as to the matter of publication, whether of a theological, political, or moral character. Yet there they talk, print, and even boast of the liberty of the press. On the other hand, some suppose, and even assert, through the medium of its columns, that their press is free, because the editors with impunity indulge in the most licentious course, and pour on the government or heads of individuals, the grossest abuse and unqualified scurrility. They are in both instances mistaken. The liberty of the press is not to be found in a state of servility to government or party, or in that licentiousness which dashes its venom in the face of all whom it exposes or dislikes, without legal restraint or moral inhibition.

To convince a sensible man of disinterested feelings, therefore, that either the one or the other should be termed freedom of the press, would be impossible; as much so as to make an effort to snatch the sun from the firmament, to chain the foaming torrent on the brink of a precipice, or Canute-like, bid the sea retire. Nor is a free press to be found in any supposed medium between these extremes. There is no medium where all is error; consequently, where both principles are wrong entirely, no right can grow out of either. But what we term the freedom of the press, is, a dignified and honourable impartiality in every emanation from it, whether concerning the government, or parties, or individuals, by its editor; whether approbation or offence follows, having a due regard to the interest of the country, to the feelings of individuals, to chasteness of language, and to truth. A press conducted upon these principles, is free, and valuable indeed. Norfolk paper.

SOUTHEY.

It is not easy to estimate the effects which the example of a young man, as highly distinguished for strict purity of disposition and conduct as for intellectual power and literary acquirements, may produce on those of similar pursuits and congenial minds. For many years my opportunities of intercourse with Mr. Southey have been rare, and at long intervals; but I dwell with unabated pleasure on the strong and sudden, yet, I trust, not fleeting, influence which my moral being underwent on my acquaintance with him at Oxford, whither I had gone at the commencement of our Cambridge vacation, on a visit to an old school-fellow. Not, indeed, on my moral or religious principles, for they had never been contaminated; but in awakening the sense of the duty and dignity of making my actions accord with those principles both in word and deed. The irregularities nearly universal among the young men of my standing, which I always knew to be wrong, I then learnt to feel as degrading; learnt to know that an opposite conduct, which was at that time considered by us as the easy virtue of cold and selfish prudence, might originate in the noblest emotions, in views the most disinterested and imaginative.

WEST INDIA LADIES.

When the young ladies in the West Indies fancy themselves too much tanned by the scorching rays of the sun, they generally scrape off the thin outside of the stone belonging to the cashew tree, and then rub their faces all over with it. Their faces immediately swell and grow black; and the skin being poisoned by the caustic oil of the nut, will, in the space of five or six days, come entirely off in large flakes, so that they cannot appear in public in less than a fortnight; by which time the new skin looks as fair as that of a new-born child.

TURKISH BEAUTIES.

The face of a Turkish woman must not be seen in public; if a man meets one in the streets unveiled, he turns his face towards the wall till she has passed; so strong is the force of custom, that I one day saw the disdar aga turn his back upon his own daughter, a young girl of exquisite beauty, as she walked unveiled up the steps of the proylea. These ladies, however, are not so squeamish when out of observation, as I myself afterwards found. Copying inscriptions one afternoon in the court yard of Lusierta, whilst that worthy signor was enjoying his siesta. I heard a gentle knocking at the outer gate, which I immediately opened, and discovered to my great surprise about twelve or fifteen Turkish ladies covered with long white mantles, reaching from head to foot. Having let them enter, I endeavoured to understand, by signs, the object of their visit. They were the clock, with musical chimes, that I had ordered to be sent to the city of Athens, as if to the Parthenon, every hour to be struck. They were slowly in perfect silence, and I was placed, but I was to give and receive through the scheme of the clock.

a sight. I may have seen a handsomer woman, perhaps, than any individual among them, but never did I see such a combination of beauties, such beaming eyes and silken lashes, or such dazzling complexions; they appeared like a legion of hours sent express from the paradise of Mahomet. The lovely creatures seemed to enjoy my astonishment, and to triumph in the effects of their charms; encompassing me in a circle, they gently pushed me towards the clock, that I might show them its mechanism. This I had no sooner done, than with a shout of joy, they seized the wire, and rung such a peal upon the chimes, that the Italian awoke from his nap, and running to the spot in his gown and slippers, began to chide them in so severe a strain, that the laughter immediately ceased, silence restored, the veil drawn again over their faces, and, in the slow and solemn step with which they entered, the whole party moved off the premises, leaving me in the state of a person just awakened out of a most extraordinary dream. Travels in Greece.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The following lines were written by Sir Walter Scott when between ten and eleven years of age, and while he was attending the high school at Edinburgh. His master there had spoken of him as a remarkably stupid boy, and his mother with grief acknowledged that he spoke truly. She saw him one morning in the midst of a tremendous thunder-storm standing still in the street, looking at the sky. She called to him repeatedly, but he remained looking upwards, without taking the least notice of her. When he returned into the house, she was very much displeased with him. "Mother," he said, "I could tell you the reason why I stood still, and why I looked at the sky, if you would only give me a pencil." She gave him one, and in less than five minutes he laid a bit of paper on her lap with these lines on it:

"Loud o'er my head what awful thunders roll!
What vivid lightnings flash from pole to pole!
It is thy voice, my God, that bids them fly;
Thy voice directs them through the vaulted sky;
Then let the good thy mighty power revere,
Let harden'd sinners thy just judgments fear."

The old lady repeated them to me herself, and the tears were in her eyes; for I really believe, simple as they are, that she values these lines, being the first effusion of her son's genius, more than any later beauties which have so charmed all the world besides. Extract of a Letter.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The next engraving.—In the course of a few weeks we shall again present our readers with another highly-finished engraving. It will comprise accurate views of the Middle Dutch church, in Nassau-street; the North Dutch church, in William-street; the South Dutch church, in Exchange-street; the first Presbyterian church, in Wall-street; the Reformed Presbyterian church, in Murray-street; and the Brick-Meeting, in Beekman-street, all tastefully arranged in the picture. The drawings are by Davis—the engraving will be from the burin of Smith.

Correct reading.—Why is not every good scholar a good reader also? Because our school-masters teach almost every thing except the art of reading; which not one in ten is capable of doing. This is a fact, however harshly it may sound. A good reader is one who perfectly comprehends and readily enters into the feelings of his author. Consequently he is one who has learned to think, a special privilege seldom taught in our schools. He is one who is capable of expressing his own feelings in genuine language.

justly obnoxious to censure and expostulation; and he or she ought to be accounted a true friend, who ventures on the painful and hazardous task of applying them. But the task would not be thus repulsive, were we always to receive such admonitions, as we ought to, in a spirit of gentleness and even gratitude; especially on occasions when we have every reason to be certain that they are meant in kindness. Pride, however, in most bosoms, is so sensitive, and so quick to take the alarm, on the gentlest approach of what she willfully mistakes for an enemy, that every avenue to the moral citadel is instantly closed by her officious hand; instead of smiling hospitably, she resorts to frowning hostilities, which generally results in a barbarous sally, that for ever silences the friendly visitor. Many persons, and those too who rank among the amiable and the virtuous, are so restive under the gentlest language of reproof, that they cruelly retort wounds for words, and scorpions for whips. There are some husbands—(and oh! how much they mistake the path to happiness!)—to whom these remarks are unfortunately but too applicable. One might be singled out, who is almost daily referred to as a model of conjugal affection and tenderness, and who is blessed with an angel of a wife. He is an amiable man, a good citizen, and is highly respected by all classes of the community. But he is a son of Adam, and is consequently not perfect. There was a time when his wife, clasping him in her affectionate arms, and pressing him to her faithful bosom, would breathe into his ear the language of reproof. But alas! for the moment this act of kindness and duty changed the sunny smile of a husband to the dark frown of a tyrant—she dared not repeat the experiment, and though they are still celebrated for conjugal felicity, his sweet monitor is for ever silenced, and the husband mistakes this silence for tacit approbation. The consequence is, a continuance in many trifling errors and faults, of which he is, perhaps, scarcely conscious, but which his better half secretly and sincerely laments.

Mrs. Edward Knight.—This lady has retired from public life, and taken up her permanent residence in this city, as a teacher of music. That she has left the stage, we are unaffectedly sorry, for she was an ornament to it, not only as a vocalist, but as an actress; but that she has made this city her home, we are glad, inasmuch as we think it will be beneficial both to herself and the musical public. To Mrs. Knight's abilities we have so often borne testimony, that we can only now repeat what we have frequently said before. In tender and plaintive, or arch and spirited ballads, she is eminently successful; and not in those only, but also in more elaborate pieces of music. Her fine natural qualifications have been improved by a correct taste and a first-rate musical education under the celebrated Cooke the composer; and she is not only a sweet, but what is more, a sensible singer, evidently understanding the meaning of what she utters. As a teacher of music, we have no doubt of her success, her best songs being precisely such as an intelligent lady would wish to sing in a private circle. She has our best wishes.

Fashionable boots.—A few days since, business called one of our exquisites on board a small sloop, in the East river. While there the captain's son, a "knowing chap from down east," just arrived at the city for the first time, to "look about," discovered the square-toes of our dandy. After eyeing them for a moment, with an air of surprise, the lad ran to his father, exclaiming, "Why daddy, daddy, just look at that 'ere fellow's boots; they're all smashed in!"

A London fog.—A horrible fog settled upon London during nearly the whole of two days. Many accidents occurred. A drummer in the guards was drowned near Blackfriars bridge; and a stone mason near Wandsworth. One of the Kennington coaches, though attended by hulk boys, was overturned by going on the footpath; all the passengers were more or less bruised, and some had broken ribs.

The French theatre.—A drama has been performed at which turns on a law that will be new to most readers, namely, that in a small principality of Germany, every gallant who gives a kiss to any woman, young or old, was by law sentenced to make her his wife.

music in our last.—We were under the impression that the music which appeared in the last number of the Mirror, had never been previously published. We were, that we were in error. It was composed by a lady, and sung by that lady on the London stage. The music was afterwards sent to this country, and the knowledge of the fact was not known until it was too late.

O WELL DO I REMEMBER.

SUNG BY MR. PEARMAN.

ANDANTINO GRASIOZO.

O well do I re-mem-ber that lone but love-ly hour, When the stars had set, and the dew's had wet Each gen-tly clos-ing flow'r, When the moon-lit trees wav'd in the breeze A-bove the sleep-ing deer, And we fond-ly stray'd thro' the green-wood shade, In the spring-time of the year.

31—When all was still beneath the bright moon's chaste and quiet eye,
Save the ceaseless flow of the stream below,
And the night wind's fragrant sigh,
Which brought the song of the distant throng so plainly to my ear,

As we fondly stray'd through the greenwood shade,
In the spring-time of the year.
32—O like an infant's dream of joy was that sweet hour to me,
As pure as bright, as swift in flight,

From care, from fear as free!
And from my heart the life must part which now the pulse doth cheer,
Ere the thought shall fade of that greenwood shade,
In the spring-time of the year.

A MYSTERIOUS MARRIAGE.

MR. MORRIS.—It is now some years since a traveller, on his journey through the northern counties of England, found himself obliged to pass a night at the little village of N. The annual fair had commenced on the very day of his arrival, and in consequence, the only inn the village had to boast, was crowded with sturdy farmers, butchers, and graziers, to such a degree, that all the ingenuity of the landlord was insufficient to enable him to disguise from the wayfarer the fact that accommodation in his house was absolutely impossible. Our traveller was a man whom long experience had taught to meet a contre-temps like this, not with useless anger or uncomfortable grumbling, but with cheerful resignation, and with the prompt adoption of the practicable means to overcome it. His only answer, therefore, to the melancholy intelligence of mine host, was an inquiry as to the practicability of effecting a lodgment in some private habitation. The curate of the parish was described as having a spare bed-room, a cellar well supplied with good old ale, and a hospitable soul. A messenger was immediately despatched with the stranger's compliments, and a statement of the disagreeable dilemma in which he found himself; and the answer was most favourable.

It is not necessary or expedient to describe particularly the reception accorded by the charitable curate to his guest, or the materials or incidents of their evening meal. But I must describe the entertainer. He was a meek and guileless man of fifty, or perhaps fifty-five, and a bachelor; his whole life had been spent among the villagers, over whose consciences he held sway, and it is even recorded of him that he had but once during that life, been without the bounds of his parochial jurisdiction. It is easy to imagine, therefore, that his knowledge of the world was neither accurate nor extensive. His learning was sound, but antiquated; his wishes extremely moderate, and his penetration limited.

The stranger easily remarked that some engrossing subject appeared to occupy the thoughts of his entertainer; he was often silent and distrait, and once or twice an exclamation escaped him that seemed to indicate astonishment. Politeness for a time subdued, or rather restrained, the curiosity of the traveller; but at length it rose to such a pitch as to overcome his scruples, and he frankly asked his host whether he should be guilty of impertinence in asking for the solution of his demeanour?

"Not in the least," replied the curate; "but I was not aware that I had suffered any indications of the surprise, which I actually feel, to be perceptible. Its cause is no secret, and if you will take a pipe and a glass of ale, I will tell you my little story.

The proposition was cheerfully accepted; and the conditions being first scrupulously fulfilled, the curate thus began:

"You have remarked in me some appearances of astonishment; the cause is an adventure which has happened this very day. I received last night a note, without signature, requesting me to be in attendance at my church this morning at the dawn of day, to perform the ceremony of marriage; and in compliance with the request, I was ready at the altar, with my clerk, at the appointed hour. Some minutes elapsed, but no person appeared, and I began to apprehend that an accident had occurred to prevent the attendance of the parties. My clerk would fain have persuaded me that the summons was but an idle joke; but as he was speaking, a carriage drove rapidly to the door, from which a lady alighted, and entered the church. She was young, exceedingly beautiful, and richly habited, but she was alone. Her countenance was singularly sweet in its expression, and the tones of her voice, when she addressed me to inquire if I were ready to perform the ceremony, were soft and pleasing beyond any that I have ever heard. The question, indeed, appeared somewhat singular, for I saw no bridegroom; but before I had time to express my wonder, another carriage was driven up, and from it descended a comely youth, but meanly dressed, and of a sad and fearful countenance. The moment he appeared, an expression of fierce disdain flashed across the features of the lovely lady, and in a voice that made him visibly shudder, she bade the youth advance; he obeyed with seeming alacrity, but with an air of terror; and when I took his offered hand, it trembled. I hesitated to commence the marriage rite, for I feared that there was something wrong between the ill-matched pair, and I doubted of the propriety of uniting them. But the lady commanded me to proceed, with a voice that would not be disputed. She produced a special license also, so that I could not raise a valid objection, and I obeyed. In making the responses, the bridegroom's words were scarcely audible, and his eyes were fixed upon the earth; but she spoke boldly, and her looks were rivetted upon his face with that same fierce and scornful expression that had marked them on his entrance. Once only did it change, and then the contrast was most wonderful; for the look that she assumed was one of love and tenderness, and almost pity, and I thought I could perceive a tear glistening beneath the long silken lashes that veiled her large bright eyes. But it was only for a moment, and as I pronounced the nuptial benediction, they blazed again with a gleam of hatred so intense, so withering, that I, too, could not but shudder in my turn. The ceremony ended, she demanded of me a certificate, and having received it, turned towards the door. Her husband, raising for the first time his eyes from the ground and casting a fearful and hasty upward glance upon her face, advanced a step as if to hand her to her carriage; but she stopped, gave him a look that seemed to freeze his very soul, and with a proud and stately step proceeded alone. She was upon the point of entering her carriage, when a thought appeared to strike her, for she paused, and, turning to her husband, who still stood motionless upon the spot where she had left him, she pointed to the carriage in which he had come. Starting, he obeyed her gesture, and entered the vehicle which was instantly driven off; while she ascended her own, and was with equal rapidity whirled away in the opposite direction. Is not this a singular incident?"

"Rather," replied the traveller; "from the haste with which they parted, I should call theirs a runaway match."

"Perhaps so," answered the curate, who never understood or uttered a pun in all his life.

NOTE. The incident which, with a little exaggeration, is described above, was related to the writer some three years since, by an English clergyman, who vouched for the truth of the story. It had happened to his father.

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

Altogether thirty-two thousand copies of the new edition of Waverley have been printed and sold—a fact or a circumstance which we hold to be unparalleled in the history of literature. Supposing the new edition of the work in question should extend, as it is expected, to forty volumes, at least thirty thousand reams of paper will be required, the value of which, at thirty shillings per ream, will amount to the astonishing sum of forty-five thousand pounds sterling. Forty volumes at five shillings will cost exactly ten pounds, and supposing, for the sake of speculation, that the whole should prove as successful as Waverley, the money put in circulation altogether will amount to the enormous sum of three hundred and twenty thousand pounds sterling.

Published every Saturday.—Terms, four dollars per annum.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO S. J.

If heaven to one of mortal kind did e'er its nature give,
Or bade within a human heart its own meek spirit live;
If e'er to earthly heart was given its blest tranquillity,
Surely these gifts, thou gentle girl, have been bestowed on thee.

Thy walk through life seems one in which all pleasant things are met,
But who can tell the hidden thorns which may thy path beset?
For thou art one who wouldst endure, howe'er severely tried,
With meek and patient gentleness, thy lot, whate'er betide.

We love to gaze upon thy face, not for the beauty there,
The brow so richly shaded by thy clustering auburn hair,
Not for the mellowed radiance that fills thy soft dark eyes,
Nor e'en the charm which in thy lip's sweet smile and motion lies.

But to behold the frequent blush flit swiftly o'er thy face,
The eye that droops beneath its lid in mild retiring grace,
To listen to thy soft sweet voice whose slightest accents tell
The kindness and the gentleness which in thy bosom dwell.

'Tis these that bid thy presence charm, 'tis these that give thee power
To soothe to rest the sense of pain, and speed the passing hour;
One look upon thy calm sweet face it needs but to impart
Assurance of thy gentle mind, thy pure and sinless heart.

All earthly passions seem in thee so chastened and subdued,
Methinks that no unquiet thought may in thy heart intrude;
An angel's nature is thine own, though shrouded now in clay—
Oh! take not thou an angel's wings and flee from us away. THYRA.

SONG.

Haste with the song thou hast murmured in childhood,
Haste to the home of the flower and bee;
The first tints of morning gleam over the wildwood,
Haste, for its breaking is waiting for thee.

The fountain is dull, for thou hast not gazed on it,
The bower is sunless and lonely to see;
The bird of the matin is silent upon it,
Haste, for their offering is waiting for thee.

Come, for the morning light sleeps on the mountain,
The morning breath stirs not on blossom or tree;
The life spirit dreams on the breast of the fountain,
Come, their awak'ning is waiting for thee.

Come with the spell of thy beauty upon thee,
Come with the song thou hast warbled to me;
Come with the power thy brightness has won thee,
Come, for the life-charm is waiting for thee. HINDA.

THE SUN.

"That I can yet feel gladdened by the sun."—Byron.

Thou of the free and radiant smile!
Oft as thy kindling beams appear,
The laughing eye is turned awhile
To gaze upon thy proud career.

There is no shadow on thy brow,
Save when the envious clouds impart
A pall to thee and earth below,
Like fears upon the human heart.

How many restless fancies play
About thy path, thou golden sun!
Thou mad'st the grave of yesterday,
With thee the swift to-day begun;
And still from yon mysterious heaven
Looks forth thy broad and restless eye,
Unclosed, until dull time is given
To thee, thou deep eternity!

The shadowy deeds of curtained night
Here breathed through many a rich romance;
What time the moon-beam's struggling light
Play'd o'er the ocean's vast expanse;
When clouds o'er some high castle's wall
Pass'd slowly, like a funeral train;
And the red lightning's coronal
Wreathed the dark land and heaving main!

And bards, full oft, have offered up
Their pure devotion to the moon,
When all the pearls in pleasure's cup,
And joy's fresh buds were wasted soon;
And in the soft and tranquil night,
When strains of heartfelt song have poured
O'er dreams that faded on the sight,
And left their glories unrestored!

And the rapt lover too hath knelt
In blessedness that brings, brings,
When hearts in early passion melt,
And time hath beauty on his wings:
He too hath blessed the night's sweet hour
That witness'd his idolatry,
When bending humbly to thy power,
Mysterious love! he worshipp'd thee!

These are the scenes which hallow night—
But who would yield them for the day
That pours a pure and peerless light
Where lands are green and sea-waves play?
Arousing from their cradled rest
Childhood and youth, with lisping words,
And waking gladness in the breast
By the rich melody of birds.

Thou hast a radiant smile, oh sun!
A glorious and uplifted brow;
The ray that streams my page upon,
Is from thy blessed presence now;
And when the fever'd couch yields not
The rest which man had long'd to find,
How are its restless hours forgot
In thee, Bethesda of the mind! EVERARD.

THE HUNTER TO HIS LOVE.

And wilt thou fly with me, sweet maid,
Far from the bustling scenes of men,
Where blooming honeysuckle's shade
Sleeps sweetly in the woodland glen?

We'll build our cot beside the rill,
That ripples o'er some grotto's edge;
Where the wild rose and harebells fill
Each crevice in the mossy ledge.

Oft arm in arm we'll leave the glen,
And climb the mountain high and hoar,
To gaze upon the toils of men,
And learn to love our cot the more.

And oft when noon's effulgence throws
A glory o'er the stilly air,
We'll sit beneath the birchen boughs,
And I will sing my chase-song there.

And when the day's last beam has flown,
And squirrels leave the nut-stored bur,
Our torch shall be the pine-tree's cone,
Our couch the marten's downy fur.

No fearful sound will harm our dreams,
When sleeping in the sylvan glade;
But softly murmuring mountain streams
Shall be our ceaseless serenade.

The jay shall call me forth at morn,
To hunt for thee the bounding deer;
And sweet shall sound the echoing horn
Of thy returning mountaineer.

And he will bring thee flowers to grace
The ringlets of thine auburn hair;
Or flourish in the ashen vase,
Attended by thy fostering care.

Wild fruits, that man's best culture shame,
Free to the forest dwellers cast;
With choicest of the forest game,
Shall form our evening's rich repast.

When thou from childhood's haunts shall roam,
I know the tear will gem thine eye;
But then this heart shall be thy home,
Where thou mayst store each rising sigh.

If thou the hunter's faith should prove,
Thou wilt not grieve a parent's breast;
Nor sacrifice a brother's love,
Nor harm a kindly sister's rest.

They sleep beneath yon cypress shade,
In dreamless beauty, side by side;
Then come, my loved, my orphan maid,
And reign the youthful hunter's bride! PROTEUS.

SONNET.

WRITTEN IN SUMMER.

"On Susquehannah's side."—Roll on in pride,
Thou classic stream, for not unknown to fame
Art thou; the bard of hope hath sung thy name
In numbers flowing as thy silver tide.

So peacefully thou glidest on thy way,
Murmuring thy songs of pleasant harmony,
That e'en the sullen hills their frowns cast by
And smile to see thy frolic waters play.

Ah! gentle stream, apt emblem thou of life!
Our bark may float as gracefully at rest,
As yonder shallop on thy waveless breast—
Yet both shall know the hour with tempests rife;

Thou pay'st the mighty ocean tribute, we
Are rushing on to mingle with a mightier sea!

THE WORLD OF DREAMS.

The world of dreams—the world of dreams!
Where the glorious visions play!
It bath happier people and sweeter streams,
And holier bowers and brighter beams,
Than the world we walk by day.

The world of dreams—the world of dreams!
To the fields of the mimic dead,
A thousand bright creations come,
Like armies called by the gathering drum,
Ere the first hot blood be shed.

The world of dreams—the world of dreams!
I love the night's fond sway;
For she leads us on to that spirit land,
Where we may wander, hand in hand,
With those who are far away.

The world of dreams—the world of dreams!
Few sorrows can enter there;
There's food in its bowers, there's health on its hills,
There's music and wine in its sparkling rills,
And gladness in its air.

The world of dreams—the world of dreams!
When up the morning springs,
It dies like the bird on the winter's plains,
But the golden plumage-hue remains
Unshadowed upon its wings.

Thus, world of dreams—sweet world of dreams!
Thy glory liveth on;
And oft mid the toilsome noontide hours
I'll fancy I walk thy fairy bowers:
So linger my love and my thoughts upon
Thy memory's light, though thou art gone. ALPHA.

DOMESTIC LITERATURE.

Amir Khan, and other Poems: the remains of Miss Lucretia Maria Davidson, who died at Plattsburgh, New-York, August 27, 1825, aged sixteen years and eleven months. With a Biographical Sketch. By Samuel F. B. Morse. A. M. New-York: 1829.

MISS LUCRETIA MARIA DAVIDSON was born September 27, 1808, at Plattsburg, on Lake Champlain. She was the second daughter of Doctor Oliver Davidson and Margaret his wife. Her parents were in straightened circumstances, and it was necessary, from an early age, that much of her time should be devoted to domestic employments; for these she had no inclination, but she performed them with that alacrity which always accompanies good will; and, when her work was done, retired to enjoy those intellectual and imaginative pursuits in which her whole heart was engaged. This predilection for studious retirement she is said to have manifested at the early age of four years. Reports and even recollections of this kind are to be received, the one with some distrust, the other with some allowance; but when that allowance is made, the genius of this child still appears to have been as precocious as it was extraordinary. Instead of playing with her school-mates, she generally got to some secluded place, with her little books, and with pen, ink, and paper; and the consumption which she made of paper was such as to excite the curiosity of her parents, from whom she kept secret the use to which she applied it. If any one came upon her retirement, she would conceal or hastily destroy what she was employed upon; and, instead of satisfying the inquiries of her father and mother, replied to them only by tears. The mother, at length, when searching for something in a dark and unfrequented closet, found a considerable number of little books, made of this writing-paper, and filled with rude drawings, and with strange and apparently illegible characters, which, however, were at once seen to be the child's work. Upon closer examination, the character's were found to consist of the printed alphabet; some of the letters being formed backwards, some sideways, and there being no spaces between the words. These writings were decyphered not without with difficulty; and it then appeared that they consisted of regular verses, generally in explanation of a rude drawing, sketched on the opposite page. When she found that her treasures had been discovered, she was greatly distressed, and could not be pacified till they were restored; and as soon as they were in her possession, she took the first opportunity of secretly burning them. For it had not been in fear of discouragement or prohibition from her parents that she had concealed her childish compositions; but because there is a sensitiveness in true genius, which shrinks at first, as if instinctively, from exposure. Where there is no indication of this intellectual modesty, there is but too much reason for apprehending that the moral sense to which it is akin, is wanting also.

These books having thus been destroyed, the earliest remaining specimen of her verse is an epitaph, composed in her ninth year, upon an unfledged robin, killed in the attempt at rearing it. The editor has not thought proper to insert it: such things are invaluable, as relics, to those who knew and loved the departed; but, from public curiosity, it is always better that they should be withheld. When she was eleven years of age, her father took her to see the decorations of a room, in which Washington's birth-day was to be celebrated. Neither the novelty nor the gaiety of what she saw attracted her attention; she thought of Washington alone, whose life she had read, and for whom she entertained the proper feelings of an American; and as soon as she returned home, she took paper, sketched a funeral urn, and wrote under it a few stanzas, which were shown to her friends. Common as the talent of versifying is, any early manifestation of it will always be regarded as extraordinary by those who possess it not themselves; and these verses, though not otherwise remarkable, were deemed so surprising for a child of her age, that an aunt of hers could not believe they were original, and hinted that they might have been copied. The child wept at this suspicion, as if her heart would break; but as soon as she recovered from that fit of indignant grief, she indited a remonstrance to her aunt, in verse, which put an end to such incredulity.

Proud as her parents were of so hopeful a child, they never attempted to impede her in her endeavours to improve herself; and all the time that could be spared from her indispensable domestic avocations was given to reading. We are told that before she was twelve years of age, she had read most of the standard English poets—a vague term, excluding, no doubt, much that is of real worth, and including more that is worth little or nothing, and yet implying a wholesome course of reading for such a mind. Much history she had also read, both sacred and profane; "the whole of Shakspeare's, Kotzebue's, and Goldsmith's dramatic works," (oddly consorted names,) "and many of the popular novels and romances of the day;" of the latter, she threw aside at once those which at first sight appeared as worthless. As for what is called "directing the taste" of youthful genius, this is so much more likely, (we had almost said so sure) to be injurious rather than useful, that in a case like this it is fortunate when an ardent mind is left to itself, and allowed, like the bee, to suck honey from weeds and flowers indiscriminately. The vigorous mind, like the healthy stomach, can digest and assimilate coarse food. The girl is said to have observed every thing; "frequently she had been known to watch the storm, and the retreating clouds, and the rainbow, and the setting sun, for hours."

An English reader is not prepared to hear of distress arising from straitened circumstances in America—that land of promise, where there is room enough for all, and employment for every body. Yet even in that new country, man, it appears, is born not only to those ills which flesh is heir to, but to those which are entailed upon him by the institutions of society. Lucretia's mother was confined by illness to her room and bed for many months; and this child, then about twelve years old, instead of profiting under her mother's care, had in a certain degree to supply her place in her business of the family, and to attend, which she did dutifully and devotedly, to her sick bed. At this time, a gentleman, who had heard much of her verses, and expressed a wish to see some of them, was so much gratified on perusing them, that he sent her a complimentary note, enclosing a twenty dollar bank bill. The girl's first joyful thought was, that she had now the means, which she had so often longed for, of increasing her little stock of books; but, looking towards the sick bed, tears came into her eyes, and she instantly put the bill into her father's hands, saying, "Take it, father; it will buy many comforts for mother; I can do without the books."

To relate this anecdote as an extraordinary instance of duty or sensibility, would be as unfitting as to leave it untold. If there had been no such outward manifestation, the inward grace must have been wanting; but it may well be conceived how these parents must have doated upon such a child, whose person, moreover, was as beautiful as her disposition and her mind. Yet there were friends, as they are called, who remonstrated with them on the course they were pursuing in her education, and advised that she should be deprived of books, pen, ink, and paper, and rigorously confined to domestic concerns. Her parents loved her both too wisely and too well to be guided by such counselors, and they anxiously kept the advice secret from Lucretia, lest it should wound her feelings—perhaps, also, lest it should give her, as it properly might, a rooted dislike to these misjudging and unfeeling persons. But she discovered it by accident, and its effect upon her was such as could little have been foreseen; instead of exciting resentment, it produced acquiescence in the prudential reasons which had been urged, and a persevering effort of self-denial, the greatest which could be made. Without declaring any such intention, she gave up her pen and ink, and applied herself exclusively to household business for several months, till her body as well as her spirits failed. She became emaciated, her countenance bore marks of deep dejection, and often, while actively employed in domestic duties, she could neither restrain nor conceal her tears. The mother seems to have been slower in perceiving this than she would have been had it not been for her own state of confinement; she noticed it at length, and said, "Lucretia, it is a long time since you have written any thing." The girl then burst into tears, and replied, "O mother, I have given that up long ago." "But why?" said her mother. After much emotion, she answered, "I am convinced from what my friends have said, and from what I see, that I have done wrong in pursuing the course I have. I well know the circumstances of the family are such that it requires the united efforts of every member to sustain it; and since my eldest sister is now gone, it becomes my duty to do every thing in my power to lighten the cares of my parents." On this occasion, Mrs. Davidson acted with equal discretion and tenderness; she advised her to take a middle course, neither to forsake her favourite pursuits, nor to devote herself to them, but use them in that wholesome alternation with the every-day business of the world, which is alike salutary for the body and the mind. "She, therefore, occasionally resumed her pen, and seemed, comparatively, happy."

Let no parent wish for a child of precocious genius, nor rejoice over such a one without fear and trembling! Great endowments, whether of nature or of fortune, bring with them their full proportion of temptations and dangers; and, perhaps, in the endowments of nature the danger is greater, because there is most at stake. In most cases it seems as if the seeds of moral and intellectual excellence were not designed to bring forth fruits on earth, but that they are brought into existence and developed here only for transplantation to a world where there shall be nothing to corrupt or hurt them, nothing to impede their growth in goodness, and their progress towards perfection. This is a consideration which may prepare the parent's heart, or console it. Such a plant was Lucretia Davidson. Under the most favourable circumstances, and with the most judicious culture; it seems hardly possible that she could have been reared; an intellectual fever seems to have gathered strength with her growth, and all things tended unhappily to feed rather than to allay it; privations and difficulties on the one hand, indulgence and excitement on the other; an indulgence not to be censured, and if yet to be blamed, excusable, because it was the only indulgence that could be shown her; and an excitement less the effect of misjudging kindness, than of causes over which prudence could have no control. If there had been some who would have debarred her from all intellectual pursuits, and have brought down her spirit, her hopes and aspirations, to the low level of her condition in life, there were (and could not but be) others who wondered at her as a prodigy, and took pleasure in encouraging her to the exertion and display of her gift of verse. How this operated may be seen in some lines, not otherwise worthy of preservation than for the purpose of showing how the promises of reward affect a mind like hers. They were written in her thirteenth year.

"Where'er the muse pleases to grace my dull page,
At the sight of reward she flies off in a rage;
Prayers, threats, and entreaties I frequently try,
But she leaves me to scribble, to fret, and to sigh.
She torments me each moment, and bids me go write,
And when I obey she laughs at the sight;
The rhyme will not jingle, the verse has no sense,
And against all her insults I have no defence.
I advise all my friends who wish me to write,
To keep their rewards and their gifts from my sight;
So that jealous Miss Muse won't be wounded in pride,
Nor Pegasus rear till I have taken my ride."

Let not the hasty reader conclude from these rhymes that Lucretia was only what any child of early cleverness might be made, of forcing an injudicious admiration. In our own language, except in the cases of Chatterton and Kirke White, we can call to mind no instance of so early, so ardent, and so fatal a pursuit of intellectual advancement.

"She composed with great rapidity; as fast as persons usually copy. There are several instances of different subjects, and containing three or four stanzas each, written on the same day. Her thoughts flowed so rapidly, that she often expressed the wish that she had two pair of hands, that she might employ them to transcribe. When 'in the vein,' she would write standing, and be wholly abstracted from the company present and their conversation. But if composing a piece of some length, she wished to be entirely alone; she shut herself into her room, darkened the windows, and in summer placed her æolian harp in the window;" thus, by artificial excitement, feeding the fire that consumed her. "In those pieces on which she bestowed more than ordinary pains, she was very secret; and if they were, by any accident, discovered in their unfinished state, she seldom completed them, and often destroyed them. She cared little for any of her works after they were completed; some, indeed, she preserved with care for future correction; but a great portion she destroyed; very many that are preserved, were rescued from the flames by her mother. Of a complete poem in five cantos, called 'Rodri,' and composed when she was thirteen years of age, a single canto, and part of another, are all that are saved from a destruction which she supposed had obliterated every vestige of it.

"She was often in danger, when walking, from carriages, &c. in consequence of her absence of mind. When engaged in a poem of some length, she has often forgotten her meals. A single incident, illustrating this trait in her character, is worth relating. She went out early one morning to visit a neighbour, promising to be at home to dinner. The neighbour being absent, she requested to be shown into the library. There she became so absorbed in her book, standing, with her bonnet unremoved, that the darkness of the coming night first reminded her that she had forgotten her meals, and expended the entire day in reading."

She was peculiarly sensitive to music; there was one song (it was Moore's farewell to his harp) to which she "took a special fancy;" she wished to hear it only at twilight—thus, with that same perilous love of excitement which made her place the wind harp in the window when she was composing, seeking to increase the effect which the song produced upon a nervous system, already diseasedly susceptible; for it is said, that whenever she heard the song, she became cold, pale, and almost fainting; yet it was her favourite of all songs, and gave occasion to these verses, addressed, in her fifteenth year, to her sister:

"When evening spreads her shades around,
And darkness fills the arch of heaven;
When not a murmur, not a sound,
To fancy's sportive ear is given;
When the broad orb of heaven is bright,
And looks around with golden eye;
When nature, softened by her light,
Seems calmly solemnly to lie:
Then, when our thoughts are raised above
This world, and all this world can give,
Oh, sister! sing the song I love,
And tears of gratitude receive.
The song, which thrills my bosom's core,
And, hovering, trembles half afraid;
Oh, sister! sing the song once more,
Which ne'er for mortal ear was made.
'Twere almost sacrilege to sing
Those notes amid the glare of day;
Notes borne by angels' purest wing,
And wafted by their breath away.
When, sleeping in my grass-grown bed,
Shouldst thou still linger here above,
Wilt thou not kneel beside my head,
And, sister! sing the song I love?"

The extreme sensitiveness of her frame might have occasioned sufficient apprehension for the probable consequence, even if it had not been dangerously excited both by her own habits, and the attention of which she was the conscious as well as constant object. She complains thus, in her fifteenth year, of frequent and violent head-aches:

"Head-ache! thou bane to pleasure's fairy spell!
Thou fiend! thou foe to joy! I know thee well:
Beneath thy lash I've writhed for many an hour:
I hate thee, for I've known and dread thy power.
Even the heathen gods were made to feel
The aching torments which thy hand can deal:
And Jove, the ideal king of heaven and earth,
Owned thy dread power, which called stern wisdom forth.
Wouldst thou thus ever bless each aching head,
And bid Minerva make the brain her bed;
Blessings might then be taught to rise from woe,
And wisdom spring from every throbbing brow.
But always the reverse to me, unkind,
Folly for ever dogs thee close behind:
And, from this burning brow, her ear and bell
For ever jingle wisdom's funeral knell."

"Her desire of knowledge increased as she grew more capable of appreciating its worth;" and she appreciated much beyond its real worth the advantages which girls derive from the ordinary course of female education. "Oh!" she said one day to her mother, "that I only possessed half the means for improvement which I see others slighting! I should be the happiest of the happy." A youth whom nature has endowed with diligence and a studious disposition has, indeed, too much reason to regret the want of that classical education which is wasted upon the far greater number of those on whom it is bestowed; but, for a girl who displays a promise of genius, like Lucretia, and who has at hand the bible and the best poets in her own language, no other assistance can be needed in her progress than a supply of such books as may store her mind with knowledge. Lucretia's desire of knowledge was a passion which possessed her like a disease. "I am now sixteen years old," she said, "and what do I know? Nothing! nothing compared with what I have yet to learn. Time is rapidly passing by: that time usually allotted to the improvement of youth; and how dark are my prospects in regard to the favourite wish of my heart!" At another time she said—"How much there is yet to learn!—If I could only grasp it once!"

In October, 1824, when she had just entered upon her seventeenth year, a gentleman, then on a visit at Plattsburgh, saw some of her verses—was made acquainted with her ardent desire for education, and with the circumstances in which she was placed; and he immediately resolved to afford her every advantage which the best schools in the country could furnish. This gentleman has probably chosen to have his name withheld, being more willing to act benevolently than to have his good deeds blazoned; and yet, stranger as he needs must be, there are many English readers to whom it would have been gratifying, could they have given to such a person "a local habitation and a name." When Lucretia was made acquainted with his intention, the joy was almost greater than she could bear. As soon as preparations could be made, she left home, and was placed at the "Troy Female Seminary," under the instruction of Mrs. Willard. There she had all the advantages for which she had hungered and thirsted; and, like one who had long hungered and thirsted, she devoured them with fatal eagerness. Her application was incessant; and its effects on her constitution, already somewhat debilitated by previous disease, became apparent in increased nervous sensibility. Her letters at this time exhibit the two extremes of feeling in a marked degree. They abound in the most gloomy speculations, bright hopes, and lively fancies, or despairing fears and gloomy forebodings. In one of her letters from this seminary, she writes thus to her mother:—"I hope you will feel no uneasiness as to my health or happiness; for, save the thoughts of my dear mother and her lonely life, and the idea that my dear father is slaving himself, and wearing out his very life, to earn a subsistence for his family—save these thoughts (and I can assure you, mother, they come not seldom) I am happy. Oh! how often I think, if I could have but one half the means I now expend, and be at liberty to divide that half with mamma, how happy I should be!—cheer up, and keep good courage." In another, she says—"Oh! I am so happy, so contented now, that every unusual movement startles me. I am constantly afraid that something will happen to mar it." Again she says—"I hope the expectations of my friends will not be disappointed; but I am afraid you all calculate upon too much. I hope not, for I am not capable of much. I can study and be industrious; but I fear I shall not equal the hopes which you say are raised." The story of Kirke White should operate not more as an example than a warning; but the example is followed, and the warning is overlooked. Stimulants are administered to minds which are already in a state of feverish excitement. Hotbeds and glasses are used for plants which can only acquire strength in the shade, and they are drenched with instruction, which ought to "drop as the rain and distil as the dew—as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the shower upon the tender grass."

It is to be wished that Mr. Morse had inserted part of her letters in these Remains, and to be hoped that he will do so in a future edition. During the vacation, in which she returned home, she had a serious illness, which left her feeble and more sensitive than ever. On her recovery, she was placed at the school of Miss Gilbert, in Albany; and there in a short time a more alarming illness brought her to the very borders of the grave. Before she entered upon her intemperate course of application at Troy, her verses show that she felt a want of joyous and healthy feeling—a sense of decay. Thus she wrote to a friend, who had not seen her since her childhood:

"And thou hast mark'd in childhood's hour
The feverish beatings of my breast,
When fresh as summer's opening flower,
I freely frolic'd and was blis'd."

Oh say, was not this eye more bright?
Were not these lips more wont to smile?
Methinks that then my heart was light,
And I a fearless, joyous child

And thou didst mark me gay and wild,
My careless, reckless laugh of mirth;
The simple pleasures of a child,
The holiday of men on earth.

Then thou hast seen me in that hour,
When every nerve of life was new;
When pleasure's fann'd youth's infant flower,
And hope her witcheries round it threw.

That hour is fading; it has fled;
And I am left in darkness now,
A wanderer to a lowly bed,
The grave, that home of all below."

Young poets often affect a melancholy strain, and none more frequently put on a sad and sentimental mood in verse than those who are as happy as an utter want of feeling for any body but themselves can make them. But in these verses the feeling was sincere and ominous. Miss Davidson recovered from her illness at Albany so far only as to be able to perform the journey back to Plattsburgh, under her poor mother's care. "The hectic flush of the cheek told but too plainly that a fatal disease had fastened upon her constitution, and must ere long inevitably triumph." She, however, dreaded something worse than death—and while confined to her bed, wrote these unfinished lines, the last that were ever traced by her indefatigable hand, expressing her fear of madness:

"There is a something which I dread,
It is a dark and fearful thing;
It steals along with withering tread,
Or sweeps on wild destruction's wing.

That thought comes o'er me in the hour
Of grief, of sickness, or of sadness;
'Tis not the dread of death—'tis more,
It is the dread of madness.

Oh! may these throbbing pulses pause,
Forgetful of their feverish course;
May this hot brain, which burning glows
With all a fiery whirlpool's force,

Be cold, and motionless, and still,
A tenant of its lowly bed;
But let not dark delirium steal—"

The stanzas with which Kirke White's fragment of the "Christiad" concludes, are not so painful as these lines. Had this, however, been more than a transient feeling, it would have produced the calamity which it dreaded; it is likely, indeed, that her early death was a dispensation of mercy, and saved her from the severest of all earthly afflictions; and that same merciful providence which removed her to a better state of existence, made these apprehensions give way to a hope and expectation of recovery, which, vain as it was, cheered some of her last hours. When she was forbidden to read, it was a pleasure to her to handle the books which composed her little library, and which she loved so dearly. "She frequently took them up, and kissed them, and at length requested them to be placed at the foot of her bed, where she might constantly see them," and anticipating a revival, which was not to be, of the delight she should feel in re-perusing them, she said often to her mother, "what a feast I shall have by-and-by." How these words must have gone to that poor mother's heart they only can understand who have heard such like anticipations of recovery from a dear child, and not been able, even whilst hoping against hope, to partake them.

When sensible, at length, of her approaching dissolution, she looked forward to it without alarm; not alone in that peaceful state of mind which is the proper reward of innocence, but in reliance on the divine promises, and in hope of salvation, through the merits of our blessed Lord and Saviour. The last name which she pronounced was that of the gentleman whose bounty she had experienced, and towards whom she always felt the utmost gratitude. Gradually sinking under malady, she passed away on the 27th of August, 1825, before she had completed her seventeenth year. Her person was singularly beautiful; she had "a high, open forehead; a soft, black eye; perfect symmetry of features; a fair complexion; and luxuriant dark hair. The prevailing expression of her face was melancholy. Although, because of her beauty as well as of her mental endowments, she was the object of much admiration and attention, yet she shunned observation, and often sought relief from the pain it seemed to inflict upon her, by retiring from the company."

"That she should have written so voluminously as has been ascertained," says the writer of these Remains, "is almost incredible. Her poetical writings, which have been collected, amount in all to two hundred and seventy-eight pieces of various lengths: when it is considered that among these are at least five regular poems of several cantos each, some estimate may be formed of her poetical labours. Besides, there are twenty-four school exercises, three unfinished romances, a complete tragedy, written at thirteen years of age; and about forty letters in a few months, to her mother alone. To this statement should also be appended the fact, that a great portion of her writings she destroyed. Her mother observes:—"I think I am justified in saying that she destroyed at least one-third of all she wrote."

"Of the literary character of her writings," says the editor, "it does not, perhaps, become me largely to speak; yet I must hazard the remark, that her defects will be perceived to be those of youth and inexperience, while in invention, and in that mysterious power of exciting deep interest, of enchainning the attention and keeping it alive to the end of the story; in that adaptation of the measure to the sentiment, and in the sudden change of measure to suit a sudden change of sentiment—a wild and romantic description—and in the congruity of the accompaniment to her characters, all conceived with great purity and delicacy—she will be allowed to have discovered uncommon maturity of mind, and her friends to have been warranted in forming very high expectations of her future distinction."

This may seem high praise; yet in these "immature buds, and blossoms shaken from the tree, and green fruit," there was as fair promise of future excellence as ever genius put forth. But it is not from the intrinsic value of these poor remains that the interest arises with which this little volume cannot but be perused. We have entered into no account of the longer poems which it contains, nor selected from the smaller pieces any except a few of those which are transcripts of the authoress's individual feelings; for youthful poetry must always be imitative, and that which is least faulty is far from being the most hopeful. Indeed, wherever imitative talent exist in the highest degree, creative genius has rarely, if ever, been found to co-exist. In these poems there is enough of originality, enough of aspiration, enough of conscious energy, enough of growing power, to warrant any expectations, however sanguine, which the patron, and the friends, and parents of the deceased could have formed; nor can any person rise from the perusal of such a volume, without feeling the vanity of human hopes. But those hopes are not vain which look beyond this world for their fulfilment. Knowing, as we know, that not a particle of matter can be destroyed, how surely, then, may we conclude that this which is demonstrated in material existences is true of spiritual things: that love, and generous feelings, and noble thoughts, and holy desires, are not put off when we put off mortality: but that, inhering in our immortal nature, they partake its immortality, and constitute in their fruition a part of that happiness which our almighty and all merciful Father has appointed for all his creatures who do not wilfully renounce their birthright! This is a consolation which reason suggests, which philosophy approves, which scripture warrants, and on which the understanding and the heart may rest.

LITERARY NOTICES.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA AMERICANA.—The following is from the Southern Patriot, one of the most ably conducted papers in the country:

"We have looked at the contents, generally, of the second volume of this work, and think it merits the encomiums which have been bestowed on it in the northern papers. It continues to be particularly rich in the departments of biography and natural history. When we look at the large mass of miscellaneous knowledge spread before the reader, in a form which has never been equalled for its condensation, and conveyed in a style that cannot be surpassed for propriety and perspicuity, we cannot but think that the American Encyclopedia deserves a place in every collection, in which works of reference form a portion."

JOURNAL OF A RESIDENCE IN LONDON.—The Boston papers announce the following publication: A Journal of a Residence during several months in London; including excursions through various parts of England; and a short tour in France and Scotland, in the years 1823 and 1824; by Nathaniel S. Wheaton, A. M., of Hartford, Connecticut.

The "Letters from New-York," which have lately appeared in the London New Monthly Magazine, are said to be the production of Mr. Galt.

STEAM.

I had a dream, which was not all a dream.—Byron.

Modern philosophy, anon,
Will, at the rate she's rushing on;
Yoke lightning to her railroad-car,
And, pointing like a shooting star,
Swift as a solar radiation
Ride the grand circuit of creation!—Anon.

I HAVE a bilious friend, who is a great admirer and imitator of Lord Byron, that is, he affects misanthropy, masticates tobacco, has his shirts made without collars, calls himself a miserable man, and writes poetry with a glass of gin-and-water before him. His gin, though far from first-rate, is better than his poetry; the latter, indeed, being worse than that of many authors of the present day, and scarcely fit even for an album; however, he does not think so, and makes a great quantity. At his lodgings, a few evenings ago, among other morbid productions, he read me one entitled "Steam," written in very blank verse, and evidently modelled after the noble poet's "Darkness," in which he takes a bird's-eye view of the world two or three centuries hence, describes things in general, and comes to a conclusion with, "Steam was the universe!" Whether it was the fumes arising from this piece of "written" vapour, or whether I had unconsciously imbibed more hollands than my temperate habits allow of, I cannot say, but I certainly retired to bed like Othello, "perplexed in the extreme." There was no "dreamless sleep" for me that night, and Queen Mab drove full gallop through every nook and cranny of my brain. Strange and fantastical visions floated before me, till at length came one with all the force and clearness of reality.

I thought I stood upon a gentle swell of ground, and looked down on the scene beneath me. It was a pleasant sight, and yet a stranger might have passed it by unheeded; but to me it was as the green spot in the desert, for there I recognised the haunts of my boyhood. There was the wild common on which I had so often scampered "frae mornin sun till dine," skirted by the old wood, through which the burn stole tinkling to the neighbouring river. There was the little ivy-covered church with its modest spire and immovable weathercock, and clustering around lay the village that I knew contained so many kind and loving hearts. All looked just as it did on the summer morning when I left it, and went a wandering over this weary world. To me the very trees possessed an individuality; the branches of the old oak (there was but one) seemed to nod familiarly towards me, the music of the rippling water fell pleasantly on my ear, and the passing breeze murmured of "home, sweet home." The balmy air was laden with the hum of unseen insects, and filled with the fragrance of a thousand common herbs and flowers; and to my eyes the place looked prettier and pleasanter than any they have since rested on. As I gazed, the "womanish moisture" made dim my sight, and I felt that yearning of the heart which every man who has a soul feels—let him go where he will, or reason how he will—on once more beholding the spot where the only pure, unsullied part of his existence passed away.—Suddenly the scene changed. The quiet, smiling village vanished, and a busy, crowded city occupied its place. The wood was gone, the brook dried up, and the common cut to pieces and covered with a kind of iron gangways. I looked upon the surrounding country, if country it could be called, where vegetable nature had ceased to exist. The neat, trim gardens, the verdant lawns and swelling uplands, the sweet-scented meadows and waving corn-fields were all swept away, and fruit, and flowers, and herbage, appeared to be things uncared for and unknown. Houses and factories, and turnpikes and railroads, were scattered all around, and along the latter, as if propelled by some unseen, infernal power, monstrous machines flew with inconceivable swiftness. People were crowding and jostling each other on all sides. I mingled with them, but they were not like those I had formerly known—they walked, talked, and transacted business of all kinds with astonishing celerity. Every thing was done in a hurry; they eat, drank, and slept in a hurry; they danced, sung, and made love in a hurry; they married, died, and were buried in a hurry, and resurrection-men had them out of their graves before they well knew they were in them. Whatever was done, was done upon the high-pressure principle. No person stopped to speak to another in the street; but as they moved rapidly on their way, the men talked faster than women do now, and the women talked twice as fast as ever. Many were bald, and on asking the reason, I was given to understand they had been great travellers, and that the rapidity of modern conveyances literally scalped those who journeyed much in them, sweeping whiskers, eyebrows, eye-lashes, in fact, every thing in any way moveable, from their faces. Animal life appeared to be extinct; carts and carriages came rattling down the highways horseless and driverless, and wheelbarrows trundled along without any visible agency. Nature was out of fashion, and the world seemed to get along tolerably well without her.

At the foot of the street my attention was attracted by a house they were building of prodigious dimensions, being not less than seventeen stories high. On the top of it several men were at work, when dreadful to relate, the foot of one of them slipped, and he was precipitated to the earth with a fearful crash. Judge of my horror and indignation on observing the crowd pass unheeding by, scarcely deigning to cast a look on their fellow-creature, who doubtless lay weltering in his blood, and the rest of the workmen went on with their several avocations without a moment's pause in consequence of the accident. On approaching the spot, I heard several in passing murmur the most incomprehensible observations. "Only a steam-man," said one. "Won't cost much," said another. "His boiler overcharged, I suppose," cried a third, "the way in which all these accidents happen!" and true enough, there lay a man of tin and sheet-iron, weltering in hot water. The superintendent of the concern, who was not a steam-man, but made of the present materials, gave it as his opinion that the springs were damaged, and the steam-vessels a little ruptured, but not much harm done, and straightway sent the corpse to the blacksmith's (who was a flesh-and-blood man) to be repaired. Here was then at once a new version of the old Greek fable, and modern Prometheuses were actually as "plentiful as blackberries." In fact, I found upon inquiry, that society was now divided into two great classes, living and "locomotive" men, the latter being much the better and honest people of the two; and a fashionable political economist of the name of Malthus, a lineal descendant of an ancient, and it appears rather inconsistent system-monger, had just published an elaborate pamphlet, showing the manifold advantages of propagating those no-provender-consuming individuals in preference to any other. So that it appeared, that any industrious mechanic might in three months have a full-grown family about him, with the full and comfortable assurance that, as the man says in Chrononhotonthologos, "they were all his own and none of his neighbours."

These things astonished, but they also perplexed and wearied me. My spirit grew sick, and I longed for the old world again, and its quiet and peaceable modes of enjoyment. I had no fellowship with the two new races of beings around me, and nature and her charms were no more. All things seemed forced, unnatural, unreal—indeed, little better than barefaced impositions. I sought the banks of my native river; it alone remained unchanged. The noble stream flowed gently and tranquilly as of yore, but even here impertinent man had been at work, and pernicious railroads were formed to its very verge. I incautiously crossed one of them, trusting to my preconceived notions of time and space, the abhorred engine being about three quarters of a mile from me, but scarcely had I stepped over, when it flew whizzing past the spot I had just quitted, and catching me in its eddy, spun me around like a top under the lash. It was laden with passengers, and went with headlong fury straight towards the river. Its fate seemed inevitable—another instant and it would be immersed in the waves, when lo! it suddenly sunk into the bosom of the earth, and in three seconds was ascending a perpendicular hill on the opposite bank of the river. I was petrified, and gazed around with an air of helpless bewilderment, when a gentleman, who was doubtless astonished at my astonishment, shouted in passing, "What's the fellow staring at?" and another asked "if I had never seen a tunnel before?"

Like Lear, "my wits began to turn." I wished for some place where I might hide myself from all around, and turned instinctively to the spot where the village ale-house used to stand. But where, alas! was the neat thatched cottage that was wont so often to

"Impart
An hour's importance to the poor man's heart?"

Gone! and in its place stood a huge fabric, labelled "Grand Union Railroad Hotel." But here also it was steam, steam, nothing but steam! The rooms were heated by steam, the beds were made and aired by steam, and instead of a pretty, red-lipped, rosy-cheeked chambermaid, there was an accursed machine-man smoothing down the pillows and bolsters with mathematical precision; the victuals were cooked by steam, yea, even the meat roasted by steam! Instead of the clean-swept hearth

"With aspen boughs, and flowers, and fennel gay,"

there was a patent steam-stove, and the place was altogether hotter than any decent man would ever expect to have anything to do with. Books and papers lay scattered on a table. I took up one of the former; it was filled with strange new phrases, all more or less relating to steam, of which I knew nothing, but as far as I could make out the English of the several items, they ran somewhat thus:

"Another shocking catastrophe.—As the warranted-safe locomotive smoke-consuming, fuel-providing steam-carriage Lightning, was this morning proceeding at its usual three-quarter speed of one hundred and twenty-seven miles an hour, at the junction of the Hannington and Slipsby railroads it unfortunately came in contact with the steam-carriage Snail, going about one hundred and five miles per hour. Of course both vehicles with their passengers were instantaneously reduced to an impalpable powder. The friends of the deceased have the consolation of knowing that no blame can possibly attach to the intelligent proprietors of the Lightning, it having been clearly ascertained that those of the Snail started their carriage full two seconds before the time agreed on, in order to obviate in some degree, the delay to which passengers were unavoidably subjected by the clumsy construction and tedious pace of their vehicle."

"Melancholy accident.—As a beautiful and accomplished young lady of the name of Jimps, a passenger in the Swift-as-thought-locomotive, was endeavouring to catch a flying glimpse of the new Steam University, her breathing apparatus unfortunately slipped from her mouth, and she was a corpse in three quarters of a second. A young gentleman who had been tenderly attached to her for several days, in the agony of his feelings withdrew his air tube and called for help; he of course shared a similar fate. Too much praise cannot be given to the rest of the passengers, who, with inimitable presence of mind, prudently held their breathing-bladders to their mouths during the whole of this trying scene," &c. &c.

A Liverpool paper stated that "The stock for the grand Liverpool and Dublin tunnel under the Irish channel, is nearly filled up." And a Glasgow one advocated the necessity of a floating wooden rail-road between Scotland and the Isle of Man, in order to do away with the tiresome steamboat navigation. I took up a volume of poems, but the similes and metaphors were all steam; all their ideas of strength, and power, and swiftness, referred to steam only, and a sluggish man was compared to a greyhound. I looked into a modern dictionary for some light on these subjects, but got none, except finding hundreds of curious definitions, such as these:

"Horse, s. an animal of which but little is now known. Old writers affirm that there were at one time several thousands in this country."

"Tree, s. vegetable production; once plentiful in these parts, and still to be found in remote districts."

"Tranquillity, s. obsolete; an unnatural state of existence, to which the ancients were very partial. The word is to be met with in several old authors," &c. &c.

In despair I threw down the book, and rushed out of the house. It was mid-day, but a large theatre was open, and the people were pouring in. I entered with the rest, and found that whatever changes had taken place, money was still money. They were playing Hamlet by steam, and this was better than any other purpose to which I had seen it applied. The automaton really got along wonderfully well, their speaking faculties being arranged upon the barrel-organ principle greatly improved, and they roared, and belled, and strutted, and swung their arms to and fro as sensibly as many admired actors. Unfortunately in the grave scene, owing to some mechanical misconstruction, Hamlet exploded, and in doing so, entirely demolished one of the grave-diggers, carried away a great part of Laertes, and so injured the rest of the dramatic personæ that they went off one after the other like so many crackers, filling the house with heated vapour. I made my escape, but on reaching the street, things there were ten times worse than ever. It was the hour for stopping and starting the several carriages, and no language can describe the state of the atmosphere. Steam was generating and evaporating on all sides—the bright sun was obscured—the people looked par-boiled, and the neighbouring fisherman's lobsters changed colour on the instant; even the steam inhabitants appeared uncomfortably hot. I could scarcely breathe—there was a blowing, a roaring, a hissing, a fizzing, a whizzing going on all around—fires were blazing, water was bubbling, boilers were bursting—when, lo! I suddenly awoke and found myself in a state of profuse perspiration. I started up, ran to the window, and saw several milkmen and bakers' carts, with horses in them, trotting merrily along. I was a thankful man. I put on my clothes, and while doing so, made up my mind to read no more manuscript poems, and eschew gin-and-water for the time to come.

THE ESSAYIST.

CAMPBELL AND SHAKSPEARE.

WE have given insertion to an admirable article on the sonnets of Shakspeare from the New Monthly Magazine. It is subscribed with the initials of our unrivalled Thomas Campbell; and indeed through every line of this exquisite and delightful criticism, the master of the modern lyre—not one moment to be mistaken in his sympathies—delivers his judgment ex cathedra. It appears that a friend of Mr. Campbell had furnished a paper to the magazine in which he had laboured with great, though perverted ingenuity, to prove that much light is reflected upon Shakspeare's habits and occupations, from the sonnets of the immortal bard. The fanciful and chimerical notion seems to have originated with no less renowned a critic than Augustus Wilhelm Schlegel, the celebrated commentator on Shakspeare; but it is overturned by Campbell in one of the most charming essays with which our periodical literature has for many a year been enriched. We will not do injustice to it, nor deprive our readers of their perfect pleasure, by any attempt to analyse its argument here; but we shall content ourselves with saying that it is equally honourable to Shakspeare and to Campbell. Lond. Even. Star.

THE SONNETS OF SHAKSPEARE.

I am frequently obliged to decline communications transmitted to this periodical, from their containing paradoxical opinions which I have no desire to promulgate. It is not always, however, without reluctance, that I take my leave of those unsuitable productions. In some of them there is such an amusing vein of perverted ingenuity, that, but for my aversion to be responsible for other men's eccentricities, I should be tempted to publish them.

A paper completely answering to this description has been lately supplied to me by a friend, who is lucid on every subject in the world excepting one, but on that one, which is Shakspeare, the zeal of God's house has eaten him up. My friend has discovered, as he imagines, in Shakspeare's sonnets, a clue to the entire history of the poet's life; and he hails these poems as a rich mine of information, which, by a folly, little short of fatality, has been hitherto neglected by all the poet's biographers. Happy discovery, could he only make good his words. How blessedly it would save us from repeating the stale truth, and lamenting the irremediable misfortune, that we know so little of our Shakspeare's private history. For who can pardon the genius of biography that she neglected the poet in his own days, and consigned not his living picture to her tablets—that she has told us everything about ordinary men, and almost nothing about the prodigy of nature—that she has embalmed so many dwarfs of our literature, and buried its colossus in oblivion?

But to return to my sanguine friend. After he has lustily belaboured George Stevens, for daring to say that the strongest act of parliament would not be strong enough to enforce the popular reading of Shakspeare's sonnets, and even bestowed some flagellation on Mr. Malone for having so weakly defended them, he proceeds to dig up, and, in his own words, to exhaust the discovered mine of Shakspearian biography. Alas! it is but a poor Potosi, and very easily exhausted; and his golden hopes turn out like the generality of modern mining speculations. I was less surprised, however, that my friend should have fallen into a fit of exaggeration on any subject connected with Shakspeare, than that this erroneous over-estimate of the light derivable from these poems respecting the poet's history, should have apparently originated with one of the most brilliant and acute spirits of the age—I mean Augustus Wilhelm Schlegel—he is an excellent and eloquent critic. But with all my respect for Schlegel, I cannot help thinking that he had not exactly weighed the force of his words, when he made the following remark in his dramatic lectures. "It betrayed," he says, "no ordinary deficiency of critical acumen in the commentators of Shakspeare, that no one of them has ever thought of availing himself of his sonnets for tracing the history of his life. These sonnets paint, most unequivocally, the actual situation and sentiments of the poet, and they enable us to become acquainted with the passions of the man. They even contain the most remarkable confession of his youthful errors."

Now, if Shakspeare's commentators were to make new discoveries in the poet's biography, it must have been in one of two ways—either by the facts and traditions otherwise existing respecting his life, receiving illustrations from the contents of the sonnets, or from additional intrinsic facts being found in those poems themselves. Looking at either or both of those modes of investigating Shakspeare's life, I can see no glaring proof of deficient acumen in commentators on their failing to biographize him by the help of his sonnets; and I should have pitied Schlegel himself if he had been condemned, with all these poems about him, as reflecting telescopes, to make the history of Shakspeare importantly more distinct. What were the commentators to discover in these sonnets?—I mean, what clear and circumstantial facts—for it is too bad to blame biographers for not tracing the history of a man's life by the aid of documents that furnish only conjectures and surmises. I venture to say that the facts attested by the sonnets can be held in a nutshell—that they do not unequivocally paint the actual situation of the poet, or in all instances give us a draught of his sentiments that is to be literally interpreted—that they do not make us acquainted with his passions, so as to throw any new light upon his history which can be called, in the slightest degree, important or satisfactory—and, that they do not contain any confession of the most remarkable errors of his youthful years.

The addition which these sonnets afford to our knowledge of Shakspeare, is insignificant as an index to his biography, and I shall not feel the assertion falsified, though I should see persons of more ingenuity than I can pretend to, eliciting many brilliant conjectures from their contents. I can only say that I have outlived all taste for conjectural biographies, and that the truths brought to view by these effusions seem to be neither numerous nor momentous. We learn from them that Shakspeare had a friend, to whom he was devotedly attached, (the nature of his language to that friend I shall by and by consider,) and a poetical mistress, who, not satisfied with inroads on the poet's heart, carried her conquests even to that of his friend, and made Shakspeare sonnetize on his jealousy of too much tenderness subsisting between them. It appears, however, that he never broke with his friend on this account, so that his love-passion must have been a humbler sort of lodger in his heart that could put up without either the whole or the best of its apartments. Other casual moods of his mind are expressed with an air of sincerity, which I deny not to be interesting as insulated records of his feelings, though I still refuse them the character of new or indicative importance as to his history. He speaks to his friend, in certain passages, with extreme modesty as to his own poetical merit, and alludes, with an admiration that is beautifully unenvious, to some other poet of the time who had won the favour of his friend. He writes on one or two occasions in apparent dejection under the frowns of fortune, and in one sonnet, distinctly laments being obliged to live by the vocation of a player. If there be any other interesting allusions in these sonnets to his personal circumstances, it is from want of memory that I have unintentionally omitted them.

I am making no hair-splitting distinction when I would emphatically distinguish the general, and even vague, but still actual pleasure, which we enjoy in these sonnets, from hearing the welcome voice of Shakspeare express his casual and transient feelings, and the falsely imagined pleasure that he is telling us something new about himself, which tradition, or his other poems, had not told us, and which may consequently be regarded as new testimonies for tracing his life. We learn from a hundred sonnets that he was a devoted friend, but if we possessed not one of these, would it ever enter into our suspicions that he was cold-blooded in friendship? We find him, in effusions of the same sort, confessing to the influence of the softer flame; and will those who have ever felt to their heart's core his power in the drama of describing love, pretend that they would have repudiated their sympathy, if they had suspected that he had drawn his amatory experience from the admiration of any other woman than his own good old Anne Hathaway? Some of the sonnets indicate that he was subject to casual misfortunes; and what ghost or sonnet was required to make us believe as much? It may be alleged that these complaints seem to contradict the general prosperity which is attributed to the course of his life, on the supposition of which Dr. Johnson, using the bard's own beautiful simile, says, that he seems to have shaken off the difficulties of fortune like "dew-drops from the lion's mane!" But what man, even the most prosperous, were he to journalize his feelings in sonnets, would not record himself a thousand times poorer, and more unhappy on one day than another?

He praises one of his contemporaries in the sonnets, and he could well afford to do so. Drummond's account of him supersedes the necessity for any other proof that he was gentle, good natured, and amiable. He speaks very humbly of himself in certain passages. This leads us, however, to no discovery that he was blind to his own mighty endowments; for in other passages he freely paraphrases, and applies to himself the "exegi monumentum" of Horace. The only very striking phenomenon in the sonnets is, that he predicts immortality to himself from those effusions, and not from his dramas—an opinion which the world has thought proper to falsify. Lastly, the sonnets allude to his being a player, and to his disliking the profession—had they told us the reverse, there would have been some novelty in the information. Only twenty-two of these sonnets are addressed to a lady, whose name has not even been guessed at; and of whom, if we except what the poet himself calls his "mad slanders," nothing is known, but that she had dark eyes, dark hair, and played the virginal. More than one hundred of his sonnets are addressed to his male friend, of whom still less, if possible, is discoverable. We may be told, perhaps, that these poems are, nevertheless, the record of a deep and strong personal friendship, and that if you divest those effusions of an exaggerated amatory garb, the mere fashion of the age, in Shakspeare's language to a male friend, they illustrate the strength of his friendly attachment. I believe that they record a very strong and pure friendship, but I deny that they unequivocally paint his passions, and the true character of his sentiments. Of the love sonnets to the lady let us think as literally as we please—but to take his friendship sonnets according to the letter of their phraseology, I should be very sorry. Those friendship sonnets are not the work of Shakspeare writing in his own unaffected character, how sincere soever the friendship itself may have been, but the fantastical language of a friend in poetical masquerade, exaggerating friendship into love, and painting his sentiments in hyperbolic colours. This is surely not the unequivocal language of passion. That the fashion of the age makes Shakspeare's real sentiments unblameable, is unquestionable; for persons of the same sex, in those days, wrote downright erotic sonnets to each other most innocently, and a man subscribed himself "your lover," meaning no more than at present the means by "your humble servant." But keeping the poet's own real sentiments in unquestioned sincerity apart—the poems themselves are tinged by the chartered hyperbole of the age, with a jealousy and misery in the sentiment of friendship which are foreign to its nature. The great heart of Shakspeare, when it bestowed its friendship, must have bestowed it largely; but, believing this as I do, I would rather refresh my deep and sacred impression of the belief by a repudiation of his other works, than of some of these sonnets, in looking to which it is one thing to abjure most solemnly and sincerely any moral blame of him for his exaggeration, and another thing to admire the hyperbolic as a matter of taste, or to admit it as an index to the history of his life. As a guide to the history of his life, those sonnets to his male friend are indeed but faint scintillations. It seems impossible to make out to whom they were dedicated. Dr. Drake very plausibly, but by no means, I think, conclusively, contends that their object was Lord Southampton. If this be the fact, it is rather odd to find the poet calling a peer of the realm "his sweet boy," at a time when his lordship must have been thirty-six years of age. Mr. George Chalmers, whose ingenuity always repays its errors, by giving ample occasion for a laugh, insists that they were addressed to queen Elizabeth. What must her majesty have thought of the twentieth sonnet?

Considering these sonnets merely as poems, without reference to their biographical importance, it is manifest that some of them lack an important characteristic of true poetry, namely, their being genuine draughts of the poet's mind; for when he extols the personal charms and complexion of his friend, we recognise only an assumption of a fictitious character, borrowed in moments of thoughtless accordance from the capricious rudomontade of the times. To take the fashion of the age, and its unmeaning license of language into allowance, would be but justice to him if he were the commonest sonneteer, emphatically it is due to his hallowed memory as the master of the human heart. Still, at the same time, that very allowance leaves his language to be held unmeaning, and therefore, in several passages, uninteresting. Many of the sonnets, nevertheless, express an unexaggerated friendship that is truly Shakspearian and endearing; and the fancy, harmony, and diction of the greater portion of the whole collection betoken the hand of a master. They are, altogether, the best of our sonnet poetry anterior to that of Drummond; for George Stevens's comparison of them with-

Waller's productions is unworthy of an answer. If the same commentator's question, "What have truth and nature to do with sonnets?" deserve any reply, we may simply extinguish it, by telling him that they have as much to do with the sonnet as with any other short species of poem. It is very true, that any long series of effusions, clothed in uniform metre, inspired with slightly varying sentiments, and devoted to the same subject, will produce, when collectively read, a certain monotonous effect, from which I cannot deny that these sonnets are totally free any more than those of Petrarch. It is delightful to take a short walk through side-rows of sweet briars and honeysuckles; but it would tire us to make a day's journey through interminable alleys of them. There is no necessity, however, for our making a toil of a pleasure in reading either the sonnets of Shakspeare or Petrarch, for the character of tedium belongs not to those pieces individually any more than the pressure of a crowd belongs to the presence of a single person. To say that these sonnets add but little to Shakspeare's fame, is as excusable as to say that a considerable rock might appear but as a pebble if it were piled on the top of Olympus. But in many of them all the majesty and grace of Shakspeare is as distinct, and impress us with that peculiar aspect, as if thoughts that voluntary move harmonious numbers were the spontaneous respirations of his mind. I was beginning to enumerate the more exquisite portion of his sonnets, such as the 8th, the 30th, 123d, and others, but let me spare the reader the officious aid of a cicerone, where he may so easily judge for himself. I will not preach to his taste and ear by commenting on the exquisite richness of music and meaning in the following lines:

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Amidst impediments. Love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds—
Or bends with the remover to remove;
O no! it is an ever-fixed mark,
That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
It is the star to every wandering bark,
Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.
Love's not time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
Within his bending sickle's compass come;
Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks;
But bears it out on to the edge of doom.
If this be error, and upon me proved,
I never writ, and no man ever loved.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

POLITICAL PARROTS.

A TRAVELLER gives an account of two parrots, which he saw at Cincinnati, and one of which cried out "hurra for Jackson," while the other screeched "hurra for Adams," each laughing heartily at the end of the refrain. He calls them political parrots. This is known to be a common species in the republic, and had already been noticed in political ornithology. They sometimes get into public offices and legislative assemblies, where they contrive, occasionally, to pass for birds of wisdom, though they continue merely to repeat what they hear. As for the laugh or chuckle, it proceeds, now from heedless folly, anon from conscious knavery. Apropos of parrots: Shakspeare has well described, in the Merchant of Venice, two kinds of designing politicians:

"Nature hath framed strange fellows in her time:
Some that will evermore peep through their eyes,
And laugh, like parrots, at a bag-piper;
And others of such vinegar aspect,
That they'll not show their teeth in way of smile,
Though Nestor swear the jest be laughable." National Gaz.

CLIMATE.

Whoever of our fellow-citizens attaches much importance to climate, will find reason to be satisfied with his position, when he compares the weather which we have enjoyed for some months past, with that which was experienced in London during October, November, and December. It was necessary to refer to the poets for ideas of a golden sun and azure heaven. Some of our readers may recollect Lord Byron's farewell to England, in Beppo:

"I like the taxes, when they are not too many;
I like a sea coal fire, when not too dear;
I like a beef steak too, as well as any;
Have no objection to a pot of beer;
I like the weather, when it is not rainy;
That is, I like two months of every year." Ibid.

DANCING.

Dancing, under proper limitations, is a highly salutary species of exercise; but when too long continued, or too violently performed, it may be attended with very pernicious effects. The exertion of so many muscles as is required in dancing, and the quick inspiration of a warm vitiated atmosphere, in a crowded room, excite the circulation of the blood to as great an extent almost as in a fever. When to this is added the use of liquors and cordials of a heating nature, which augment still more the motion of the heart; or of ices and iced drinks, which suddenly chill the system, together with exposure in a state of perspiration, and an insufficient clothing, to the cold damp night air—and that unnatural excitement by which sleep is banished at the very period when nature calls for repose, we need not be surprised that spitting of blood and consumption of the lungs should be frequent among the votaries of the ball-room or the midnight assembly.

We have said that dancing, in moderation, is a salutary exercise. But it is so only when every limb and muscle is allowed to participate naturally and without constraint in the motion thus communicated to the body. When, on the contrary, dancing is performed in a dress by which this is prevented, to say nothing of the total absence of all grace, injury, and that of a very serious character, is extremely liable to result.

Foreign Magazine.

SCOTTISH EDITORS.

It is worthy of notice how many of the best periodicals at present in existence are edited by Scotchmen. There are, in the first place, our two leading reviews, the Quarterly edited by Mr. Lockhart, and the Edinburgh, edited at first by Mr. Jeffrey, and now by Mr. Napier. Then there are two Foreign Quarterly Reviews, edited, the one by Mr. Gillies, and the other by Mr. Fraser, both Scotchmen. Then comes the magazines; and first of all Blackwood's, the sheet anchor of which is Professor Wilson—then the New Monthly, at the head of which is Campbell the poet—and Sharpe's London Magazine, started and supported by Allan Cunningham. Then we have two philosophical journals, under the auspices of two Scotchmen eminent in science—Dr. Brewster and Professor Jamieson. If we next turn to the weekly publications, we have the Literary Gazette, so popular both in London and out of it, edited by Mr. Jerdan; we have the Atlas, the largest paper in England, edited by Mr. Bell; and we have the Spectator, edited by Mr. Rintoul. As to the newspapers, they are too numerous to particularise; but is there not Mr. Stoddard of the Times, Mr. Stuart of the Courier, and Mr. Alexander of the Morning Journal—three of the most influential of any published in the metropolis? Many other Scotch editors are scattered over England, whilst we are not aware of a single English editor in Scotland.

MAGISTERIAL INTERFERENCE.

We do not see how it falls within the province of the legislator or the magistrate to prescribe for the moral government of individuals. Our vices only come within the province of the magistrate, when others suffer inconvenience from them. Wherever a faculty is given, that faculty may be abused. A man who can read, may read noxious books. The privilege of publishing without restraint may be used to the dissemination of erroneous doctrines, and false views. Whoever possesses the means, may indulge to excess in the pleasures of the table. The rich man may drown his senses in wine, and the poor man in gin. The wise will be moderate in their enjoyments, and the imprudent immoderate. We know of no means by which excess can be guarded against, except the dispositions of individuals, which it is the business of instruction and not laws to improve. Of this, however, we are certain, that no men are entitled to erect themselves into judges of what indulgences ought to be allowed to others. We protest, therefore, against all reformations effected by magisterial interference. Who shall draw the line of distinction between what is beneficial and what is hurtful? And why should difficulties be thrown in the way of those who wish a cup of wine, because some may avail themselves of the facilities to drink to intoxication? The rubicund complexions of half the people in easy circumstances you meet in the streets, are a proof of their drinking as well as eating more than is strictly necessary for their health; but they would resent all attempt to regulate their indulgences according to any standard fixed by others. The poor people are entitled to the same liberty as the rich. When they violate the laws, punish them; but do not punish them by sumptuary laws.

ACCIDENT TO MAJOR SNOW.

As the sixty-seventh regiment was returning from field drill, by some accident Major Snow was thrown off his horse with considerable violence. Happily, however, although he is a remarkably tall and heavy man, he escaped without injury. He afterwards made the accident the subject of a humorous equivoque, by assuring a brother officer who rejoined the regiment a day or two afterwards, that there had been a very heavy fall of snow during his absence.

Age.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

EFFECT OF WARMTH ON ANIMAL LIFE.—Among animals—says Dr. Arnott—the effects of heat are remarkable. The dread silence of winter, for instance, is succeeded in spring by one general cry of joy. Aloft in the air the lark is every where caroling; and in the woods and shrubberies, a thousand little throats are similarly pouring forth their songs of gladness—during the day, the thrush and blackbird near our dwellings, are heard above the rest, and with the evening comes the sweet nightingale; for all of which it is the season of love and of exquisite enjoyment. And it is equally so for animal nature generally; in England, for instance, in April and May the whole face of the country resounds with lowings and bleatings and barkings of joy. And even man, the master of the whole, and whose mind embraces all times and places, is far from being insensible to this change of season. His far seeing reason of course draws delight from the anticipation of autumn, with its fruits; and his benevolence rejoices in the happiness observed among all inferior creatures; but independently of these considerations, on his own frame the returning warmth exerts a direct influence. In early life, when the natural sensibilities are yet fresh and unaltered by the habits of artificial society, spring to man is always a season of delight. The eyes brighten, the whole countenance is animated, and the heart feels as if new life were come, and has longings for fresh objects of endearment. Of those who have passed their early years in the country, or among the charms of nature, as contrasted with the arts of cities, there are few who, in their morning walks in spring, have not experienced without very definite cause, a kind of tumultuous joy, of which the natural expression would have been, how good the God of nature is to us! Spring is a time when sleeping sensibility is roused to feel that there lies in nature more than the grosser sense perceives. The heart is then thrilled with sudden ecstacy, and wakes to aspirations of sweet acknowledgment.

THE PHENOMENA OF LIGHT.—A certain intensity of light—observes the same author—is necessary to distinct vision, but the degree varies with the previous state of the organ. A person passing from the bright day into a shaded room, for a time may fancy himself in total darkness; and to persons sitting in the room and becoming accustomed to the less light so as to see well with it, he will appear to be almost blind. The dawn of morning after the darkness of night appears much brighter than an equal degree of light in the evening. When, as the night falls, our lamps or candles are first introduced, the glare is often for a time offensive; and the same feeling is still stronger on opening, in the morning, bed-room window-shutters or close drawn curtains. After the repose of night, the sensibility of the eye is such that the globules of blood in the capillary vessels of the retina produce the impression on it of little globes of light crossing among each other as the tortuous vessels do. To a prisoner after long confinement in a dark dungeon, the light of the sun is almost insupportable. And a dungeon, which to common eyes is utterly dark, still to its long held inmate has ceased to be so. There are various instances in the records of the barbarous ages, of prisoners confined for years in utter darkness, who at last could see and make companions of the mice which frequented their cells. The darkness of a total eclipse after bright sunshine appears much more deep than that of midnight, because of the contrast. The long polar night of months ceases to appear very dark to the polar inhabitants. If an eye be directed for a time to a black wafer laid on a sheet of white paper, and afterwards to another part of the sheet, a portion of the size of the wafer will appear brilliantly illuminated; for the ordinary degree of light from it appears intense to the part of the eye lately receiving almost none. An eye directed long and intensely upon any minute object—as when a sailor watches a speck in the distant horizon, supposed to be a ship, or when a hunter on the brown heath keeps his eye fixed on some game nearly of the colour of the heath, or when an astronomer gazes long at a little star—has the sensibility of its centre at last exhausted, and ceases to perceive the object; but on directing the axis of the eye a little to one side of the object, so that an image may be formed only near the centre, the object may be again perceived, and the centre in the mean time enjoying repose, will recover its power.

But the most extraordinary fact connected with the sensibility of the retina is, that if part of it be strongly exercised by looking for a time at an object of any bright colour, on then turning the eye away or altogether shutting it, an impression or spectrum will remain of the same form as the object lately contemplated, but of a perfectly different colour. Thus if an eye be directed for a time to a red wafer laid on white paper, and be then shut or turned to another part of the paper, a beautifully bright green wafer will be seen, and vice versa, a green wafer will produce a red spectrum, an orange wafer will similarly produce a blue spectrum, a yellow one a violet spectrum, &c.; and a cluster of wafers will produce a similar cluster of opposite colours. If the hand be then held over the eyelids to darken the eyes and prevent entirely the approach of light, the spectrum of the bright parts will be luminous, surrounded by a dark ground, and when the hand is again removed, the contrary will be true. Again, if the eye be in a degree fatigued by looking at the setting sun, or even at a window with a bright sky beyond it, or at any very bright object, on then shutting it, the lately contemplated forms will be perceived, first of one vivid colour, and then of another, until, perhaps, all the primary colours have passed in review. These extraordinary facts prove that the sensation of light and colour, although excitable by light, is also producible without it. This truth gave occasion to Darwin's ingenious theory, that the sensation of any particular colour, of red, for instance, is dependent upon a certain state of contraction of the minute fibres of the retina, as the sensation of a particular tone depends on a certain frequency of vibration of some part of the ear—and that the fibres, when fatigued in that condition, seek relief when at liberty, by throwing themselves into an opposite state—as a man whose back is fatigued by bending forwards, relieves himself not by merely standing erect, but by bending the spine backwards—which new condition, whether produced by light or any other cause, gives the sensation of green. He applied his explanation similarly to all other cases of colour. It is remarkable that the colours which thus appear opposite to each other in kind, are those which when the solar spectrum produced by a prism is painted round a wheel or circle, are opposite to each other in place.

SILK-WORMS.—It is stated in a memoir published by the royal agricultural society of France, that the use of the chloruret of lime, for the purpose of purifying the air in places where silk-worms are kept in large numbers, is found to be very beneficial. The mortality so common in this insect from the miasma of the atmosphere is thus prevented.

BET-ROOT SUGAR.—The manufacture of sugar from beet-root is still making way rapidly in France, with almost daily improvements. Within the last fortnight a manufacturer near Paris has taken out a patent, by which he undertakes to diminish the time hitherto required for completing the process at least one-third.

DANNECKER.—A colossal statue of our Saviour, executed in marble, by Dannecker, of Stuttgart, and which is considered as one of the finest specimens of modern sculpture, has been transported to Tzarakoie-Celo, in Russia, and placed on a pavilion, erected for its reception in the imperial garden.

ANOTHER NEW INVENTION.—A carriage has been invented in England, which is propelled by two persons, inside, turning a windlass. It moves with surprising rapidity.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THE business of this house appears to be gradually improving, but the experiment of re-opening the Bowery has so far been attended with but little success. The managers, to be sure, even in opposition to the intense frost of Saturday last, succeeded in deluding a few individuals thither, and set Messrs. Barnes and Hackett to try to make them laugh: two or three actually attempted to do so, but it was too cold to make a joke of, and they desisted forthwith. At the Park, two new pieces have been brought out. One of them a tolerable farce, entitled "Thirty-three John-street," whose greatest merit is a scene always gratifying to an English or an American audience, namely, a man in a desperate state of intoxication. When naturally played, we never recollect to have seen a portrait of this kind fail in eliciting the warmest approbation of both. We presume it "comes home to the bosoms and business of all." The other was a sprightly, pleasant little opera, called "Music and Prejudice." It contains some charming melodies, which were as charmingly sung by Mrs. Austin, particularly the last ballad, "Upon the hill he turned." The skeleton of Shakspeare's "Tempest," was also exposed to the public, during the last week; and notwithstanding the cruel ingenuity exercised in hacking and mangling that wonderful production, glimpses of the superhuman power and beauty of the original, were occasionally visible. It was said, and truly said, by a clever writer—that Shakspeare's plays lost more by stage representation, than those of others gained by it; the one being "like an apprentice dressed in his Sunday clothes, the other like Apollo tricked out by a tailor." Barry delivered many of the speeches of Prospero well, particularly the concluding one, and Hilson, Barnes, and Placide deserve praise as Caliban, Stephano, and Trinculo. Mrs. Austin's Ariel is decidedly the best we have ever seen: it is more ethereal. Her slight, finely moulded form, and rich mellow voice, unbroken by a particle of harshness, render her as apt a representative of the "dainty Ariel," as can well be imagined. The lively opera of the "Caliph of Bagdad" has also been twice performed during her engagement. Of this we have before spoken: the only change that has taken place, is, that Mr. Richings has been promoted to the part of the Caliph, vice Mercer removed; he resigned his former character of Abdallah to Mrs. Wallack, but retained the splendid pair of green trowsers that used formerly to glorify the person of that gentleman, for the service of the Caliph. Neither the opera nor the trowsers suffered by this arrangement. C.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

American periodicals.—Reviews have now become an integral portion of the literature of every enlightened nation in Europe and America. And while by the talent, learning, and critical taste evinced in their pages, a pretty fair estimate may be formed of the intellectual advancement of a people, their generous support may be fairly assumed as an evidence of a general thirst for knowledge. To those classes more especially, who cannot command leisure for minute and detailed reading, they serve as so many labour-saving machines, to which odious improvements they are so far dissimilar, that instead of destroying the absolute necessity for the labour and employment, whose indispensable diminution they supply, they both increase the demand, and furnish the materials for its more extensive and liberal encouragement. In the United States we possess three quarterly reviews, which need not fear comparison with the best conducted in Great Britain and France, in talent, comprehensive and useful information, and moral and political loftiness and independence of tone. As a fair specimen of each, the last numbers may be referred to with pride and confidence. The articles of which they treat are interesting and valuable, their disquisitions carried on in the most liberal and impartial manner, their zeal for the advancement of knowledge and the promotion of letters overflowing, and their execution unexceptionable, frequently spirited, and always rising above mediocrity.

The North American contains an elaborate, and, as we think, enlightened and impartial discussion on the engrossing subject of the policy proper to be pursued by our government towards the aborigines of the country, and well calculated to soothe existing animosities and reconcile sectional discrepancies. A continuation of the history of Bolivar and his coadjutors in Colombia, furnishes another interesting article. A review of Hoffman's legal work, speaks in the highest terms of praise of that useful and successful production.

The American Quarterly is not less happy than its more ancient contemporary in the choice of its subjects, and the manner in which it recommends them to public notice. The defence of classical studies, which has formed so prominent and dazzling a theme of the scholar who conducts this periodical, continues to elicit fresh talent in its so much despised cause, and to furnish new and unanswerable arguments in its claims to universal diffusion. Pitkin's history of the United States, an invaluable repository of facts, and La Fayette's tour through this country, written by Le Vasseur, are among the other articles entitled to commendation.

The Southern Review, the youngest, but by no means the least vigorous of the three competitors for literary trimestrial reputation, is uncommonly attractive this time. Its review of Hall's travels is decidedly the most spirited and happily conceived of any which have yet appeared in either hemisphere. A very just and unimpassioned judgment is passed upon the military and would-be scientific traveller. The review of Devereux is not less successful than the notice of the previous works of the same popular author. All the articles come recommended to the reader by the usual animation of style, and high moral tone which have characterised this journal from its commencement.

Rev. Mr. Schroeder's address at the opening of the New-York City Dispensary.—Seldom have we risen from the perusal of any discourse which breathed forth a more humane and liberal spirit. Adorned with the most pertinent and chaste figures of rhetoric, it speaks, nevertheless, in the most impressive and unfeigned accents of imploring clemency for the sick and poor. No extraneous assistance was in fact needed to commend the claims of an institution which can boast of dispensing efficient aid annually to ten thousand destitute sick persons, and of thus directly relieving the public burden, which might have else been charged with their support. The address of Mr. Schroeder does himself credit as a man and a philanthropist, and cannot be too widely circulated.

The Evening Journal.—Few newspapers have ever met with such decided marks of public support and favour as this unpretending but useful sheet, published in the Bowery. It is the third on the list of the most extensively circulated journals in the city. Its price, accommodated to the means of a large portion of the community, does not indicate any proportionate want of the ability or information possessed by its numerous contemporaries. It displays, on the contrary, an abundant share of talent in the editorial department, and its communicated articles, with a few exceptions, have been of a popular and interesting character. We refer to the essays which have occasionally appeared, treating lightly of subjects beyond the province of any daily paper, and which can never be approached with sufficient caution and delicacy. The Evening Journal would, we think, be seriously improved in its general aspect, if it left these topics untouched. In offering this suggestion, we are solely actuated by an honest desire of seeing the enterprising conductor completely prosperous in the arduous career in which he has embarked, and by what we deem essential to the preservation of public order and private virtue. With the editorial ability and tact of the Journal, every one conversant with its columns must be fully satisfied.

A literary lounge.—Such of our readers as are fond of indulging in an occasional lounge among the muses, could not spend a leisure hour more profitably than at the literary emporium of the Messrs. Carvill, Broadway. The rich treasures of science and the fine arts which have been amassed by these indefatigable caterers for the public taste, are truly delightful, and in many respects astonishing. Their capacious store is an intellectual repository, which, in a great measure, supplies the want of a public library. A foreign department has been lately added and arranged, under the directions of Mr. De Behr, comprising the classical works of all nations, both ancient and modern; viz.—German, French, Spanish, Italian, Latin, Greek, and even Hebrew: also, the operas of the immortal Mozart, with Italian words. But it is useless to attempt a description of the various attractions of this resort. To be duly appreciated, they must be visited and inspected.

Our fair correspondent Thyra.—Where praise is so well deserved and so entirely gratuitous, as the following tribute from the Courier and Enquirer, of the twenty-ninth ultimo, we cannot refrain from giving it insertion:

"We have often observed the signature of Thyra in the columns of the New-York Mirror, and have always read her effusions with pleasure. We judge the writer to be a lady only from the signature. Thyra's productions bespeak a cultivation of mind, a vividness of imagination, and a refinement of feeling far above the common pitch. With perhaps two or three exceptions, she will not suffer by a comparison with the many lady poets of whom our country boasts. Why does she continue incognita? She need not fear to disclose her name."

A brave girl.—The daughter of a respectable citizen in North Second-street—says a Philadelphia paper—had passed the evening out at a party, and returning late, had thrown herself on her bed, without changing her dress, to recover from a momentary fatigue. After relapsing into a kind of slumber, she was startled by feeling a breathing of some person near her, and on looking around, discovered, by the faint light of the window, the figure of a man standing beside her. She immediately seized him by his waist, and held him so firmly as to be drawn from her posture, by his struggling to free himself; and on his effecting this, and escaping to the stairs of the upper story, she retained a hold of his garments. During this she repeatedly called to her parent below—"Father, father; haste, haste; I have caught a robber!" The father was too much confused by the sudden and uncommon call to arrive in time to secure the villain, who escaped through the garret scuttle, and descended by the roof of the adjoining building.

VARIETIES.

LIVY.—When there was that great fire in the seraglio, at Constantinople, about fifty years ago, a large portion of the furniture, and among the rest, several books were flung into the street. The secretary of the French embassy then at the porte, happened to be walking that way, and as he was getting as well as he could through the crowd, he saw a man with a large folio volume, which he had opened, but could not tell what to make of it. The secretary saw it was a manuscript of Livy, and on turning over the leaves a little further, found that it had the second decade as well as the first, and probably might have all that is lost to us. He offered the man a handsome reward if he would keep the book under his long robe, and follow him with it to his lodgings. The man agreed to it, and followed him; but the crowd and confusion increasing, they were separated, and so the secretary lost the opportunity of recovering so great a treasure as this would have been to the learned world.

EXPERIENCE.—At a certain age, experience removes the bandage which has hitherto prevented us from seeing reality. This is done by degrees; the illusion does not vanish all at once, but grows weaker, and at length wholly disappears. Fatigued by a vain chase after good, through tortuous paths, strewn with both thorns and flowers, along which the impulse of example and the fever of the passions hurry our steps, we pause; and soon we recall to our recollection a straight and even path, not before tried, that of repose; we seek it, find it, follow it, and attain our object. Such is the usual progress of human life; and the habit of achieving great things does not make us cease to be men.

ANOTHER SINGER.—A new singer has excited some sensation at Vienna, and it is said that she will probably make as much noise in the musical world as Sontag. She is about eighteen years old, and is the daughter of Madame Grunbaum, the vocalist. The young lady in question has just made a very successful début, and attracts the dilettanti no less by her beauty than by her singing. This is the third or fourth lady who has been announced in Germany as likely to replace Sontag, without fulfilling that expectation.

THE RULING PASSION.—It is related in a recent biography of Lambert, the astronomer, of Mulhausen, that on being asked how he liked an opera at Berlin, to which he had been taken by some of his friends, he replied, that he had not seen it, as he had been occupied during the entire evening in calculating the refraction of light from the lustre.

HORSE RADISH.—Horse radish cut into small pieces, and chewed in the mouth, is an excellent remedy for hoarseness, coughs, colds, and cases of incipient consumption. Several cases of its successful application have come within our knowledge.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.—The population of Washington city is estimated at nineteen thousand three hundred and nineteen. There were erected one hundred and forty-eight dwellings in 1839. The total number of dwellings is three thousand and fifty.

Lord Peterborough, after a visit to Archbishop Fenelon, said, "he was cast in a particular mould, that was never used for any body else; he is a delicious creature! but I was forced to get away from him as soon as I possibly could, for else he would have made me pious."

Pertinacity in opinion more frequently arises from a partial view of a subject than from a full comprehension of it, and is not of itself any proof of rectitude of judgment.

When the English were good catholics they usually drank the pope's health in a full glass after dinner; au bon pere, whence your bumper.

If the mind be not cultivated in early life, we lose an opportunity of intellectual improvement which no study in a later period can repair.

To attempt to civilize or moralize a people who are in a state of want, as to subsistence, has always proved a forlorn hope.

Coercion, though it may form habits, never forms principles—the only security for their permanency.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

ADORA TE SUPPLEX.

BACK—back again to their holy fount,
The dreams of being run :
From the skies kindled, they remount
As the eagle to the sun.
As the pure flame burns towards the heaven
In its intensity,
Is there a power which thou hast given,
That should not rise to thee?
Oh stronger is that eagle's gaze
When his was high in air,
And purer glow the living rays
When their light is kindled there.
And the spirit is brighter when its thought
Is lit from the shrine of heaven,
The prophet fire is o'er it brought,
And the prophet mantle given.
We sip of the bubbles by passion led,
As they flash delusively,
But the thirst of the spirit is only fed
By living waves from thee.

HINDA.

A DREAM.

High sounds of festal glee
Broke forth upon the midnight air;
And in the throng I wandered there,
Thy form to see.
I saw thee not that hour!
Soft music's voice was on the wind,
All eyes were bright, and hearts were kind—
I felt their power.
I heard the joyful laugh;
The flashing cup like jewels beamed,
And every drop with pleasure teemed—
I could not quaff!
The rose and leaf were there,
With freshest violets entwined,
In many a beauteous wreath to bind
The fair-one's hair.
The merry dance went by,
And woman seemed a spirit fled;
A happy thing from heaven sped,
With man to vie.
The song was heard no more—
The harp unstrung—its echoes spent—
Methought all steps were homeward bent—
The feast was o'er.
I was alone and spoke!
I call'd aloud thy cherished name,
Then trembling, forth thy spirit came!
I wept! I woke!

LARA.

THE MAIDEN'S ANSWER.*

And wherefore should I linger here,
Like summer's latest rose,
Where every object wakes the tear
From memory's urn that flows?
The friends that made life's vernal day
All music to my mind,
Have passed like autumn birds away,
And left no note behind.
Home, with thy free, unsullied mirth,
How sadly changed art thou!
The voices of thy household worth,
Where may I list them now?
I wander to the narrow bed,
In dreams to catch them there;
But silence, as if earth were dead,
Awakes me to despair.
Lead on—lead on—I follow thee,
Friend of my wintry day!
And though from home my path shall be,
I will not longer stay.
Thou too shalt go, lone, grave-grown rose,
In thee my soul shall find
A fit memorial of those Left blighted here behind.
Scenes of my youth's unclouded years,
I break your binding spell;

Ye have my last best gift, my tears,
Therefore in peace farewell;
To the uncharnelled woods afar,
With my last friend I flee,
His love the only guiding star
That hope has left to me.
Flowers—that have grown beneath my hand,
Bowers—of the woodbine shade,
Lake—by the summer rainbow spanned,
Lawn—where my free foot strayed;
Birds—of the sweet familiar voice,
Elms—where the zephyrs dwell,
Home—of my heart's remembered joys,
Graves—of my kin—farewell!
Now to the forest's shadowy depths,
By thy fond side I'll roam;
Yet chide not, love, her faltering steps,
Who leaves her childhood's home:
And chide thou not the gushing tear,
That dims her parting gaze;
When grief's dark shower has passed, more clear
Love's bosom light shall blaze.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

THE REFORMATION.

A FACT.

ABOUT a century ago—I think I am not much out of the way as to the time, for it was in the "honey-years" of my good great grand parents—I say "honey-years," for, in those primeval days, people, even of the first society, were in the habit of numbering by years, and not as now by moons, that blissful season of marriage, when all is as new and creative of joy to the happy pair, as the genial opening of spring is to the tuneful nightingale and his confiding mate. It was in those happy days then that there came to New Town, a village not far from this city, a stranger from "the mother country;" he was a young man, uncommonly handsome in person, and of prepossessing manners, and his complexion was so dazzlingly white, that he was called Fair James by all the inhabitants far and near. As to his sir-name, that was a secret none could ever persuade him to reveal. His education was so far above his avowed calling of "wool-comber," that he was generally supposed to be a wandering prodigal son of genteel parentage.

Dressed in a white fleecy habit, with his hat slouched upon his temples, he went from farm to farm pursuing his occupation with great industry, and would, after a day of hard labour, pocket at sun-set his copper pence with perfect sang froid, to tell them out at evening in a very different humour to the tune of the potent mug—and he could not choose but feel its influence, for then and again and again it was replenished, until his wits began to turn.

"The mugs were large, the drink was wondrous strong!"

And love too, was in the cup when mingled and presented to him by the hand of Nannette, the pretty bar-maid; there was something so attractive, he said, in the little toss of her head—one of the finest in the world—and in the ingenuous expression of her dark eyes when she staid the cup to entreat the young wool-comber to beware of the spectre at the bottom, which Halkin, the witty publican, had graven there in rude device to prevent Susan, his tasteful spouse, from sipping too deeply.

But of small avail was Nannette's gentle counsel to James; for the oftener he saw her, and tasted the seductive beverage, the dearer he loved the one, and the deeper he quaffed the other; altogether regardless of the frightful spectre, till weary and overcome, he would sometimes sink to sleep with his head against the counter. It was then that Nannette could contemplate, without embarrassment, the beauty of his features and complexion, and the dark luxuriant curls which surmounted his high and polished forehead; and often too, she would draw near that she might look upon the silken lid wherein an eye rested that could open to the morning brilliant as its own beam.

This contemplation, though one of great interest, conveyed no hearts-ease to the simple, yet amiable Nannette. She sighed to think that so fine a specimen of human nature should be so lost to the virtue and charms of sobriety. That he had manly graces and a superior mind, she had early discovered, for Nannette was in no way deficient in observation; and her kind heart tenderly pitied, but she meant not to love James. Nannette was not the lawful inheritor of the title of bar-maid—she was the daughter of a French officer, a prisoner of war, who had died and left his accomplished child to poverty and the care of heaven.

But Nannette was as amiable as she was lovely, and anxious to make herself useful where she was dependent. She was grateful too, for the gratuitous attentions paid to her departed father by the worthy pair with whom she resided; and, with all humility and cheerfulness, she gave the sparkling cup to each new-comer through the week, and cast up the scores on Saturday-night to the perfect delight of Halkin, who would rub his hands and cry, "dear me, what a fine creature! pity it were not a boy, to look to my out-door affairs too."

On Sundays Nannette shone the star of the morning, for then her attendance at the bar was dispensed with that she might go to church to lay in a stock of edification to fortify her young heart against the machinations and assaults of the evil one, to which her exposed situation might render it a prey; and Nannette continued to walk in piety and purity of conduct, (a refined nature is not easily perverted) notwithstanding the many toils she had to encounter.

Nor was Halkin and his good wife losers by the protection they extended to the beautiful orphan; for half their custom was drawn thither by the light of her countenance. She was the real sun of which their gilded sign presented only the fainter rays. Nannette was intellectual too, in spite of the bar; for even amidst her daily avocations, so entirely mechanical, there was little to disturb the workings of fancy; and if "the proper study of mankind is man," she had certainly an opportunity of acquiring knowledge. Indeed it was surprising to observe how she would turn all things to good account; even the spectre at the bottom of the mug conveyed to her mind a deeper lesson than was intended by the artist. And she profited much more by the moral than did many of those who examined more frequently the singular device—justly eliciting the approbation of the aged and thinking part of the little world around her.

As for lovers, they came in swarms—many vowed eternal faith, a few offered marriage, and all sighed from the bottom of their hearts. Even the young clergyman of the village would lay greater stress upon "heaven be with you!" and pray with more fervour whenever Nannette graced the church with her presence. And there was the wiser son of Æsculapius too, who would oftener than need, bare her beautiful arm and feel her healthy pulse, that he might judge with more certainty of the improvement of his patients; and then he would pat her soft and rosy cheek, and marvel how the crimson current could flow so readily there.

But all these things made little impression upon the heart of Nannette. In fact, she forgot them the next moment. But, in regard to James, it was not so. She could well remember whatever he said or sung, for he was musical as well as literary, and to every look and action of his, her bosom bore record. There was something, she thought, so novel in his appearance, so superior in his person and manners to any one she had seen—he was so gentle and persuasive in his language—had such depth of feeling, that, in spite of his failing, she felt greatly interested in his happiness. Then he was a stranger, an offcast of fortune, like herself, and had a claim upon her sympathy—therefore she could not but pity him very sincerely—and very sincerely, too, did she love him; but more of that hereafter.

At this juncture she was sorely disturbed by his increasing inebriety. Each successive night (Sundays only excepted) beheld him still the insatiate votary of the odious mug, while the hideous figure at the bottom, instead of repulsing him, seemed to have acquired the fascination of an angel. And when a friend kindly interfered to admonish and warn him of his ruin, he would gaily answer, "nay, now, why bid me despair when there are but twenty-nine lives between me and a title, a time-honoured name, and a large estate?" This was often repeated by James in his hours of delirium, but small respect was paid to his pretensions by the motley groups that gathered nightly about him, while all pronounced him to be a lost man.

* See the "Hunter to his love," published in the last number of the New-York Mirror.

Nanette alone cherished the only glimpse of his reform. She had observed that on the Sabbath day he invariably forbore to taste the alluring cup. Dressed in a clean suit of lambs-wool, he would, on those days, attend her to church, and while there, the decency of his devotion, being with all humility, and the fervency of his response, formed a singular contrast with his free libations during the rest of the week; while the evening of each sacred day witnessed their vows of love and faith. Seated beneath the broad spreading willow, at the back of the church, many an hour was spent in improving conversation, and an interchange of affections. The murmuring of the little brook at their feet filled the pauses love made, and banished from the hum of noisy insects that monotony of sound which is too apt to pervade the retreats of wood and grove, while the moon looked down upon their beautiful and holy intercourse—and seldom has her beams illumined fairer countenances, or forms more perfect from the hand of heaven.

Thus, between piety and love, was each first day hallowed by the youthful pair; but the remainder of the week was, to him, a blank of time, and to her, a period of severe trial.

Weeks and months passed away, and the hateful mug was for ever at his lips. In vain Nanette sighed and gently re-proved; no amendment was visible in the conduct of James; on Sundays only did his countenance bear the perfect stamp; then, indeed, it was radiant with beauty and intelligence. One evening James had taken an inordinate measure, and lay extended along the bench of the inn; the good hostess, who was busy in preparing for a public parade, found the unfortunate youth very much in her way, and, with little ceremony, ordered her servants to convey the intemperate wretch to the porch, and lay him by the side of Keeper, the dog, as a fit companion for brutes only. The injunction was instantly obeyed, and he was borne into the porch, incapable of making the least resistance, yet perfectly sensible of his degraded condition, and stung to the soul by the severe reproof.

The faithful Keeper, now his only friend, as if in sympathy with his sufferings, began to lick his hands and face, which kindness James endeavoured to prevent, but found that he had not power to move a limb; and, in the anguish of his wounded feelings, he exclaimed,

"Gracious heavens! am I indeed so lost? Shall I be henceforth a thing for men to buffet—to scoff and jeer at? A prodigal, fit only to herd with swine! Thou, Keeper, art too good a dog for such a one!"

The morning of the following day the young wool-comber was no where to be found. Inquiry was made at the different farm houses, but to no purpose; it was supposed that he had left the town during the night of his mortification. The pretty Nanette was no longer visible at the inn, while the story of their flight soon spread through the village and became at least a nine day's wonder among the inhabitants.

Many years had passed away, and the loves of James and Nanette was an affair almost forgotten, when judge H., a wealthy farmer of New Town, was tempted by business or pleasure, to cross the uncertain wave, and visit home, "the mother country." (Thus was the favoured isle denominated by the English-Americans even to the period of our division.)

Having accomplished the objects of his voyage, he bade adieu to the great metropolis, and took post chaise for the nearest sea-port town, from whence he purposed to sail for America in a few days. He had not driven far from London when a coach and four attempted to pass him on the road. Some difficulty occurred to prevent its progress, owing to the awkwardness of the post-boy. The gentleman in the carriage looked from the window to give orders to his attendants, and his eye met that of judge H., who also had leaned forward that he might observe how matters were about to be arranged. In a moment a smile of joyous recognition lighted up the features of the stranger, whose dress and manners comported well with the splendour of his vehicle.

"Good heavens!" he exclaimed, "is not this my friend H. of Long Island? Surely it is he;" and in the next moment he was at the side of the chaise.

"You have pronounced my name, most certainly," replied the worthy farmer; "but how you could have known it, is to me a riddle."

"Look well at me, I pray you," and the stranger drew himself up to his full height, and raising his hat, continued, "examine my features carefully—are they not familiar to you?"

"They are not indeed, sir," replied H., after a few moments' intent survey of the noble and graceful figure before him. "I do assure you that to my knowledge I never saw you till this hour, or my memory is unusually treacherous," he then murmured out something of the unmerited honour, &c., and bidding a "good morrow," was about to drive off.

"Stay, sir," cried the stranger; "can it be possible that you have forgotten James, the unfortunate wool-comber, who, but ten years since, sought a living through your town?"

"Who? What? This James, who disgraced himself at Halkin's by his intemperance? and finished by stealing away the sweetest flower that ever blossomed in our soil! Do my eyes—my ears hear aright?" and the good farmer raised his hands in utter astonishment.

"I perceive you are greatly surprised at the change in my appearance and circumstances, and very naturally; but do you not remember I used often to tell you that there were but twenty-nine lives between me and a title with a large estate? Time has swept away those barriers, and I am now in quiet possession of a fortune more than sufficient for one that early knew the most trying vicissitudes of life. She, of whom you spoke, the dear, the lovely Nanette, the partner and soother of my sorrows, is now the sharer of my prosperity—the happy wife and mother. Come home with me—my estate lies not far from this, and you may then have it in your power to convey to the good people of Long Island a just idea of the improved fortunes of Fair James the wool-comber, and the pretty Nanette the bar-maid."

LITERARY NOTICES.

WAVERLEY NOVELS.—The genius of Walter Scott knows no bounds. Not satisfied with having furnished the world with the most captivating series of fictitious histories, he resumes his pen in his advanced age, to improve their general appearance, to illustrate their obscure points, and supply such deficiencies as the haste of composition, urged by the unceasing and untiring demand from the groaning press had allowed to enter, insensibly to himself and the millions of his readers, into their composition. Additional prefaces, expository anecdotes, and corrections of the main text, are the fruits of this laudable determination. The new edition of the Waverley novels thus improved, has scarcely been announced before its first volumes are already re-published in this country. Such is the eager and enlightened zeal entertained by booksellers in the United States to gratify a literary taste, diffused far and wide among the people. And yet narrow minds love to indulge in ill-natured and petty sarcasms upon the absence of taste for letters in this country! Such pitiful insinuations betray at once the humble rank and limited knowledge of those who delight in their flippant utterance. The re-publication of the invaluable new edition, so fresh from the hands of the great author, has been undertaken in Boston, and will compare favorably, in typographical execution, with its great British prototype. We have received a copy of the work, as far as printed, from Mr. C. S. Francis, Broadway—at whose well furnished Parthenon bookstore and reading room, it may be had at a very moderate price.

AN AMERICAN COMIC ANNUAL.—Finn and Johnson, of Boston, have clubbed together to produce a comic annual for the next season of gift books. "Johnson," says the Evening Post, "has been called the Cruikshank of the country, and Finn is no less our Hood. The two together will doubtless be able to concoct a book that shall force the most grave and melancholic reader to smile."

JEFFERSON'S WORKS.—A second edition of the works of Thomas Jefferson will shortly be put to press by the brothers Carvill, of this city, and Messrs. Gray and Bowen, of Boston.

THE DEFORMED.—A new drama, under this title, written by Richard Penn Smith, has been produced in Philadelphia. It was entirely successful.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

BAD HABITS.

ONE of the most thoughtless habits a man can fall into, the most senseless and indefensible that any person, allowed the use of a pen can indulge, and one which we would think altogether inconsistent with the manners of a gentleman, is the too common practice of throwing ink about the floor when writing, at every dip of the pen; the greatest part of the indelible liquid being appropriated to the benefit of the clothes, the furniture, or the carpets, and the remainder applied to the proper use and end of the dye, in colouring the paper. The excuse of some for this careless and indelicate custom is, that their attention is so completely engrossed by the magnitude or intense interest of the object on which their mind is employed, that they know not whether their ink is dropt on their paper or thrown upon their neighbour's clothes. But in such cases one should write where the shoe-black cleans boots, where the blacking he scatters about can do no injury, or in some place prepared for such usage. Still the abominable habit acquired in the office will follow insensibly into the parlour, and the slovenliness of the lawyer render the student a nuisance wherever he finds a pen and ink to flirt with. (Could not a pen that would deliver a certain quantity of ink only, be invented for the use of these ink throwers!) I know a clerk in a certain office, who has become so notorious for this habit, after spotting a dozen garments for his fellows, that they retire from him as instinctively as from a cuttle-fish, and give him elbow and spatter-room whenever he sits down to write. How many lady's dresses have been disfigured or spoiled by this practice, I cannot name. But this I know, that my carpets, my floors, and every thing about my house, owe their inky nebula to the hands of friendly visitors who have had occasion to write in my premises, and with all my habitual care to prepare and keep my writing materials, have thrown more ink about them than they put on their paper. I had escaped, however, almost harmless for some years, and had often congratulated myself on running scot-free so long, when my good fortune was interrupted, the other day, by a black and sinister occurrence, in spite of all my precautions to the contrary. A young acquaintance, who sometimes visits my family, and whose good sense and accomplishments forbade the suspicion of any such fault, called at my house in my absence, and, being possessed of handsome literary acquirements, was requested by one of my daughters to write a piece in her album. He complied accordingly, and left in the book a specimen of respectable poetic talents, but on the floor a memento of the most detestable habit I am exposing. The carpet, being of a dark hue, sustained no visible damage; but the floor, uncovered in the recess of the window, received marks that will remain as long as the wood, to remind us of an unwelcome guest, and caution against him in future. The encomiums on his conduct he received, from both the male and female part of my family, he may imagine, on recollecting the remarks he heard on the bad pens and slovenly writing by which some gentlemen had displayed their neatness and taste in the book. I hope he will take a hint from this representation, leave the offensive practice with his bachelorship in the office, and take good care, as he values the good wishes of the girls for his agreeable society, or the good will of their parents, in countenancing such ink-spirits, wherever he goes, to sink the character of the lawyer, quidnunc, or philosopher, and be sure that he does not, in so durable and undesirable a manner, leave his mark behind him. H.

ANACREON MOORE.

As this inimitable poet subsequently atoned, in a voluntary and handsome apology, for his boyish libels on American character and manners, in the year 1801, we have freely forgiven him, although we cannot forget the repeated prostitution of his fine talents in thus satirizing his hospitable entertainers. We therefore select one passage, from his eighth epistle, addressed to Spencer, which we think will not be uninteresting to our readers. In his beautiful apostrophe to Mr. Dennie, then editor of the Port Folio, and a little circle of literary friends, to whom the latter had introduced the young poet, we find the following lines:

"Oh! if America can yet be great,
If neither chain'd by choice, nor damn'd by fate
To the mob-mania, which imbrutes her now,
She yet can raise the bright but temperate brow
Of single majesty—can grandly place
An empire's pillar upon freedom's base,
Nor fear the mighty shaft will feelbler prove
For the fair capital that flowers above!
If yet, relieved from all that vulgar throng,
So vain of dulness, and so pleased with wrong,
Who hourly teach her like themselves to hide
Folly in froth, and barrenness and pride—
She yet can rise, can wreath the attic charms
Of soft refinement round the pomp of arms,
And see her poets flash the fires of song,
To light her warriors' thunderbolts along!
It is to you—to souls, that favouring heaven
Has made like yours—the glorious task is given."

However sincerely we regret the narrow political prejudices of the youthful poet, at this early period of his brilliant career, we have no objection to the foregoing compliment to Mr. Dennie and his friends. The talented and accomplished editor of the Port Folio was the successful pioneer who gallantly led the way in the march of American literature. Our country owes him much, and every liberal and enlightened mind is happy to acknowledge the obligation. To his genius and talents we are indebted, in no small degree, for having already realised the semi-prediction contained in the above extract. Stimulated by his example and success, other and more youthful adventurers have taken the field, and reaped rich harvests of laurels. Experience has convinced us, that the pillar of freedom is not rendered more feeble by the flowery capital of polite literature, which now surmounts it. Columbia has "wreathed the attic charms of soft refinement round the pomp of arms." She has, in more instances than can be readily enumerated, "seen her poets flash the fires of song to light the thunderbolts of her warriors." And what is more, she has (since the first publication of the satirical epistle, from which the foregoing extract is made) by her progress in the arts and sciences, and her feats in arms, secured the friendship, elicited the admiration, and commanded the respect of every civilized nation on the globe. W.

ORIGINAL EPILOGUE.

The following epilogue, written at the request of the author of a new melo-drama, lately produced at the Park theatre, founded on Cooper's last novel, entitled the "Wept-of-Wish-ton-wish," was spoken at the conclusion of the play by Mrs. Sharpe, in the character of Narra-Mattah, and received with reiterated bursts of applause. Whether the epilogue saved the play, or Mrs. Sharpe saved the epilogue, it is not ours to say; perhaps "a little of both." At any rate, this publication of the poetry will not blight a single leaf in the laurel chaplet of its author, Samuel Woodworth, esq.

Narra-Mattah enters, speaking to herself.

The curtain's down—and while they're all behind
Doffing their pilgrim dresses—I've a mind
At the gay modern world to have one peep,
And just say "how d'ye you?" before I sleep.

(Looks round the boxes.)

But how is this? am I to understand
That these are the descendants of that band
Of pious plain-clad pilgrims, who came o'er
To seek for freedom on this western shore?
Why—where's the plain mob cap? the russet gown?
The puritanic coat? the close-cropt crown?
Where's all that neat simplicity of dress
Which marked the puritans? Egad! I guess
I won't alone—more of them must have wed
With native chiefs, and mingled white and red;
Else why this taste for feathers, beads, and shells,
In their descendants? Why do modern belles
Paint their sweet faces, and from either ear
Suspend those sparkling trinkets? And then here,

(touching her own arm.)

So modestly to bury half their charms,
In those huge silken bags that hide their arms!
O there's red blood in some of your blue veins,
And so there is in yours, ye dapper swains,
Or what's the meaning of those dandy chains
Extending from your bosoms to your pockets?
I wonder if you modern beaux wear lockets!
Nay, hope not to escape me—you will fail,
Those treacherous square-toes, (laughing) I shall know your trail. (looks at the second tier.)

I see you there, but I won't tell your name,
He with the whiskers—yes—that's him—the same;
A mighty chief of some great tribe, no doubt,
You need not tell me—I shall make it out:
Yes, yes—I see—it plainly now appears,
Those artificial whiskers hide long ears!
But he with that blue blanket on one shoulder,
And feathered lip, must be a chief still bolder;
Perhaps a sachem, sagamore, or scribe,
O, I perceive, he's of the cockney tribe.

But what is that thing?—yonder—up above?
He with the eye-glass? There! he's dropt his glove;
What tribe claims him—or it—that taper shape?
I've strong suspicions it must be the ape!

You needn't smile, here, in the pit, below,
For I've a word with you before I go.
Yes, do smile! In mercy don't look grave,
For 'tis your tribe must either damn or save
The little bantling just gone off the stage.
Forget its faults, but not its tender age.
What if it be a little rude and wild,
Remember that a parent loves his child:
And I'll be sworn he's somewhere here to-night,
With feelings none can know but they who write.
So be good-natured, now, ye critic tribe;
Nay, do not frown—can I not name some bribe?
Yes, here it goes—don't let the new play fall,
And Narra Mattah vows to kiss you all.

'Tis safe! 'tis safe! your generous hands decide it; [it.
There, (kissing her hand) take a kiss among you, and divide

A good man's piety and virtue are not distinct possessions; they are himself, and all the glory which belongs to them belongs to himself. What is religion? Not a foreign inhabitant, not something alien to our nature, which comes and takes up its abode in the soul; it is the soul itself, lifting itself up to its Maker. What is virtue? It is the soul listening to, and revering and obeying, a law, which belongs to its very essence, the law of duty. We sometimes smile when we hear men decrying human nature, and in the same breath exalting religion to the skies, as if religion were anything more than human nature, acting in obedience to its chief law. THE TRAVELLER.

SKETCHES OF DISTINGUISHED CHARACTERS.

JOHN RANDOLPH.

THE avidity with which all classes of readers seek after details of the peculiarities and private habits of celebrated individuals, is one of the prominent characteristics of the present reading age; and is, perhaps, a sufficient apology for the insertion of the following sketch in the columns of the Mirror, a miscellany expressly designed

"To show the manners living as they rise"

The distinguished character who forms the subject of this article has, for many years, held an elevated position among his fellow-citizens. His actions and his talents have been subjected to no "gentle" species of criticism, and every anecdote respecting him has eagerly been sought after by the conductors of the "press," to gratify the curiosity of their readers. His fame also has reached the other hemisphere; nor do we fear a refutation when we assert, (from actual observation,) that the name of John Randolph is as familiar in Europe, and more particularly in Great Britain, as the most celebrated living American.

It was our good fortune, some few years since, to make a passage from Liverpool to New-York with this extraordinary man, and the impression made on us by his varied talents, his deep, but sarcastic remarks on men and things, and his peculiar original character, has been so vivid and lasting, that we have ventured to give to the public some of the incidents connected with that intercourse, in the hope that the detail will not be considered uninteresting.

It is generally acknowledged, that men are seen in their true natural guise during a sea voyage. The man of the world may at first incase himself in reserve, or the designing may spread the lures of blandishment or courtesy to disguise the infirmities they know themselves the possessors of; but the monotony and the tedium of their situation soon dissolve these safeguards, and the "natural man" stands confessed,

"With all his imperfections on his head."

Our party consisted of seven in number, all males. Mr. Randolph and a young Carolinian were the only Americans. The remainder were from different parts of Europe, and all considerably junior in years to our distinguished fellow passenger. It may consequently be supposed that the post of honour, and other like courtesies, were awarded to Mr. Randolph with that readiness which the young are ever willing to concede to acknowledged celebrity under any circumstances which bring them in collision. This willingness on our part to conciliate his good opinion, appeared to gratify him exceedingly, and we were not the losers by our just and well timed civility; for he gradually unbended from his rather aristocratical reserve, and became at once free and communicative; nor did one misunderstanding, or harsh expression occur among us during the whole unusually long passage. We mention this circumstance, as it is generally supposed that Mr. Randolph is no very pleasant companion on a sea voyage; on the contrary, with us he was in an eminent degree agreeable and conciliating. He quickly ascertained our several positions in society, and finding we possessed claims to respectability, those claims were readily allowed, and an equal footing of intimacy was the immediate result.

We shall not attempt to detail his many shrewd observations, noted at the time, nor shall we delineate the numerous peculiarities, so strikingly characteristic, our limits will not admit of such an elaborate undertaking; a brief sketch of a few of the more prominent must suffice for this article.

The rather singular appearance of Mr. Randolph, and his peculiarly constructed organs of speech, are facts known to all who have ever seen and heard him. On foreigners these singularities make perhaps a more forcible impression than on his countrymen. "Can it be possible that this is the celebrated man, whose eloquence arrests the attention of a listening senate, and keeps alive the interest for hours undiminished?" is a question I have heard foreigners frequently put. But once under the influence of his conversational powers, and the surprise speedily vanishes. The comprehensive mind is soon developed, the close observer of human nature is quickly perceptible, and the refined scholar stands before you, united with the polish of the gentleman and the experienced man of the world.

The somewhat aristocratical notions of Mr. Randolph have frequently exposed him to the attacks of his antagonists. It is true these feelings are predominant with him; they are, as it were, incorporated with his character, and form perhaps the basis of that unyielding and uncompromising consistency which has marked his political career. It was his boast with us, that he "had, on nearly all occasions, divided with a minority" and that, during a long public life, he had never departed from the principles adopted in the commencement of his career. His attachment to a monarchical form of government has also been urged against him. During a daily intercourse of several weeks, we never detected this predilection, although the conversation turned on subjects which naturally would have elicited such an expression of his sentiments, did they exist, for he was in all his communications open in the extreme; and whenever the relative merits of a monarchical, or republican government were discussed, he openly and unequivocally declared his preference to republican institutions. He had, during his late visit to the United Kingdom, travelled through Ireland, then in an extremely disturbed state. In reply to a remark of the writer, respecting that unhappy appendage to the British dominions, he said, "Sir, Ireland is a melancholy proof of the effects of monarchy, and its attendant evils. In America, such a state of moral and civil degradation could not exist. I cannot conceive it possible for the human species to fall lower in the scale of degradation than Ireland exhibits them." "May not the indolence of the national character have some part in this state of things?" was the rejoinder of the writer.—"No sir," was the reply, "the government, constituted as it is, is the sole cause. In America we have no slaves, but such as the institutions we escaped from has bequeathed us as a curse: there every man works for himself, not for an overpampered aristocracy—and the consequence is, every man may become independent by patience and industry." This naturally led to a review of that anomaly in the constitution of American government, the first act of which declared "all men free and independent." This proved rather a sore subject to the great Virginian proprietor. "Look," said he to an Englishman, who ventured a remark on the slave-holding states, "at your West India possessions, manumize the thousands of slaves there before you attack us for similar injustice.—Our participation in this reprobated violation of the rights of man, has been the act of Great Britain; she left us the curse, which it will take ages to disincumber ourselves from," and then returning to the state of Ireland, he said,—"our slaves, degraded as they may be, are far preferable in their situation to the poor of that unhappy country." ARTS AND SCIENCES.

STATUE OF CLINTON.—The directors of Clinton-hall association, some time since, applied to Mr. Hughes, the sculptor, for the model of a projected statue of our late governor, intended for the front of Clinton-hall. This model has been completed, and the exquisite accuracy of its execution has so fully satisfied the directors that they have ordered one of marble, larger than life, for the embellishment of the front of that magnificent edifice. Mr. H. was the pupil of the celebrated Flaxman, and we hazard little in saying, that this single specimen of his talents will establish for him a reputation that will reflect new honour on his preceptor. Although Mr. Hughes never saw De Witt Clinton, he has still, by the aid of prints and portraits, produced the most perfect and accurate delineation of the imposing features which distinguished that profound statesman that we have ever seen. The lofty brow,

"The front of Jove himself,
"An eye like Mars, to threaten and command,"

are all there, and admirably expressed. A statue made from this model, will be a rich embellishment for the front of the building for which it is intended.

PATENTS.—The Washington annual report of patents comprises four hundred and forty-seven claims to inventions, &c. Of these four hundred and forty-seven inventions, the state of New-York has contributed one hundred and fifty-seven—more than a third of the whole number. Massachusetts has produced fifty-nine, the next highest number. Forty-six patents have been taken out by persons resident in Pennsylvania, forty-five by persons resident in Connecticut, and fifty by persons resident in Ohio. Delaware, Illinois, and Mississippi have contributed no inventions this year.

GLASS CLOCK.—A clock, composed almost wholly of glass, has lately been presented, among other curious pieces of mechanism, to the London society of arts.

STEAM-ENGINES.—There are now three complete and extensive establishments in Baltimore for making steam-engines.

STEAM MILL.—A steam mill, for the manufacture of rice flour, is now in full operation near the "city block," Baltimore

THE RAMBLER.

AN EVENING AT THE THEATRE.

IT is a pleasant thing for any one who is fond of plays and players, after the cares and business of the day are satisfactorily over, to find himself snugly ensconced in a quiet and comfortable corner of a box five minutes previous to the rising of the curtain, with a fair prospect of three or four hours' rational amusement before him. An evening so spent is good for the health, spirits, and understanding, and leaves the morals just about where it found them, neither much better nor worse, except, indeed, as they are improved through the medium of the understanding. The stage, like every thing that has been made much the subject of controversy, has been greatly over-rated, both for good and for evil, especially in regard to the impression it makes upon a gentleman's virtue. Its opponents have accused it of clearing a man's morals out of him in the most wholesale and expeditious manner; not in fact leaving him whorewithal to save him from the gallows; while its advocates, in the opposite extreme, contend that it possesses the singular property of filling a person with as much morality as he can well hold; and rather more, indeed, than he can decently and profitably get along with, as this world is constituted, without injuring his wife and family, and being obliged to "eat his mutton cold." The truth is, that both parties have told a great many lies about the matter, and written more nonsense than it is wholesome to read; and both have volunteered much solemn foolishness and ill-tempered declamation in their zeal to serve the cause of truth. The one will gravely cite, as an argument, and a case in point, that "the three young men who lately robbed their employers to a considerable amount, were very frequently in the habit of attending the theatre;" to which they might, with equal propriety and sagacity, have added, that these three young men were regularly in the habit of eating their dinner, and that the greatest depredator had long evinced a strange and suspicious partiality for roast pig; the one instance being just as logical a deduction of effects from causes as the other. Then the Solomons, on the opposite tack, balance this by quoting certain cases, where "Guilty creatures sitting at a play

Have, by the very cunning of the scene,
Been struck to the soul, that presently
They have proclaimed their malefactions;"

as if a chance word spoken in a church or a tavern, a hay-field, or a fish-market, might not just as easily have touched the tender point, and awakened

"That power within the guilty breast
On vanquished, never quite suppressed,
That unobdurate and lurking lies
To take the felon by surprise,
And force him, as by magic spell,
In his despite his guilt to tell."

Another favourite argument with those who denounce the stage is, that vice is often not sufficiently punished or virtue rewarded. But does this never happen in real life? and who is then to blame? It certainly does, and much more frequently off the stage than on; for dramatic authors, in general, make no scruple of sacrificing both probability and possibility in their zeal to mete out poetical justice to the misbehaved persons of the drama. That man's principles must be very weak and wavering that can be swayed either one way or the other by a few words, and the passing of a picture before his eyes; and he must have a strong natural bias towards roguery, who finds his virtue giving way on seeing a vicious gentleman now and then get off shot-free on the stage. Such a one is not a whit safer in witnessing the proceedings of a court of justice; because, though nineteen rogues out of twenty be condemned, the twentieth may hold out a temptation to iniquity, by escaping in consequence of a flaw in the indictment. But "something too much of this." It is a "much ado about nothing" question, and perhaps the less that is said about it the better. For my own part, I am well content to spend a few hours pleasantly at the theatre, without fretting about whether there has been any visible addition to my small stock of virtue or no, provided it does not suffer diminution. Men's morals are not like coal fires, requiring to be constantly stirred up and trimmed, to prevent their dying away or going out entirely.

But let who will argue or declaim, it is, as was said at first, a pleasant thing, after a day spent in harassing and jangling pursuits, to pass an evening at the theatre, and is as refreshing to the mind as a warm bath to the body, clearing away the little petty cares and vexations that business is so apt to engender and leave behind. Like the bath, it is only relaxing and enervating when immediately indulged. There are more important things than plays—even the best of them—in the world, and it is by no means a good sign to see a very young man constantly lounging about a theatre. His education ought to be completed, and his mind stored with dry though necessary facts, and useful information, before he takes an unlimited range into that region of passion and imagination, else, in the voyage of life he will be as a light bark with more canvass than ballast, on a stormy sea, liable to be upset by every squall that blows.

But to a tolerably well regulated mind, what mines of inexhaustible and invaluable wealth are concealed behind that green curtain. Beyond that the bloody Richard and gallant Percy, the wronged Othello, the moralizing Jacques, the monster Caliban, the meditative Hamlet, honest Jack Falstaff and ancient Pistol—the merry Rosalind, the pretty Perdita, the gentle Desdemona, and how many other thousands of pure and base, and great and glorious spirits have a living visible existence! There the spirit-stirring passages gleaned from records of antiquity are treasured up, and the warriors and sages of old again live and breathe, in the picture of the poet. The curtain rises, and lo! spare Cassius and gentle Brutus again walk the streets of Rome. The centuries that have elapsed are as nothing, and the spectator is present at the fall of "mighty Caesar." Or a drum is heard, and the thane of Cawdor once more treads the "blasted heath," to be met by the prophetic greetings of the weird sisters. Now if a man be not very wise, and altogether above being instructed by Shakespeare and other worthies, there is certainly something to be learnt from this, and such as this. The drama is, in truth, a stupendous creation; and let its deciers say what they may, it will ever remain amongst the proudest and mightiest works of civilized man. True, all is not gold that glitters, and with the pure ore of Shakespeare, and the brilliant sparkling gems of Congreve and Sheridan, are mixed up the tinsel of Reynolds and the brass of Morton; but they are easily separated by those who are not afflicted with a total mental blindness, and to those who are, the one is just as good as the other.

But, independent of the stage, what ample scope for study and observation does the audience afford to any one who takes the trouble to observe his species. What a field for the painter, the physiognomist, and the caricaturist! What faces are to be seen—how rich and broad is their expression when those who own them once get fairly interested in the business of the scene, and become unconscious of all else beside. A countryman's, for instance, when a comic song is sung, or a juggling trick played, how he sits, his head jerked forward like a crane's, as if to get it as near the scene of action as possible, his shoulders up to his ears, his distended mouth dividing his face into two portions, and his eyes as convex as a lobster's; then when the affair reaches its climax, the monstrous twistings and contortions of his visage, and the convulsions of his body rolling to and fro under an uncontrollable storm of laughter, are more amusing than any thing on the boards. Again, where is there a more charming picture than that of a fine girl watching, with intense interest, the escapes or sufferings of the hero or heroine of the piece; her graceful neck inclined forward, her small delicate hand unconsciously grasping the front of the box, her sweet lips slightly parted, and her beaming eyes fixed with tender earnestness on what is passing before them. This the artist may copy, but he cannot go on and pencil down the various shades of sorrow and joy, anxiety and hope, that flit tremulously over her beautiful face. In this world of cold and ceremonious observance it is a treat to see such a girl; she is unsophisticated; and the chances are, that her understanding is better, and her feelings warmer and purer than those who evince more coldness and circumspection. Then there are the coquettes, with their pretty, and the fops with their ridiculous affectation; the solemn gravity of many at a joke, and the merriment of some at a murder; while others are troubled with the most strange and unfortunate peculiarities. There is one individual who attends the Park, that is afflicted with a sort of hissing Natty Bumpo laugh, which is heard both loudly and distinctly: this places the owner somewhat in the predicament of the fiends in Paradise Lost, who, when desirous of giving applause, found they could only send forth hisses. Whenever any thing very laughable takes place, or an actor plays exceeding well, and the house is in a roar, a loud venomous hiss is heard, and the people all turn indignantly around towards the place from whence the sound proceeds; but the involuntary culprit is never suspected, for he appears, and really is, enjoying himself as much as any of them.

But, of all persons who come to a theatre, the most to be dreaded and avoided are those that are possessed with a talking demon; such as Ophelia characterises as being "as good as a chorus." Though a curse to all, they generally bring their particular victim along with them—some simple friend—to whom, during the progress of the play, they detail the whole history of the plot—what has been done in the last scene, and what is to be done in the next—what the several characters have just said, and what they are going to say—remarks on the author—off-hand criticisms on the actors, accompanied with short biographical notices of both, together with a running commentary on different parts of the audience, and their own private opinion on affairs in general—and all this miscellaneous gabble conveyed in that most abhorrent of all sounds, a quick buzzing uninterrupted whisper. Any man who wishes to hear the play, and can sit patiently by the side of one of those annoyances, has more meekness than Moses, more patience than Job, more forbearance than Socrates, and no nerves at all. DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

ITALIAN CHARACTER.

MICHAEL KELLY, while in Italy, was reduced to a low ebb in money matters. He tells the following Gil Blas-like story of an odd character, whom he encountered:

"I chanced to recollect a letter which my landlord of Bologni, signor Passerini, had given me to a friend of his, a signor Andrioli; for, as he told me, he thought the introduction might be of use to me.

"In the morning, I went to the Rialto coffee-house, to which I was directed by the address of the letter. Here I found the gentleman who was the object of my search. After reading my credentials very graciously, he smiled, and requested me to take a turn with him in the Piazza St. Marc. He was a fine looking man, of about sixty years old. I remarked there was an aristocratic manner about him, and he wore a very large tie-wig, well powdered, with an immensely long tail. He addressed me with a benevolent and patronising air, and told me that he should be delighted to be of service to me, and bade me from that moment consider myself under his protection. 'A little business,' said he, 'calls me away at this moment; but if you will meet me here at two o'clock, we will adjourn to my casino, where, if you can dine on one dish, you will perhaps do me the favour to partake of a boiled capon and rice. I can only offer you that; perhaps a rice soup, for which my cook is famous; and it may be, just one or two little things not worth mentioning.'

"A boiled capon—rice soup—other little things, thought I—manna in the wilderness! I strolled about not to get an appetite, for that was ready, but to kill time. My excellent, hospitable, long-tailed friend was punctual to the moment; I joined him, and proceeded towards his residence.

"As we were bending our steps thither, we happened to pass a lugarigera's, (a ham-shop,) where there was some ham ready dressed in the window. My powdered patron paused—it was an awful pause; he reconnoitred, examined, and at last said, 'Do you know, signor, I was thinking that some of that ham would eat deliciously with our capon. I am known in this neighbourhood, and it would not do for me to be seen buying ham; but do you go in, my child, and get two or three pounds of it, and I will walk on, and wait for you.'

"I went in, of course, and purchased three pounds of the ham, to pay for which I was obliged to change one of my two zecchinos. I carefully folded up the precious morsel, and rejoined my excellent patron, who eyed the relishing slices with the air of a gourmand; indeed, he was somewhat diffuse in his own dispraise for not having recollected to order his servant to get some before he left home. During this peripatetic lecture on gastronomy, we happened to pass a cantina, in plain English, a wine-cellar. At the door he made another full stop.

"In that house," said he, 'they sell the best Cyprus wine in Venice—peculiar wine—a sort of wine not to be had any where else; I should like you to taste it; but I do not like to be seen buying wine by retail to carry home; go in yourself, buy a couple of flasks, and bring them to my casino; nobody hereabouts knows you, and it won't signify in the least.' Digitized by Google

"This last request was quite appalling, my pocket groaned to its very centre. However, recollecting that I was in the high road to perfection, and that a patron, cost what he might, was still a patron, I made the plunge, and, issuing from the cantina, set forward for my venerable friend's casino, with three pounds of ham in my pocket, and a flask of wine under each arm, sans six sous de son souci!"

"I continued walking with my excellent and long-tailed patron, expecting every moment to see an elegant, agreeable residence, smiling, in all the beauties of nature and art; when, at last, in a dirty, miserable lane, at the door of a tall, dingy-looking house, my Mæcenas stopped, indicated that we had reached our journey's end, and, marshaling me the way that I should go, began to mount three flights of sickening stairs, at the top of which I found his casino—it was a little cas, and a deuce of a place to boot—in plain English, it was a garret. The door was opened by a wretched old miscreant, who acted as cook, and whose drapery, to use a gastronomic simile, was 'done to rags.'

"Upon a rickety apology for a table was placed a tattered cloth, which once had been white, and two plates; and presently in came a large bowl of boiled rice.

"Where's the capon?" said my patron to his man.

"Capon!" echoed the ghost of a servant—the—

"Has not the rascal sent it?" cried the master.

"Rascal!" repeated the man, apparently terrified.

"I knew he would not," exclaimed my patron, with an air of exultation for which I saw no cause; 'well, well, never mind, put down the ham and the wine; with those and the rice, I dare say, young gentleman, you will be able to make it out. I ought to apologise—but, in fact, it is all your own fault that there is not more; if I had fallen in with you earlier, we should have had a better dinner.'

"I confess I was surprised, disappointed, and amused; but, as matters stood, there was no use in complaining, and accordingly we fell to, neither of us wanting the best of all sauces—appetite.

"I soon perceived that my promised patron had baited his trap with a fowl to catch a fool; but as we ate and drank, all care vanished, and rogue as I suspected him to be, my long-tailed friend was a clever witty fellow, and besides telling me a number of anecdotes, gave me some very good advice; amongst other things to be avoided, he cautioned me against numbers of people who, in Venice, lived only by duping the unwary. I thought this counsel came very ill from him. 'Above all,' said he, 'keep up your spirits, and recollect the Venetian proverb—A hundred years of melancholy will not pay one farthing of debt.'"

FOUNDERS OF THE REPUBLIC.

Our ancestors were not, like some colonists, disgorged from the mother country to keep the remaining population sound and pure; they were not a surplus mass thrown off to prevent national apoplexy, or political spasm; such a population as sometimes went from Attica to take possession of the islands in the numerous seas about them, or to the more distant shores of Africa; nor were they sent by the parent country to extend her commerce, or to gain a footing on or near the territories of other nations.

They did not come to this country as the Spanish and French colonists to the "summer isles," allured by the golden dreams of avarice, or by the glowing description of the luxuriance of the soil, abounding in perpetual fruits and flowers; an earthly paradise, teeming with all that could satisfy the appetite or regale the senses; which for centuries have been the abode of luxury, superstition, profligacy, and crime. No; the sober calculations of forming a thrifty settlement, which would make a good home for themselves and their descendants, operated upon some of the early colonists of this country. A spirit of enterprise natural to enlightened men, induced others to come and see, and in doing this they became attached and fixed to these shores which their posterity now inhabit. Others had different motives for emigration; a love of freedom in thought and speech. They were fully sensible of their situation. They could not anticipate all the occurrences which might happen in their destinies, but they were determined to commence upon the broad principle, that knowledge and virtue are the pillars of power and security in every national code. They saw physical means about them for an almost interminable increase of population. The sea was on one side and boundless forests on the other. Navigable rivers were flowing into the oceans. Nothing but a thinly scattered race of rude men stood in their way to the founding of an empire larger than the world had ever seen. Nature seemed to have waited from her birth until this moment for their coming, to give them possession of her bounties. This was the scene for contemplation, and a place to originate a new course of thoughts upon political and civil liberty. There were, in these retreats, no shouts of the conqueror, no means of the conquered; the time resembled the cool of the evening, and the place the abode of innocence, when and where other beings were at rest, and God walked with man in his primeval state. Every thing, in America, was to be begun, and every thing seemed to depend upon themselves; with this happy difference, however, between us and those in paradise, for our safety and happiness were to depend upon eating freely of the tree of knowledge, which was forbidden to him who first sprang from the dust of the earth. Here was offered the opportunity to cultivate the mind without the trammels and fetters which embarrass and bind those borne in aged and decaying communities. Here plains, and vales, and hills, offered opportunities for all the experiments of agriculture. No agrarian law was needed to give men an equality; there was one passed already by nature without stint. The sites for cities were unoccupied; and they exercised their judgments upon the subject of a proper place to build them, without statutes or restraints. The political compact was to be formed and altered as the covenants could agree; for there was no other law-giver than their own understandings, no Solons but their own wisdom, no Lycurguses but the severe discussions of their own judgments. There was no syren to allure them from their duties to the rocks on which they might sleep until their locks of strength were shorn. There were no beds of flowers beneath which the serpent's flattery and fashion might glide to wound their naked feet with sharp stings. Indolence to them would have been death; and labour, that supposed curse on man, was a blessing. Thus stripped of every shackle, they began their work of founding an empire. By the lights emitted from their minds shall we trace the path they pursued, and the deeds they performed. The light of the sun passes away with the going down of the same; but the accumulated light of successive ages of intellect, like the precious stones which adorn the city of God, chases away all darkness, and beams in eternal splendour. Knapp's Lectures.

LETTER FROM LOUIS XVIII. TO NAPOLEON,

WHEN FIRST CONSUL.

It is well known that Louis XVIII., in a dignified but complimentary letter to Bonaparte, claimed his throne at his hands. The St. Helena Memoirs communicate the fact, and give the substance of the first consul's answer. In the Memoirs of Bourrienne we find an exact copy of the correspondence, and an account of the reception it met with from Napoleon.

"The first consul was greatly agitated at the reception of this letter. Although he every day declared his resolution to have nothing to do with the princes, he was still reflecting upon whether it was necessary to answer it or not. The number of important affairs (20th February, 1800) which occupied him at the time, seconded his indecision, and he was in no hurry to reply. I ought to say that Josephine and Hortense conjured him to give the king hope; that that bound him to nothing, and would leave time to see if he could not in the end play a far higher part than that of Monck. Their entreaties were so urgent, that he said to me, 'these devils of women are mad; the Faubourg St. Germain turns their heads; they have made the royalists into gods. But that is nothing to me; I'll have none of them.' Madame Bonaparte told me that she urged him to this step, lest he should think of making himself king, which always excited in her a presentiment of misfortune that she could not banish from her mind. . . . In the numerous conversations which I had with the first consul, he discussed the proposition of Louis XVIII., and its consequence, with great sagacity; he said, however, 'the partisans of the Bourbons are very much mistaken if they think I am a man to play the part of Monck.' The thing rested there at first, and the letter of the king was left on the table. In the interval Louis XVIII. wrote a second letter.

"It is a long time since, general, you ought to be aware, that you have acquired my esteem. If you doubt the force of my gratitude, choose your place, fix the lot of your friends. As to my principles, I am a Frenchman—clement by character, I should be still more so by reason. No! the conqueror at Lodi, Castiglione, Arcole, of Italy and of Egypt, cannot prefer a vain celebrity to true glory. But you are losing precious time. We have the power of ensuring the glory of France; I say we, because I have need of Bonaparte for that, and he cannot do it without me.

"General! Europe observes you, glory awaits you, and I am impatient to restore peace to my people. Louis." This letter also remained for some time unnoticed. At length Bonaparte determined to write an answer. He made a rough copy; Bourrienne suggested some grammatical changes, which were made. This distinguished original was then signed; it was not, however, after the alterations, in a state fit to send, and it laid for some time longer on the table; it was despatched at last. The substance was, that Louis ought to abandon all hope of a return to his throne, for it was only by marching over the bodies of a hundred thousand Frenchmen that he could arrive at it.

Some days after the receipt of the letter from Louis XVIII. Bonaparte and his secretary were walking in his favourite alley at Malmaison, which was only separated from his cabinet by a small bridge; he was in a good humour, for affairs were going on well, and he commenced a confidential conversation on the return of the Bourbons. His remarks prove that he had deeply weighed all the peculiarities of his situation, and had calculated the probable consequences of the restoration of the legitimate family with his ordinary acuteness, and more than ordinary coolness. He broke off the dialogue with—"My part is taken. Let us talk of it no more; but I well know how the women torment you. Instead of agreeing with them, however, you ought to open their eyes and undeceive them about their ridiculous presentiments. Let them leave me alone, and attend to their knitting." "The women went on knitting," remarks Bourrienne, "he went on writing. Bonaparte made himself emperor—and died at St. Helena."

CHILLING POLITENESS.

Without entering into any disquisition as to the rights of hospitality and the merits of social duties, we shall briefly notice what we conceive to be 'singularly cold civility'—the effects of which are felt by the suffering party, long after their exposure to it. Large rooms reserved for the use of company, or invited guests, are often shut up for many days, and even sometimes for weeks together, in damp and cold weather. These are opened, and a fire made in them an hour or two only before the arrival of the visitors, who are allowed by this means to sit exposed, at first to the chilling air of the room, and subsequently to the moisture which evaporates from the curtains, carpeting, and chair-seats. The persons thus suffering are generally clad in a lighter attire than is customary with them, and if they do not actually shiver under their reception, we must attribute it to an uncommon effort of volition. But in addition to these dispensations common to the whole group, there is not unfrequently a current of air rushing in with force enough to turn a small windmill, through the crevice, or opening of a door, or window, which strikes against the neck or back of some timid maiden, or awkward country youth, who are fearful of being thought unpolitely by changing their places, and obtaining a seat nearer the fire. Dinner is at length served, and then, by the doctrine of compensation, these two persons are allowed to sit with their backs to the fire during the repast, to make room, at a more pleasant part of the table, for their seniors, or those who have frankness enough to say that they cannot bear the fire; that is, they cannot bear to be roasted—for politeness sake.

Night arrives, and the hour for sleep finds the favoured guest in a bed, which has been for weeks a bed of state, and between sheets, which are so damp that they adhere to the skin. Perhaps the room had been washed out in the morning, in order to be in nice trim, and as an evidence of still greater respect to the visitor, who, in addition to the other evidences of chilling politeness, receives the cold damp air coming from the floor and walls.

Colds, coughs, and consumptions are often the effects of this kind of friendly attentions, which are succeeded by another series, scarcely less distressing, and still more fatal. These consist in the recommendation of sundry cough mixtures, pulmonic balsams, and the like. Hence, a person has a poor chance of escape, under the kindness of those friends, of whom one class bring on the disease, and the other kill, promising to cure it. Journal of Health.

LAFAYETTE.

Lafayette is one of the noblest characters of France. Always the same amidst the raging of an excited people, and at the head of an army, at the tribune of the legislative assembly, and in prison, under every circumstance his life had only one object—justice and freedom. To this noble end he sacrificed twenty years of his active life, to this he devoted his exertions and his property. For this he gave up all that men usually desire—distinction, rank, convenience and wealth. Placed in society by his birth—the favoured and the distinguished, he descended to natural equality, to become a man and a citizen. Favour and hate, tempted him equally in vain, and in a stormy and agitated time, he changed neither his opinions nor his principles, and hope left him equally unchanged with fear. A friend of justice and truth, under whatever climate he found them, he always rendered homage and assistance to these highest benefits of humanity. He defended freedom against arbitrary power, and lawful power against anarchy. He would have saved France and the king, if France and the king had trusted him. A citizen of every state that honoured the citizen, a friend of men where they showed themselves human, he remained true to France. Every thing noble seemed to him natural, the fulfilment of the most arduous duty an impulse, and as he never violated right, nor denied the truth, so he never deviated from the path of honour, and his virtues, with all their severities, retained a certain chivalrous grace. Although he stands distinguished, and alone in his time and nation, we remark in him no feature of harshness, partiality, or affectation. We may ask whether there can be a greater triumph than fifty years of a life, such as he has passed from his early youth, where he devoted himself to the liberation of America, to the present day. Ambition, you will say, is the soul of all his exertions. A strange ambition, which in fifty changing years, in youth, in manhood, and in age, has followed the same object, constantly sacrificing himself, and seeking his happiness only in the welfare of others. Modern times can only display one public character, who claims our love and admiration in the same degree—his brother in arms—Koskiusko.

THE INFIDEL.

It is an awful commentary on the doctrine of infidelity, that its most strenuous supporters have either miserably falsified their sentiments in the moment of trial, or terminated their existence in obscurity and utter wretchedness. The gifted author of the "Age of Reason" passed the last years of his life in a manner which the meanest slave that ever trembled beneath the lash of the taskmaster could have no cause to envy. Rousseau might, indeed, be pointed out, as in some degree an exception—but it is well known, that the enthusiastic philosopher was a miserable and disappointed man. He met death, it is true, with something like calmness. But he had no pure and beautiful hope beyond the perishing things of the natural world. He loved the works of God for their exceeding beauty, not for their manifestation of an overruling intelligence. Life had become a burthen to him, but his spirit recoiled at the dampness and silence of the sepulchre—the cold, unbroken sleep, and the slow wasting away of mortality. He perished, a worshipper of that beauty which but faintly shadows forth the unimaginable glory of its Creator. At the closing hour of day, when the broad west was glowing like the gates of paradise, and the vine-hung hills of his beautiful land were bathed in the rich light of sun-set, the philosopher departed. The last glance of his glazing eye was to him an everlasting farewell to existence—the last homage of a godlike intellect to holiness and beauty. The blackness of darkness was before him—the valley of the shadow of death was to him unescapable and eternal—the better land beyond it was shrouded from his vision. Whittier.

SENSATION.

Much is said in the British newspapers about agitation in France, in the Netherlands, and in the free states of Germany. We are not in the least alarmed for the cause of order or humanity, by the movements and discussions which particularly attract the notice and excite the "prophetic souls" of the London writers. They are pleased, at times, to be apprehensive, from the same cause, about our "turbulent democracy," as Captain Hall styles the republic par excellence. Wherever the representative system prevails, and there is a popular infusion in the political constitution, a certain degree of intestine heat and ferment will exist, always more or less salutary. The long-lived republics of antiquity and the middle ages, were constantly perturbed—the "clouds which hang on freedom's jealous brow" were generally of the most threatening aspect. Before the French revolution, the changes of ministry were frequent, but they seldom had reference to any public opinion; now, it is the working of that opinion which mainly produces the substitutions or fluctuations in the king's councils, whose responsibility to the chambers secures the national liberties. We believe that opinion in France is now sound enough and strong enough "to crush rebellious principles which have no foundation in morals, and rebellious minds that have no provocation in tyranny." and that it will equally resist the attempts of ultramontanism on the other side. With popular institutions nothing stagnates; intellect, virtue, ambition, knowledge, selfishness, must be perpetually active; they seem, from time to time, to be tumultuary; but their action does not affect the organic parts of the system, while they animate or disturb the machinery. SESSIONS HALL.

This is the new appellation given to the rotunda, since it has been fitted up for the trial of criminals. The shape of the dome, instead of assisting the voice, divides it into a number of echoes, which are distributed throughout the hall. For instance, when the prisoner is asked the usual question, "are you guilty or not guilty?" officious echo, without giving the prisoner time to reply, immediately answers "guilty!"

Counsel.—What was the prisoner's reply to the demand of this Letty Dunn?

Echo.—Let her dun.

Counsel.—Who was it advised the prisoner to strike her?

Echo.—Riker.

Counsel.—What was then said by this Dina Hoffman?

Echo.—Off-man!

Counsel.—What kind of goods are sold in the fancy store of the Messrs. Fosters?

Echo.—Oysters.

Counsel.—Now tell the jury, on your oath, who was it that stole the jewelry in question, or as you call it—who made this "bold raise?"

Echo.—Old Hays.

Counsel.—Did you see any one with his hat filled?

Echo.—Hatfield.

And so they go on to the end of the chapter; echo continually insulting court and jury, from the judge on the bench to the constable at the door, making confusion worse confounded. What is to be done we know not, but some remedy must be applied, or our worthy Recorder will be compelled to exclaim, like one of his learned predecessors, "I have tried a dozen causes this day, without hearing a word." THE FOUNDLING OF NUREMBERG.

In the month of May, two years ago, there appeared in the streets of Nuremberg a youth, apparently between seventeen and eighteen years of age, in the dress of a peasant, and holding in his hand a letter, addressed to a captain of cavalry, resident in that city. The letter, which was without signature, stated that the young man was desirous of enlisting in the cavalry, as his deceased father had served in that corps; that the writer of the letter was a poor day-labourer, with ten children; and that he had received the lad, when a little child, from a nurse, whom he did not know, to bring him up secretly. The letter also contained several palpable untruths, and among the rest asserted that the boy could read and write. The captain of cavalry declared that he would have nothing to do with the business, and sent the young man as a vagrant to the guard-house. He was afterwards carried before the officers of police, who looked upon him as an impostor. It was soon ascertained, however, that he could scarcely speak a word; that he had been totally neglected, and had received no education whatever.

An official notification was then published, requiring all persons who might be able to give any information respecting this mysterious case, to communicate what they knew. About four months after, an old woman, said to have come from the neighbourhood of Nuremberg, waited on the burgomaster, and made a communication to him, under the pledge of secrecy. The youth has since been treated with great attention. Several teachers were immediately engaged for him, and as he is not deficient in capacity, they soon taught him to converse and read, and thus enabled him to give some information respecting his former fate.

His whole life, as far as he could recollect it, had been spent in a small obscure dungeon, faintly lighted from above. He slept on straw, and was fed with bread and water, which used to be brought to him at night by a man; and as he was often asleep when it was brought, several weeks often passed over without his seeing his attendant. The only occupation of his childhood, as far as his contracted prison would permit him, was riding on a wooden horse, and almost the only words he could speak when he came to Nuremberg were, "horsey-ride."

On his arrival at Nuremberg he refused meat and vegetables, and would eat nothing but bread and water. He slept on the ground, and had no idea of the use of a bed. His legs were so cramped, as the roof of his dungeon was so low that when he grew up, he could not stand erect in it. Having lived so long in obscurity, he could not endure the full light of day. On approaching a church-yard, it was observed that he seemed to feel an indescribable kind of horror, from which it has been conjectured that his prison was beside some burying-ground or tomb. He relates that his keeper brought him out of the dungeon by night, and sometimes carried him, because from want of practice he could not walk far. They travelled only at night, lying under bushes during the day, and at last, after several nights had elapsed, they reached Nuremberg.

The letter which the lad presented in Nuremberg stated, that he had been christened by the name of Kaspar; the surname Hauser was given him in Nuremberg. His manner is agreeable, and he converses with much propriety in a tele-tele; but in mixed company he becomes embarrassed, as the act of speaking is still new to him. He has made extraordinary progress in music, drawing, and languages. He has also learnt to ride, in which he takes great pleasure. The burgomaster treats him as if he were his own son, and he lives with the professor of the gymnasium, who superintends his education.

On the seventeenth of October last, between eleven and twelve in the forenoon, while the professor was from home, the house bell was rung. The professor's mother, who was weak and unwell, desired Kaspar to answer the door. He no sooner opened the door than a man, the same person, he believes, who brought him to Nuremberg, ran at him with a knife. After receiving several wounds about the head he fell, and would, probably, have been murdered, had not the assassin believed that he had killed him, for he said aloud, "I need be afraid of you no longer!" However, on hearing a noise in the house, the murderer fled. Young Hauser is recovering from the effects of this dreadful attack.

CONSTANCY—A FABLE.

In the ancient times, when flowers, and trees, and fairies were on speaking terms, and all friendly together, one fine summer's day, the sun shone out on a beautiful garden, where there were all sorts of flowers that ye could mention, and a lovely but giddy fairy went sporting about from one to the other (although no one could see her, because of the sun light) as gay as the morning lark; then says the fairy to the rose—"rose, if the sun was clouded, and the storm came on, would ye shelter and love me still?" "Do ye doubt me?" says the rose, and reddened up with anger. "Lily," says the fairy to another love, "if the sun was clouded and a storm came on, would ye shelter and love me still?" "Oh! do you think I could change?" says the lily, and she grew still paler with sorrow. "Tulip," said the fairy, "if the sun was clouded, and a storm came on, would ye shelter and love me still?" "Upon my word," said the tulip, making a very gentleman-like bow, "ye'r the very first lady that ever doubted my constancy;" so the fairy sported on, joyful to think of her kind and blooming friends. She revelled away for a time, and then she thought on the pale blue violet, that was almost covered with its broad green leaves; and although it was an old comrade, she might have forgotten it, had it not been for the sweet scent that came up from the modest flower. "Oh, violet!" said the fairy, "if the sun was clouded, and a storm came on, would ye shelter and love me still?" And the violet made answer—"Ye have known me long, sweet fairy, and in the first spring time, when there were few other flowers, ye used to shield yourself from the cold blast under my leaves; now ye've almost forgotten me—but let it pass—try my truth, if ever you should meet misfortune—but I say nothing." Well the fairy skitted at that, and clapped her silvery wings, and whisked, singing off, on a sun beam; but she was hardly gone, when a black cloud grew up out of the north, all in a minute, and the light was shrouded, and the rain fell in lashings like hail, and away flies the fairy to her friend the rose—"Now, rose," says she, "the rain is come, so shelter and love me still." "I can hardly shelter my own buds," says the rose; "but the lily has a deep cup." Well, the poor little fairy's wings were almost wet, but she got to the lily. "Lily," says she, "the storm is come, so shelter and love me still." "I am sorry," says the lily, "but if I were to open my cup, the rain would beat in like fun, and my seed would be spoilt—the tulip has long leaves." Well, the fairy was downhearted enough, but she went to the tulip, who she always thought a most sweet spoken gentleman. He certainly did not look as bright as he had done in the sun, but she waved her little wand, and said, "Tulip," says she, "the rain and storm are come, and I am very weary, but you will shelter and love me still?" "Begone," says the tulip, "be off," says he; "a pretty pickle I should be in, if I let every wandering scamp come about me." Well, by this time she was very tired, and her wings hung dripping at her back, wet indeed—but there was no help for it, and leaning on her pretty silver wand, she limped off to the violet; and the darling little flower, with its blue eye, that's as clear as a kitten's, saw her coming, and never a word she spoke, but opened her broad green leaves, and took the wild wandering creature to her bosom, and dried her wings, and breathed the sweetest perfumes over her, and sheltered her until the storm was clean gone. Then the humble violet spoke, and said—"Fairy queen, it is bad to flirt with many, for the love of one true heart is enough for earthly woman or fairy spirit; the old love is better than the gay compliments of a world of flowers, for it will last when the others pass." And the fairy knew that it was true for the blue violet; and she contented herself ever after, and built her downy bower under the wide-spreading violet leaves, that sheltered her from the rude winter's wind and the hot summer's sun, and to this very day the fairies love the violet beds. RED JACKET.

Red Jacket was one of the most celebrated chiefs of his day and nation, and his long life has, we believe, been rich with incidents, which, could they be collected, and placed in the hands of an ingenious writer, might be woven into an interesting piece of biography. He was an active warrior early in life, and fame speaks of him as having been the foremost on the trail, and the bravest in battle; and had it not been for the vice of intemperance, he would have continued one of the noblest specimens of his proud, though ill-fated race, until the last. We have heard General Root, who had early opportunities of listening to his eloquence, declare, that Red Jacket and John Randolph were the two most perfect specimens of the true orator of nature that he had ever heard. It was not until the vigour of his frame had abated, and the fire of his nature been cooled by the frosts of many winters, and the lustre of his eye somewhat dimmed, that we enjoyed opportunities of hearing this orator of the forest. But even then his form was erect and manly, his attitudes and gestures graceful, and his voice rich and melodious; while his words were full of sound sense and energy. At the close of the revolutionary war, he parted with Washington upon excellent terms; and his admiration for his great white father continued through life. We have more than once heard him describe his parting interview with the hero of our revolution, and his eyes kindled at the recollection. Last spring he repaired to Washington, and had an interview with President Jackson. And the last speech that we ever heard him deliver to an audience, was a parallel between Washington and Jackson, which was admirably sketched, and abounded with nice discriminations of character. He appeared to possess an accurate knowledge of the character, temper, talents, and disposition of both. To the last he has been one of the most unyielding opponents of the attempts to civilise and christianise the Indians—maintaining, that the forest was their legitimate home, and the hunter state their proper occupation. He has not died unsung, and all will remember the beautiful little elegy in anticipation, which Halleck wrote for the Talisman of 1828—in which, by-the-by, the poet made the chieftain very angry by calling him a Tuscarora instead of a Seneca. Buffalo Journal.

HERCULANEUM.

Since the commencement of 1828, the government of Naples have caused excavations to be made in the ruins of Herculaneum, and the following are the principal results of the researches up to the middle of the past year:—They have discovered the most splendid private house of the ancients that has ever been seen by modern eyes. The house has a suite of chambers, with a court in the centre. There is a separate part of the mansion allotted to the females, a garden surrounded by arcades and columns, and also a grand saloon, which probably served for the meeting of the whole family. Another house, also discovered, was very remarkable, from the quantity and nature of the provisions in it, none of which have been disturbed for eighteen centuries, for the doors remained fastened in the same state as they were at the period of the catastrophe which buried Herculaneum. The family which occupied this mansion was, in all likelihood, when the disaster took place, laying in provisions for the winter. The provisions found in the store-rooms consist of dates, chestnuts, large walnuts, dried figs, almonds, prunes, corn, oil, peas, lentils, pies, and hams. The internal arrangement of the house, the manner in which it was ornamented, all, in fact, announced that it had belonged to a very rich family, and to admirers of the arts; for there were discovered many pictures, representing Polyphemus and Galatea, Hercules and the three Hesperides, Cupid and a Bacchante, Mercury and Io, Perseus killing Medusa; there were also in the same house articles in glass, bronze, and terre cotta, as well as medallions in silver, representing in relief Apollo and Diana. The persons who direct the excavations have caused them to be continued in the same street, and they will, in regular order, search the shops and houses which border on each side, and also the lanes which branch off from it. THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Elegant extract.—Men are little accustomed to praise their contemporaries. Envy, timidity, and a thousand other petty or malicious motives prevent the expression of praise, until the merit that might have been amply rewarded and nurtured, and "lapt into elysium" by it, has sunk into the grave. Milton's Paradise Lost was sold in his own lifetime for fifteen pounds! Shall we, in this virtuous and enlightened age, be alike insensible to passing worth, or deaf to the voice of eloquence worthy of the ancient glories of Hellas or Rome? We possess amongst us in these United States an orator, of whom the simplicity and mildness of his style, the expansiveness, profoundness, and sagacity of his philosophy, and the impressiveness, boldness, and reach of his intellect, should deservedly elevate him to the loftiest heights yet attained by his countrymen. We allude to Daniel Webster. Of him we may be justly proud. It matters not to what section of land he owes his birth, to what division of party he has temporarily attached himself; his talents belong to the country, and his eloquence will command the unceasing admiration of all time.

As a specimen of his power, we shall quote the following extract from his first speech on the public land question, simply premising that into the merits of the abstract question, or the propriety of the resolution which gave birth to its discussion at the present moment, we are neither prepared, nor were we so, are we willing to enter.

"The original North American colonists either fled from Europe, like our New-England ancestors, to avoid persecution, or came hither at their own charges, and often at the ruin of their fortunes, as private adventurers. Generally speaking, they derived neither succour nor protection from their governments at home. Wide, indeed, is the difference between those cases and ours. From the very origin of the government, these western lands, and the just protection of those who had settled, or should settle on them, have been the leading objects in our policy, and have led to expenditures, both of blood and treasure, not inconsiderable; not indeed exceeding the importance of the object, and not yielded grudgingly or reluctantly certainly; but yet not inconsiderable, though necessary sacrifices, made for high and proper ends. The Indian title has been extinguished at the expense of many millions. Is that nothing? There is still a much more material consideration. These colonists, if we are to call them so, in passing the Alleghany, did not pass beyond the care and protection of their own government. Wherever they went the public arm was still stretched over them. A parental government at home was still ever mindful of their condition, and their wants; and nothing was spared, which a just sense of their necessities required. Is it forgotten, that it was one of the most arduous duties of the government, in its earliest years, to defend the frontiers against the north-western Indians? Are the sufferings and misfortunes under Hannar and St. Clair, not worthy to be remembered? Do the occurrences connected with these military efforts, show an unfeeling neglect of western interests? And here, sir, what becomes of the gentleman's analogy? What English armies accompanied our ancestors to clear the forests of a barbarous foe? What treasures of the exchequer were expended in buying up the original titles to the soil? What government held its ægis over our fathers' heads, as they pioneered their way in the wilderness? Sir, it was not till general Wayne's victory, in 1794, that it could be said, we had conquered the savages. It was not till that period, that the government could have considered itself as having established an entire ability to protect those who should undertake the conquest of the wilderness. And here, sir, at the epoch of 1794, let us pause, and survey the scene. It is now thirty-five years since that scene actually existed. Let us, sir, look back and behold it. Over all that is now Ohio, there then stretched one vast wilderness, unbroken, except by two small spots of civilized culture, the one at Marietta, and the other at Cincinnati. At these little openings, hardly each a pin's point upon the map, the arm of the frontiersman had levelled the forest, and let in the sun. These little patches of earth and themselves almost shadowed by the over-hanging boughs of that wilderness, which had stood and perpetuated itself, from century to century, ever since the creation, were all that had then been rendered verdant by the hand of man. In an extent of hundreds and thousands of square miles, no other surface of smiling green attested the presence of civilization. The hunter's path crossed mighty rivers, flowing in solitary grandeur, whose sources lay in remote and unknown regions of the wilderness. It struck upon the north, on a vast inland sea, over which the wintry tempests raged as on the ocean; all around was bare creation. It was fresh, untouched, unbowed, magnificent wilderness. And, sir, what is it now? Is it imagination only, or can it possibly be fact, that presents such a change, as surprises and astonishes us, when we turn our eyes to what Ohio now is? Is it reality, or a dream, that in so short a period even as thirty-five years, there has sprung up, on the same surface, an independent state, with a million of people? A million of inhabitants! an amount of population greater than that of all the cantons of Switzerland; equal to one-third of all the people of the United States, when they undertook to accomplish their independence. This new member of the republic has already left far behind her a majority of the old states. She is now by the side of Virginia and Pennsylvania; and, in point of numbers, will shortly admit no equal but New-York herself. If, sir, we may judge of measures by their results, what lessons do these facts read us, upon the policy of the government? What inferences do they authorize upon the general question of kindness or unkindness? What convictions do they enforce, as to the wisdom and ability, on the one hand, or the folly and incapacity, on the other, of our general administration of western affairs? Sir, does it not require some portion of self-respect in us, to imagine, that if our light had shone on the path of government, if our wisdom could have been consulted in its measures, a more rapid advance in strength and prosperity would have been experienced? For my own part, while I am struck with wonder at the success, I also look with admiration at the wisdom and foresight which originally arranged and prescribed the system for the settlement of the public domain. Its operation has been, without a moment's interruption, to push the settlements of the western country to the full extent of our utmost means."

Polytechnic Institute.—On the twenty-first of November last, we gave a brief description of a projected institution distinguished by the above title, to be located at Shrewsbury, in the state of New-Jersey. We then stated that the projectors were about applying to the legislature of that state for an act of incorporation. This application has been completely successful, a charter has been obtained, and the seminary will go into operation in the month of May ensuing. More pupils are already offered than can be immediately received; but, we understand, that every exertion will be made, as soon as the spring opens, to commence such a number of buildings as will accommodate several hundred boarding students. These edifices will be erected and finished in the course of the ensuing summer, together with several workshops, for the mechanic arts. Lessons in agriculture, horticulture, horsemanship, &c. will be given to as many as desire such a course of instruction, as soon as the school opens.

Masquerade once more.—Notwithstanding the interdiction of the legislature, by imposing a fine of one thousand dollars on the perpetrator of a masquerade, subscriptions are opened for the purpose of producing a most splendid one, at the Park theatre, on next Wednesday, the seventeenth instant. The manager, of course, intends to pay the fine, and pocket the surplus. Four hundred tickets are to be issued at five dollars each, (admitting a gentleman and two ladies) the proceeds of which will amount to two thousand dollars. The company of course will be select, and the same rules and regulations will be adopted which gave such universal satisfaction on similar occasions last winter.

New-York arcade.—This establishment will be sold at public auction on Monday next, at the Tontine coffee-house.

The Daily Sentinel.—Arrangements are making for the removal of the difficulties which have prevented the publication of this new journal.

THE GREEK EXILE'S FAREWELL TO NAXOS.

WORDS BY BYRON—MUSIC BY BISHOP.

MODERATO.

When I left thy shores, O Nax-os! Not a tear in sor-row fell; Not a sigh or fal-ter-ing ac-cent, Spoke my bo-som's strug-gling swell;

But my heart sank chill with-in me, And I waved a hand as cold, When I thought thy shores, Oh Nax-os, I should ne-ver more be-hold.

Still the blue waves danced around us,
Mid the sunbeams' cheerful smile;

Still the air breathed balmy summer,
Wafted from that happy isle;

When some hand the strain awaking,
Of my home and native shore;

'Twas then first I wept, oh Naxos!
That I ne'er should see thee more.

THE FALSE RHYME.

"Come tell me where the maid is found,
Whose heart can love without deceit,
And I will range the world around,
To sigh one moment at her feet."—Moors.

On a fine July day, the fair Margaret, queen of Navarre, then on a visit to her royal brother, had arranged a rural feast for the morning following, which Francis declined attending. He was melancholy; and the cause was said to be some lover's quarrel with a favourite dame. The morrow came, and dark rain and murky clouds destroyed at once the schemes of the courtly throng. Margaret was angry, and she grew weary; her only hope for amusement was in Francis, and he had shut himself up—an excellent reason why she should the more desire to see him. She entered his apartment; he was standing at the casement, against which the noisy shower beat, writing with a diamond on the glass. Two beautiful dogs were his sole companions. As queen Margaret entered, he hastily let down the silken curtain before the window, and looked a little confused.

"What treason is this, my liege," said the queen, "which crimson your cheek? I must see the same."

"It is treason," replied the king, "and therefore, sweet sister, thou must not see it."

This the more excited Margaret's curiosity, and a playful contest ensued. Francis at last yielded; he threw himself on a huge high-backed settee; and, as the lady drew back the curtain with an arch smile, he grew grave and sentimental, as he reflected on the cause which had inspired this libel against all woman-kind.

"What have we here?" said Margaret. "Nay, this is lèse majesté—"

"Souvent femme varie—bien fou qui s'y fie!"
(Often woman changes—foolish he who trusts her.)

Very little change would greatly amend your line, sir—would it not run better thus:

"Souvent homme varie—bien folle qui s'y fie!"
(Often man changes—foolish she who trusts him.)

I could tell you a thousand stories of man's inconstancy."

"I will be content with one true tale of woman's fidelity," said Francis drily; "but do not provoke me. I would fain be at peace with the soft mutabilities, for thy dear sake."

"I defy your grace," replied Margaret, rashly, to 'instance the falsehood of one noble and well-reputed dame."

"Not even Emilie de Lagny?" said the king.

This was a sore subject for the queen. Emilie had been brought up in her household, the most beautiful and the most virtuous of her maids of honour. She had long loved the Sire de Lagny, and their nuptials were celebrated with rejoicings but little ominous of the result. De Lagny was accused but a year after of traitorously yielding to the emperor a fortress under his command, and he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. For some time Emilie was inconsolable, often visiting the miserable dungeon of her husband, and suffering, on her return from witnessing his wretchedness, such paroxysms of grief as threatened her life. Suddenly, in the midst of her sorrow, she disappeared; and inquiry only divulged the disgraceful fact, that she had escaped from France, bearing her jewels with her, and accompanied by her page, Robinet Leroux. It was whispered that, during her journey, the lady and the stripling were often seen together; and Margaret, enraged at these discoveries, commanded that no further quest should be made for her lost favourite.

Taunted now by her brother, she defended Emilie, declaring that she believed her to be guiltless, even going so far as to boast that within a month she would bring proof of her innocence.

"Robinet was a pretty boy," said Francis, laughing.

"Let us make a bet," cried Margaret. "If I lose, I will bear this vile rhyme of thine as a motto to my shame to my grave; if I win—"

"I will break my window and grant thee whatever boon thou askest."

The result of this bet was long sung by troubadour and minstrel. The queen employed a hundred emissaries—published rewards for any intelligence of Emilie—all in vain. The month was expiring, and Margaret would have given many bright jewels to redeem her word. On the eve of the fatal day, the jailer of the prison in which the Sire de Lagny was confined, sought an audience of the queen; he brought her a message from the knight to say, that if the lady Margaret would ask his pardon as her boon, and obtain from her royal brother that he might be brought before him, her bet was won. Fair Margaret was very joyful, and readily made the desired promise. Francis was unwilling to see his false servant, but he was in high good humour, for a cavalier had that morning brought intelligence of a victory over the imperialists. The messenger himself was lauded in the despatches as the most fearless and brave knight in France. The king loaded him with presents, only regretting that a vow prevented the soldier from raising a visor or declaring his name.

That same evening, as the setting sun shone on the lattice on which the ungallant rhyme was traced, Francis reposed on the same settee, and the beautiful queen of Navarre, with triumph in her bright eyes, sat beside him. Attended by guards, the prisoner was brought in; his frame was attenuated by privation, and he walked with tottering steps. He knelt at the feet of Francis, and uncovered his head; a quantity of rich golden hair then escaping, fell over the sunken cheeks and pallid brow of the suppliant.

"We have treason here!" cried the king. "Sir jailer, where is your prisoner?"

"Sire, blame him not," said the soft, faltering voice of Emilie; "wiser men than he have been deceived by woman. My dear lord was guiltless of the crime for which he suffered. There was but one mode to save him; I assumed his chains—he escaped with poor Robinet Leroux in my attire; he joined your army; the young and gallant cavalier who delivered the despatches to your grace, whom you overwhelmed with honours and rewards, is my own Euguerard de Lagny. I waited but for his arrival with testimonials of his innocence, to declare myself to my lady the queen. Has she not won her bet? and the boon she asks—"

"Is de Lagny's pardon," said Margaret, as she also knelt to the king. "Spare your faithful vassal, sire, and reward this lady's truth!"

Francis first broke the false speaking window, then he raised the ladies from their supplicatory posture.

In the tournament given to celebrate this "triumph of la dicie," the sire de Lagny bore off every prize; and surely there was more loveliness in Emilie's faded cheek—more grace in her emaciated form, types as they were of truest affection, than in the prouder bearing and fresher complexion of the most brilliant beauty in attendance on the courtly festival.

LAMENTATION OF THE MOORS,

AFTER THE BATTLE OF LUCENU.

Granada the beautiful! land of the brave!
Thy glory has faded, thine honour decayed;
The viv'ramble no more echoes back the glad voice,
Nor thy gallant young nobles in tourneys rejoice.

Alas, for Boabdil! our king is laid low;
For the flower of chivalry bitter our woe;
All is lost, they are gone, our warrior band
Are cold on the plain of that renegade land.

Oh, hush the soft lute, and the light castinet!
The dance of the zambre shall beauty forget;
Forlorn the alhambra, and withered the flowers
That once breathed perfume through its desolate bowers.

In vain is the nightingale's song in the grove,
We heed not thy music, sweet minstrel of love;
The christians have vanquished, the crescent is low,
Our king bound in chains of the renegade foe.

Farewell, beautiful Granada! farewell to thy towers,
Thou city of groves, thou garden of flowers!
The doomed one has fallen, our bright sun hath set,
The pale cross now waves o'er each fair minaret. ELIOISA.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

HOBOKEN.

HOBOKEN! with thy poplar shore, thou'rt beautiful indeed,
When through the west the monarch sun bath spurr'd his fiery steed;
And oft, like madd'ning chief, looks back upon the dark'ning field,
And falling mid the crimson flood, refuses still to yield:

When evening, with her silent step, steals gently o'er the land,
And feeds the parched flowers with dew from out her nursing hand;
When leaves and streams are sighing sweet, to woo the minstrel wind,
And shadows come upon the world like thoughts upon the mind;

And the moon, reflected and reflecting, shines on wave and bower,
And calls the day-worn spirit back to contemplation's hour,
And flings her gathering rays of light on waves that never rest,
As if the stars had left the sky to grace the Hudson's breast;

How have I loved at that sweet time to trace each mimic cove,
Or with my own unspoken thoughts to walk thy "barble grove;"
As misers at the secret hour their hidden wealth survey,
And hug the bright memorial heap of many a vanished day.

There to unloose my prison'd thoughts and catch the themes they bring
From memory's fields, like carrier-birds, on their returning wing;
To see the forms of buried friends, so loved, yet now so cold,
And hear their happy voices again, e'en from their distant mould.

Oh! if there be a spot on earth for contemplation made,
Hoboken, 'tis thy fairy land, thy shore of poplar shade;
Where no intrusive voice may break the calm of thy retreat,
Save the sweet swan-like waves that die in music at our feet.

Farewell, then mother of soft dreams: our parting must be long,
And other climes and other scenes shall claim the poet's song;
But still thy forgotten name amid the chords shall dwell,
Farewell, thou loved and lonely scene; farewell! once more, farewell!

THE ROMANCE OF HISTORY.

THE MAIDEN TRIBUTE.

"The blessed saint Iago,
They called upon his name;
That day began our freedom,
And wiped away our shame."

KING RAMIRO was sitting in state when a deafening clamour rang through the air. Mournful lamentations, mingled with deep curses, the tolling of bells, and the sounds of martial music, shook with jarring discord the large hall of the palace. The king turned to the prince his son, to inquire the reason of so extraordinary a confusion.

"Ordonio, what means this noise? Is my kingdom to be continually alarmed and disturbed by factious churls and unruly subjects? It is but two years since I succeeded to the crown of Oviedo, yet in that short period I have known as much discontent and turbulence as would satisfy the entire lives of twenty ambitious princes, who eagerly thirsted for the enjoyment of regal power."

Ordonio spoke not, neither did he by the smallest sign give indication that he had understood the sarcasm levelled by his father. Conscious of his innocence, he considered that silence was his best defence, and that any attempt at vindication would but injure his cause. Ramiro cast a withering look around him. The courtiers received that herald of royal indignation with those tokens of humility, which so well become sycophants on similar occasions. The king could thus enjoy the pleasure of frowning, without any bold interruption from the objects of his indignation. The respectful silence of the prince, and the servility evinced in the demeanour of the rest of the assembly, might soon have conciliated the good graces, or at least obtained the pardon of the wrathful sovereign; but, fortunately, amid the slaves who contributed to swell Ramiro's court, there were a few composed of materials not quite so pliant. As the king ventured upon a second and still more bitter inculpation, one man, by the majestic boldness stamped on his brow, and the unquivering fire of his eye, seemed to be endowed with courage enough to stand the brunt of royal displeasure. Ramiro observed the obnoxious individual. His fretful uneasiness increased, and a bitter smile curled his lip. Yet he appeared unwilling to thunder out the storm of his indignation against him who could thus stand collected and unappalled at the sight of his offended sovereign. The king turned in his royal seat, and, in his tumultuous passion, muttered a deep curse, which redoubled the anxiety of the throng of courtiers around.

"Hold, Don Ramiro, hold!" loudly and boldly cried the person mentioned above. "Do not excite the wrath of heaven by thy profane language; do not tax our merciful God and the holy saints with those unhappy disturbances which are occasioned by thine own indifference and inconsiderate conduct. The cries of desolation that now filled the air, and which, in lieu of revengeful sentiments, ought to awaken feelings of grief and shame in the heart of a virtuous king; the sounds of despair, the dreadful maledictions poured from the burning breasts of thy suffering and indignant subjects, are the abhorred signals of the Moslem's insulting triumph, and our degradation and dishonour. Hear the piercing cries, Ramiro! Hark to the tolling of the bells, which now summon the christian, not to the devout occupations of religion, but to witness an act of infamy; and let those sounds rouse thy dormant soul, and nerve thy arm to deeds of honour, such as become a good king and a christian knight."

The man who uttered this bold rebuke against his sovereign was not a mailed warrior, mighty in the consciousness of his own strength; but an aged man, clothed in coarse attire, and apparently the most insignificant of those who surrounded the throne. He was a poor monk, whom his acknowledged virtues and supposed sanctity had elevated to the dignity of confessor to the king. Yet in the midst of the court, he had rigidly preserved the humility of his former state, and was conspicuous only for manly severity and acts of self-denial, which contrasted strangely with the blustering insolence of the warriors, and the debaucheries of the profligate courtiers. Don Ramiro seemed to bow in reverential awe before his ghostly father; and the glittering train of attendants contemplated, with a mixture of anxiety and surprise, the churchman's boldness, and the forbearance of the king.

The heart of the holy man was waxing warmer with animated zeal, and in a more impassioned tone he continued:

"Yes, Don Ramiro, it well behoveth me, in this hour of disgrace, to raise my voice, when I see thy councillors and grantees deaf to the cries of shame. It well becometh a poor and humble minister of the Lord, to stir up thy heart to those sentiments which ought to be excited by the defenders of thy crown, if, indeed, they be true and valiant knights. But, alas, the truly valiant, the good christians, are absent from the city on a day set apart for foul dishonour. They will not witness our disgrace; they leave the enjoyment of so vile and degrading a sight to their indolent king, and the shameless herd of his pernicious councillors."

As these rash words were pronounced, a murmur of astonishment, mingled with rage, ran through the assembly. The king appeared powerfully affected; he started fiercely from his seat; his eyes flashed with passion; and in a throbbing tone, he cried;

"Enough, Veremundo! thy bold speech savours too much of sedition and disrespect. Confiding in the sacredness of thy character, tempt not my forbearance too far. My regard even for thee may be exhausted, when I perceive that an arrogant zeal prompts thee to utter the factious language of a traitor, instead of the good advice of a ghostly monitor."

Veremundo preserved his lofty composure, and, in a subdued but unflinching voice, resumed:

"There is no treason in the language of truth, however galling it may be to the sensitiveness of human pride. Thou art my king and liege lord, Don Ramiro; fealty and obedience I owe thee; nor would I attempt to divest myself of the respect and duties incumbent on a good subject; but far more sacred are the duties which I have to fulfil towards the great Lord of the world, as one of his humble ministers. His high behests I will utter frankly and fearlessly, and with undaunted heart will I expose myself to the mighty effects of thy wrath; happy, thrice happy, if even at the expense of my life, I succeed in awakening a christian king from the baneful lethargy into which he has fallen. Don Ramiro, I call upon thee in the name of God, from this moment, to burst the ignominious bondage of Moorish power, and boldly refuse to pay the maiden tribute. That shameful tax, awarded by Mauregat, the bastard offspring of a Moorish woman—himself a Moor in heart—ought such a tax, so revolting, so contemptible, to be tolerated by Don Ramiro, who has already given such ample proof of his prowess in arms? Remember, senor, the glorious pass of Roncesvalles, where you fought by the side of the great Bernardo, almost his equal, inferior to no other knight; shall it then be said that Ramiro, who beheld unappalled the formidable host of Charlemagne, with all the most renowned paladins of France, crouched to the wrath and indignation of the caliph of Cordova? Oh! let this never be said of a king who lives under the especial protection of the apostle Santiago. From this day, let the demand of a hundred maidens be answered by the indignant voice of as many thousand valiant christians, ready and willing to repel the aggression of the infidels, should they venture to come and exact the odious tribute by force of arms."

The noble warmth and zeal which burnt in the heart of this holy man had conveyed a generous glow to his expressive countenance: and in proportion as he proceeded in his speech the fire of his eye flashed more intensely, and his whole manner acquired redoubled animation. His words seemed to have produced a powerful effect upon the king. The still increasing clamour from without contributed also to heighten the sentiments awakened by his unanswerable appeal; and Don Ramiro, as if actuated by a sudden impulse, exclaimed, with a burst of enthusiasm:

"By the blessed virgin! you speak most justly, father; and bitter as are the words in which you have conveyed your admonition, yet do I cordially pardon them in favour of your candour and piety. Caballeros, speed ye to exchange your courtly garments for the mail and helmet of the warrior, and stand you ready for the first summons—but we must proceed with prudence as well as resolution. A great number of our best knights are absent from court, for a life of sloth agrees not with their ardent dispositions. Before we defy Abdulrahman, and provoke hostilities, we will invite him to recall the odious grievance. Should he refuse our just demand, your lances and swords must establish our right."

While this affair was debating in the palace of Don Ramiro, the passions of his subjects were strongly excited by the insolent deportment of the Moorish officers intrusted with the commission of the maiden tribute. But their arrogance did not perhaps tend to exasperate the people so much as the apathetic indifference and want of proper feeling displayed by those christians, upon whom devolved the charge of collecting the obnoxious tax. Every town was obliged to supply a number of maidens, in proportion to its population. The victims, however, generally belonged to the peasantry and the plebeian classes. Every head of a family was summoned to bring forward his daughters or sisters on the day appointed for the general muster, when their fate was decided by ballot.

Early in the morning the bells announced the hour for the ceremony; and at the sound of drums and clarions, the Moorish tax-gatherers proceeded to a large open space near the town, where they were to receive the tribute. A vast concourse of people had followed these officers on the present occasion; many stimulated by idle curiosity, but the greater number actuated by far different feelings. Here the fond parent, with agony of heart, embraced his unhappy child for the last time. Here, too, the favoured lover beheld the blasting of all his glittering hopes, and turned from the scene in bitterest despair. But, besides the many who were personally interested in the approaching transaction, there were others who, though not wounded in the tender feelings of father or lover, yet evinced a deep sorrow upon beholding a ceremony which cast so foul a reflection upon their country.

The procession had arrived at the spot appointed for the balloting, and until now the lamentations of the sufferers were uttered in gentle murmurs, as their fate was still undecided; but at the sight of the wooden stage, upon which the directors of the scene were seated, and where the delivery of the maidens was to be effected, a shout of indignation burst from the surrounding throng. The officers proceeded to the discharge of their functions, unmindful of the vituperative cries uttered against them. A party of twenty Moorish warriors surrounded the stage, and twice as many Spanish occupied the same station to preserve order among the people. Presently, the weeping maids were led to the place, and snatched from the embraces of their disconsolate friends. The charms of the fair mourners, gleaming through their tears, and acquiring a more soft and touching beauty from sorrow, instead of awaking sentiments of pity in the hearts of the Moors, tended only to inflame their desires, and kindle their eyes with an unholy fire. A variety of feelings were portrayed in the anxious and expectant countenances of the degraded christians who stood around. Pity and sorrow gleamed in the tender glances of some; strong grief was impressed on the agonized looks of others. Many a brow was darkened with the gloom of despair—many a breast throbbed with the heaving of indignation. The whole mass presented an animated picture of human misery, in its various shades and expressions.

But amid the crowd of spectators whom the occasion had assembled, there was a man, in the bloom of life, whose countenance evinced deeper emotion than the rest. It was neither grief nor pity, despair nor indignation, that filled his soul, and imparted such strong expression to his features; but an overwhelming sensation, produced by the combination of them all. His dark and brilliant eyes were riveted in eager gaze on one of the maidens who were about to cast lots for a life of slavery and dishonour. He seemed to follow her every motion, and watch with fond and mournful enthusiasm her every turn and look; nay, it might appear that he caught the breath of her sighs, and that her warm tears had a magnetic influence in producing his own. At length the moment arrived when the fate of his beloved was to be decided. The trembling maid advanced, supported by an aged woman, who vainly endeavoured to administer words of consolation to one who appeared unconscious of passing objects, and whose whole soul was absorbed in the contemplation of her present calamity. The roses of her cheek had faded, and a sad paleness had usurped the soft and lovely spot where they had bloomed. The fire of her eyes was quenched, save that which sparkled from the tears that hung on her long silken lashes. Excess of terror and disgust seemed to have paralyzed her exertions, and deprived her of the powers of volition. Motionless, like a beautiful statue, she stood till she was led, or rather dragged, to receive from the fatal urn the sentence of her future irremediable misery.

The feelings of her afflicted lover at this terrible crisis were wrought to a pitch of delirium. His frame shook convulsively. The flush of indignation gave place in his countenance to the paleness of fearful suspense. All his thoughts and feelings were closely concentrated in one object. His soul seemed to hang upon a thread; every feature and limb partook of the painful character of that deep absorption of agony. He earnestly watched his destined bride—she tremblingly drew the decree of her wretchedness, and uttered a piercing and agonized shriek. The nerves of her unfortunate lover relaxed from their unnatural tension, and he appeared suddenly to gain composure and tranquillity. That shriek rang the death-knell of all his happiness. He had nothing now to fear; whatever else might happen would be an immeasurably smaller evil than this; and, secure in the recklessness of despair, he experienced that sort of gloomy joy and ferocious satisfaction, which are sometimes the attendants of supreme misery.

He now approached nearer to the stage, with a degree of calmness that astonished those who were acquainted with the secret of his love. The lot of most of the maids had by this time been fixed. Wailings and lamentations incumbered the air. The curses of despairing fathers were united to the tokens of distress uttered by their children. The murmur of indignation was ripening into confusion; symptoms of opposition and revolt were discernible in the assembled crowd. It was a mine which only needed a spark to cause its explosion. The functionaries concerned in the disgraceful business of the day, began to look around them with fear and anxiety, and the troop of Moors appeared to be preparing for approaching danger. The moment of awful suspense between the gathering and bursting of a popular storm is dreadful, and not easily described. The christians gazed on each other; and their expressive glances betokened a consciousness of uniformity, feeling, and resolve; but yet they were motionless, for the want of one to give an impulse to the bursting of their fury.

The Moorish leader began rudely essaying to separate the victims from their friends, who clung round for a parting embrace. "Where art thou? Oh! Ansuere, where art thou, in this moment of terror?" frantically exclaimed one of the devoted fair ones. "Oh! free me—free me from these ruffians." Her impassioned appeal was heard; but what help could the unfortunate lover afford?

"I am here, my love," exclaimed young Ansuere, who was now close to the spot. "Yes, I am here, my own Orelia, to die in attempting to rescue thee from these barbarians; for death is the only satisfaction and comfort I can now expect."

With this he drew his weapon, which till that moment had been concealed, and furiously attacked the Moor, who was struggling to separate Orelia from her relatives. The Moor reeled and fell. This was the signal for the rising of the crowd. A tumultuous shout rent the air, and the motley through, the greater portion of them unarmed, rushed impetuously to effect the rescue of the maidens, so gallantly begun by young Ansuere. He was already surrounded and closely pressed by his enemies, who aimed many a blow to level him with the ground. But the prize for which the young christian fought was too great not to stimulate him to almost supernatural exertions. His friends meantime came to his aid, and a skirmish commenced, in which the christian combatants, though far superior in number, seemed scarcely a match for their adversaries, who were on horseback and completely armed; while they, on the contrary, were on foot, subject to no discipline, and but indifferently equipped for battle. The conflict, however, was continued with equal vigour and hatred on both sides. The christian functionaries, and the men under their orders, refused to interfere in a quarrel which had not the sanction of the king, and seemed only solicitous to retire unhurt from the field of strife, on which two or three Moors, and twice as many christians, were already weltering in their blood.

By this time, Ansuere had extricated himself from his foes; but, in the confusion, his sword was lost. This accident, however, served neither to damp his courage nor check his impetuosity. One of the Moors, who saw him unarmed, rushed against him, willing to remove, by any means, the first cause of the disturbance; but Ansuere, who possessed an agility inferior only to the strength of his arm and the resolution of his heart, ran swiftly to a fig-tree that grew near the place, and, with a vigorous exertion, wrenching one of the boughs from the parent stock, prepared to renew the combat.

The din and uproar had meantime continued unabated. The number of combatants increased every moment. In the confusion, many of the maidens effected their escape. Among the first of these was Orelia, who, filled with alarm and affright, ran swiftly towards the palace of the king, as the fittest place for shelter. When out of the place of strife, she was pursued by some unworthy christians, who considered her the cause of a revolt, which they imagined would be severely punished by Don Ramiro.

The king, who was still sitting in council, after he had resolved to refuse the maiden tribute, was surprised to find that the noise which had startled him in the first instance, was growing more overpowering every minute, and approaching nearer to the entrance of his royal mansion. Suddenly, the very door of the council-chamber was flung open, and a girl, scarcely sixteen years old, rushed in, and, panting for breath, sunk exhausted at the feet of Don Ramiro. For some time she could not speak, but remained trembling in the posture she had assumed. Two or three of her pursuers were now ushered in, and, with officious zeal, proceeded to lay their complaints before the king.

"What maiden is this, and what boon hath she to crave of our kindness?" demanded Ramiro, moved at the sight of the poor girl.

"Senor!" answered a man, "she is one of the maids destined for the tribute to the caliph of Cordova. The lot fell upon her; but, instead of submitting to her fate, she has been the origin of great confusion and much bloodshed among the people."

"Sir king!" cried Orelia with eagerness, "perhaps I am guilty of disrespect; for a poor girl, as I am, is not well versed in the usages of courts; but you are the father of your people—to you, therefore, I fly for protection. Oh, deliver me not up to those barbarous Moors, the sworn enemies of thy country! Can it be, that a christian king will consent to pay tribute to 'an infidel—a tribute, too, so disgraceful as this?'"

"Fair maid," quoth Don Ramiro, "calm thy fears; for, by our holy dame! this unworthy tax is now abolished for ever. You, Don Alonso, and you, Don Fruela, go to my discontented people—tell them my resolution. Enjoin them, in my name, to keep the peace. The cause of their discontent being removed, let them resume the character of dutiful subjects. Bring the Moors into our presence, that they may hear our resolves, and report them to their master."

Order was soon restored upon the announcement of the king's determination; and those of the Moors who survived the skirmish, were brought before Don Ramiro, according to his desire.

"King Ramiro," said one of the moslems in an angry tone, "we came into your kingdom in the spirit of peace, to collect a tribute granted by one of your predecessors for services rendered to him. In the fulfilment of our charge, we were attacked by an unruly rabble, and the greater part of our troop slain. Instead of visiting your rebellious subjects with the punishment due to their crime, you send heralds to announce, that to please them you are willing to violate a sacred treaty."

"Holy saints of heaven!" ejaculated Father Veremundo. "Sacred treaty, call ye this most infamous transaction? Moor! profane not that word in a christian country, and in the presence of a christian king. Vows and promises, and treaties, which are in themselves unlawful, cannot be kept. It is not a sin, but a virtue to break them. By what right could a shameless monarch thus dispose of the honour of future men? If cowardice or infamous sentiments prompted Mauregat to adopt a conduct unworthy of a king, of a man, is it an imperious consequence that every one of his successors must act in a manner equally disgraceful?"

"Our holy confessor hath spoken well," cried Don Ramiro; "his words express our sentiments most becomingly. Among other deeds, my reign shall be known to posterity by the abolition of the maiden tribute:—my royal word is passed; and if Abdulrahman will not desist from his pretended right, let him support his claim by arms, I will dispute it in the field as best befits me; and may God withhold his mercy from me, if, during my life, another christian maiden shall quit her home to satisfy the wishes of an infidel."

"And is this the message we are to carry back to the caliph?"

"It is," answered the king; "and nothing now impedes your departure."

"The christian king may, perhaps, too late repent this violation of a treaty, and the destruction of so many gallant moslems."

"Infidel, begone!" cried the king with warmth. "What! dares a Moor attempt to intimidate me, and utter threats within my very court? Begone! or death shall be the reward of thy insolence. Begone! and bid Abdulrahman assemble his forces and meet me in the field."

Ramiro, courageous and enterprising by nature, now turned his thoughts towards the preparations for a war, which appeared inevitable to all. He issued the necessary orders to collect men, as well as means, to begin a campaign. The people received the intelligence with enthusiasm; and every one burned with impatience to signalize his courage against the Moor.

Abdulrahman, in the meantime, indignant at the refusal of the christian king to fulfil the treaty, resolved to exact the maiden tribute by force of arms; and to this effect, his lieutenants, with much zeal and activity, in a very short time collected a numerous and gallant army, far superior to any that Ramiro could then bring into the field. News was soon received that Abdulrahman in person was advancing, at the head of a formidable army, to meet the christians. Don Ramiro hastily assembled such forces as he could command, and ordered them to hold themselves in readiness against the morrow. He then retired to rest, overpowered by the fatigues of the day, and with his mind wholly bent upon the approaching contest. He was aware of the disadvantages under which he laboured, but scorned to harbour a single idea derogatory to the noble sentiments which prompted him to provoke the wrath of the Moorish chief.

Don Ramiro was visited in his slumbers, by a very singular vision. A venerable person, with a long silvery beard and pilgrim's staff, appeared to stand before him, surrounded with the brightness of a celestial light. The king contemplated the venerable man in silence and surprise, till at length the pilgrim declared himself to be the apostle Santiago, the tutelar patron of christian Spain, and said that he came to encourage the king to persevere in his good intention of waging war against the infidels. Having promised him the aid of God in this undertaking, as well as his own help during the contest, the vision vanished; but it was only to make room for another still more singular and propitious, in appearance, to the christian. Ramiro thought himself suddenly transported to the field of battle, when, in the midst of a furious engagement, he perceived a tall warrior, riding a milk-white charger, and bearing a red cross on a banner surmounted by the arms of the kings of Oviedo, sweep by with overwhelming impetus, and falling upon the Moors, cause a terrible carnage among them, and at length completely put them to the rout. Ramiro, astonished at the superhuman prowess of the mysterious knight, rode up to thank him for the great service he had rendered the christian army. But his bewilderment increased when, in the strange warrior, he recognised his patron saint, Santiago.

"I promised thee my help, Ramiro," quoth the saint, "and behold how I have kept my word. Always put your trust in God, and never submit to vile conditions with the infidel."

Upon this he suddenly vanished from the sight of the astonished Don Ramiro, who, meeting the usual fate of less dignified and heroic dreamers, soon after awoke, and was for some time puzzled to find himself tranquilly reposing on his couch.

On the following day, the king communicated his dream to Veremundo, his confessor, who drew from it the most favourable omens. Whether the monk's skill in the interpretation of dreams was equal to the other qualities which rendered him an object of veneration among the people, or whether it was only on a par with that of other dream expounders, he nevertheless produced a most marvellous effect on the minds of the soldiers, by the explanation which he gave. Full of flattering hopes, and impatient for the fight, the army began its march, amid the strains of martial instruments, and the cheering shouts of the multitude. Every one appeared confident of victory, and began to speculate within himself concerning the spoil laden with which he would return to his home. The hundred maidens, in whose honour this perilous adventure was to be encountered, came in front of the army, and poured forth their ardent vows for the success of their champions. If any thing can rouse the courage of man to heroic deeds and daring exploits, it is the sight of lovely woman arrayed in all her charms, and bestowing upon him smiles of approbation. Woman has often been stigmatized as the cause of much mischief in the world; but who can recount the blessings she has heaped on man? Virtue, valour, talent, all his noblest, all his best qualities, have been called forth and fostered by the smiles of woman.

Previous to the departure of the army, it was blessed by Veremundo, who, in despite of his advanced age, resolved to follow it to the field, and contribute to the victory by his best exertions. His presence would, indeed, be of essential service, in animating by his eloquence the hearts of the soldiers; and, aware of this, Don Ramiro was nothing loath to have the man of God by his side. As both Abdulrahman and the christian king were equally eager for the conflict, the armies soon came in sight of each other. The Moors presented a very formidable appearance, exceeding in number the army of Don Ramiro by at least one half. A furious engagement then commenced. Abdulrahman gave out the Moorish cry of "Allah, ilah Allah!" and Ramiro, in an animating tone, and confiding manner, exclaimed "Santiago!" which from that moment became the war-cry of the Spaniards.

The onset of the Moorish cavalry was fierce and impetuous, and was met with equal resolution and animosity by the christians. The ground was disputed for a long time, without any sign of superiority on either side; but the discipline and gallantry of the Saracen horse at length began to prevail, the christians gave ground, and had nearly lost the battle, when the darkness of night fortunately came to their aid. Veremundo ran through the ranks, exhorting the soldiers to do their utmost, and assuring them that heaven and Santiago were on their side. To a keen observer, the countenance of the christian king would have given sure indication that a feeling of despondency occupied his breast. He endeavoured to conceal his emotion; but it was no less certain that he expected the complete rout of his army, as soon as the light of day should second the exertions of the Moors. In this emergency, a retreat would, perhaps, be the only alternative that prudence could suggest; but this was not practicable, from the number of the enemy, who were now endeavouring to surround the christians. Some desperate resolution was therefore advisable in this crisis; for nothing short of a miracle could retrieve the fortunes of Don Ramiro. The night was now completely closed, and the fury of the contest was relaxed; as the Saracens, confiding in the certainty of the victory, were willing to employ the hours of night in gaining some repose from their fatigues. The moon poured a flood of silvery radiance over the field of battle; and a scene of dismay presented itself on every side to the christians. They beheld the heaps of slain and wounded that strewed the ground, and awaited with trembling anxiety a fate similar to that of their companions. Don Ramiro, in this desperate moment, communed for a short time with his confessor; and then, with a more animated countenance, proceeded to address his dispirited followers:

"Christians!" he cried with fervour, "shall we offend the majesty of heaven by doubting a protection promised by such undoubted tokens? The superior number of our enemies has given them a temporary advantage; but this shall little avail them. It will only pamper their insolence and expectations, that they may afterward feel more bitterly their disappointment. My dream shall be accomplished, if we have faith enough to confide in the mercies of God, and the protection of the holy apostle Santiago."

Father Veremundo next spoke in an impassioned tone and enthusiastic manner, asseverating that, ere long, palpable proofs of the intervention and protection of Santiago would be visible to all. These harangues revived for some time the drooping spirits of the soldiers, and they resolved to exert their utmost efforts and renew the fight. At this important moment, a gallant knight, in complete armour of radiant mail, suddenly made his appearance in the field of battle. He bestrode a beautiful white charger, and carried in one hand a large white flag, on which was displayed a bloody cross, surmounted by the arms of Oviedo. This mysterious warrior, whose unexpected appearance astonished the wondering christians, rode furiously across the field, and alone, as if inspired by a superhuman impulse, plunged headlong and confidently into the thickest of the Moorish ranks.

Don Ramiro recognised the celestial knight of his vision, and sent forth an enthusiastic cry of—"Santiago! Santiago!"

This cry operated like an electric shock in the hearts of his followers. The presence of such a warrior among them was the certain forerunner of victory. With one accord the rest of the christian army, imitating their heavenly leader, rushed impetuously against the Moors. The king, his son Ordonio, and young Ansures, were among the first. The onset was desperate, and partook more of the character of madness than of rational courage. A tremendous shout of Santiago! Santiago! was raised on all sides, and the stillness of night sent back the cheering echo, which acted as an irresistible stimulus to the christians.

The Moors were thunderstruck at so furious and unexpected a charge. They rallied, however, and with fierce animosity received the attack of the foe. Perceiving that the powerful knight on the white charger was the object that stimulated the christians to such gigantic exertions, they directed against him the principal portion of their rage. They tried to unhorse him, but in vain. He appeared to be impassive to the numerous blows aimed against him, while, on the other hand, he caused a prodigious devastation in the Moslem ranks. The white banner, with the bloody cross, was the beacon that guided the christian warriors to certain triumph. Wherever the redoubtable knight directed his headlong course, the terrified Moors dispersed. King Ramiro achieved wonders on this memorable field, and while his vengeful sword inflicted such disastrous blows upon the Moslem, his voice loudly and exultingly encouraged his soldiers to follow and trust in their patron saint. "Santiago! Santiago!" was the universal cry of the christians. With as much religious devotion as military courage, they accompanied the saint, fighting joyfully by his side, and falling contentedly at his feet. Those who perished were considered as so many martyrs; and this persuasion, kept alive by the monk Veremundo, tended not a little to produce the unwearied and almost incredible exertions displayed by the christians in this memorable battle.

The morrow's sun discovered a scene far different from the one which had been illumined by his parting rays. The Moorish army was completely routed, and a most signal triumph crowned the valour of the christian. But with the dawn of day the celestial warrior had vanished, like a phantom of the night. No one could tell how his departure had been effected. His mission on earth had been fulfilled. The rest was a mystery too sacred for the grateful and conquering soldiers to speculate upon. Soon after the battle, King Ramiro, in acknowledgment of the signal assistance which his troops had received from Santiago, assembled his principal chiefs, and, in the presence of his men, confessed all the obligations which he owed.

"My good knights, ye have witnessed," cried he, "the manner in which this wonderful victory has been achieved. It behoveth us now to testify our gratitude as best becomes a christian people. We will therefore build a monastery, which shall bear the name of Santiago, in commemoration of this memorable battle. On this monastery shall henceforth be duly bestowed a knight's share of the prizes and spoils taken from our enemies in war; and furthermore, every part of my kingdom, and in time, it is to be hoped, the whole of Spain, shall contribute a portion of bread and wine towards the maintenance of the said monastery of Santiago of Compostella. I myself, immediately upon my return to the palace, will draw out the deed of these grants."

These words were welcomed with shouts of approbation by the christian nobles and the rest of the troops, who soon retraced their steps homewards, rich with the spoils of the Moors, and conducting a considerable number of prisoners, whose ransom would increase the prizes obtained by the victory of Alveida.

But King Ramiro having shown his gratitude, in the first instance, to heaven, as in justice and piety bound, turned his thoughts to the recompense due to such of the knights, squires, and others who had most conspicuously distinguished themselves during the battle, and to whose prowess and resolution, next to the miraculous interposition of Santiago, he stood indebted for his triumph. Among the many warriors who had vied with each other in deeds of valorous achievement and surpassing intrepidity, there was an unknown youth, who had most particularly attracted his notice. The habiliments of this warrior denoted an humble situation in life, though his heroic acts rendered him well deserving of the honours of knighthood.

"By Santiago!" said the king, addressing his nobles on the subject, "I have never seen so noble a display of courage, intrepidity, and strength, since the memorable pass of Roncesvalles; and in good sooth, sirs, I think that this youth promises another Bernardo to our land. Who is he? and whence comes he?"

The young hero being totally unknown to the nobles, no one could afford an answer. With a gentle smile, father Veremundo then addressed the king:

"Senor, the man of whom you please to take such notice, is one, who, indeed, deserves much of his country. He was the first who repelled the insolence of the Moors, when they came for the last time, thank heaven! to exact the maiden tribute. It is the same gallant person who, having lost his weapon in the scuffle, attacked his enemies with the branch of a fig-tree."

"Indeed!" quoth the king, "I rejoice in the knowledge of this; for to this same warrior I already owe a debt of gratitude which it would be as well to discharge without delay. What is his name?"

"Ansures," replied Veremundo.

"Let him be summoned into our presence."

Ansures came before his sovereign with that modest demeanour which is the usual concomitant of merit.

"Ask any recompense within my power to grant," said Ramiro.

"Senor," returned Ansures, "if the recompense of serving my good king, and the consciousness of having done my duty were not enough, I have still, in addition, that of having preserved the honour of my betrothed wife, and of paving the way to our mutual happiness."

"These are, indeed a good man's best guerdons," said Ramiro; "but I can confer upon thee an honour which will sit well and becomingly on a man of thy deserts. This day the order of knighthood shall be conferred upon thee; for it would be a shame to our court, that such as thou should be lost in mean pursuits of toil and labour, who art born to grace the nobler avocations of man."

Ansures fell on his knee, and gratefully kissed the hand of the king, who soon conferred upon him the promised boon.

On his shield the heralds permitted him to bear five figures, which emblem he also wore on his crest. Ansures took the surname of Figueroa, in commemoration of that tree which was of such service to him in the most eventful moment of his life.

It is needless to add, that he was soon rendered supremely blessed by his union with the fair Orelia, who became one of the greatest ornaments of Don Ramiro's court. In commemoration of the abolition of the maiden tribute, a procession of young women was instituted, which took place on every anniversary of the famous and miraculous battle of Alveida.

With regard to the apparition of Santiago in the field of battle, each reader may account for it in his own manner. Those, however, who will only see a stratagem in the transaction, will at least concede, that it was a successful inspiration of genius, commendable for the glorious results to which it led.

The maiden tribute was thus finally abolished; for though some of the successors of Abdulrahman demanded it, they never afterwards found a christian king weak enough to grant it, nor were the Moors, on their side, disposed to refer the debate to the event of a second battle.

LITERARY NOTICES.

In press, at Boston, the "Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution," edited by Jared Sparks.

The Messrs. Carvills have recently published a work entitled, "Practice under the Revised Statutes."

"The Exclusives," a novel in two volumes, has just issued from the prolific press of the Messrs. Harpers; also,

The "Romance of History;" from which we have copied the very interesting story on our first page.

The "Venetian Bracelet, and other Poems," by Miss Landon, are about to be re-published in Boston.

Mrs. A. M. Wells has issued proposals for publishing, by subscription, "Poems and Juvenile Sketches."

* This deed is called "Privilegio de los Fueros."

THE TRAVELLER.

SKETCHES OF DISTINGUISHED CHARACTERS.

JOHN RANDOLPH.

As inquiry was made respecting the black servant that accompanied him, whether he was free? "No, sir," was his reply. "He is one of those slaves your commiseration is so excited for. Speak to the man, ask him whether he prefers the condition of many of his colour, whom he saw during his travels with me, to the comforts he enjoys at Roanoke, and hear his answer? When we came in sight of England, I informed John, (the servant man alluded to.) that in the country we were going to, he would not find any slaves, and that agreeably to the laws, every slave, on touching their shores, was free. I told him to avail himself of the privilege, and that I would not in any way interfere to prevent his full participation in the benefit the laws of England afforded to his class. I reiterated these assurances on our landing, and at separate periods. The man, however, returned with me, as you see, and I believe is perfectly contented with his situation." And indeed his attachment to Mr. Randolph was a very satisfactory proof of the leniency of the master, and the contentedness of the slave under the connexion which existed between them; and established also the truth of the closing remark of Mr. Randolph on the subject, "that slavery was not so painful a state of bondage as is generally supposed, under a considerate master."

It was the custom, immediately after breakfast, for Mr. Randolph to invite our little circle to attend a "caucus" in the small roundhouse on deck, where, furnished with some of the late periodicals, or other new works, which served as text-books for discussion, he would sit for hours, and delight us with his inexhaustible fund of anecdote; or command our attention, and keep alive the interest of the conversation by the originality of his ideas, and his truly piquant remarks on all the popular topics of the day. Religion, laws, and governments, were all descanted on with a depth of observation which evinced a reflecting mind, able to grapple with all the subtleties and contradictions thrown around these great "bones of contention." He reconciled the apparent differences of the one, and laid bare the fallacies of the other, with admirable tact and discrimination. His religion appeared solid, manly, and orthodox; alike free from fanaticism and cant on the one hand, or the scepticism of "liberal principles," so characteristic of the age, on the other. The writer of this article had some opportunities of testing this fact. During the first week of our passage, Mr. Randolph suffered considerably from the effects of an accident, which (by the overturning of a stage-coach, in which he was a passenger, on his way to Liverpool,) had materially injured him. A severe gale, which lasted several days, confined him nearly the whole of that period to his state-room; our berth adjoined his, and frequently during the paroxysms of his sufferings have we distinctly heard his appeals to heaven for mercy and support, in terms of pure and rational obstetation.

His sentiments on law or government were equally sound, reflecting, and discriminative. His decided preference for the institutions of his own country has been noticed. This preference did not, however, prevent him from acknowledging the merits of other forms of government, nor their suitability for the people over which they extended. He is an enemy to innovation, and eschewed the evil of that false philosophy which would plant anarchy and confusion amidst old established forms, in the vain hope that by destroying the whole, an entire new and better edifice may be raised upon their ruins.

Public men and acts of legislation were discussed freely by him, and descanted on with the sagacious knowledge of one who had weighed causes and effects, with precision and competency for the task. These conversations had peculiar interest when directed to his own country, in the councils of which he has so long held a distinguished station. The sarcasm for which he is justly celebrated here assumed an added poignancy. The great measures which have occurred during his political career, when contrary to his opinions of fitness and right, were satirized with a force which could not be surpassed for point and severity. It is but justice to add, that no personal invective ever disgraced the force of his satire; nor do I remember one instance of personal vituperation having passed his lips during our intercourse. The public character of some of the great men of the last age were discussed with that freedom which their elevated position warranted, but the living were invariably passed over in silence. When speaking of America, Washington was an especial favourite with him; he had, in his youth, frequent opportunities of seeing that great man; and he detailed several anecdotes of his reminiscences of that illustrious individual, with peculiar force and fidelity.

Books and authors were also his favourite themes of conversation. He held the whole class of living authors in general contempt, with a few established exceptions. "A man must have a good deal of presumption to sit down and write a book," was his frequent remark, "and think to instruct others, his superiors in learning and information." This expression must be understood with the before named qualification, and the opinion it contained, carried into public life, where his contempt of the moderns is so conspicuous, has, I doubt not, exposed Mr. Randolph to much obloquy and persecution. His preference of the ancients is proverbial. He has formed models for imitation from their writings and institutions, which, in this age of improvement, subject their admirers or defenders to the charge of eccentricity nearly allied to madness. This love for "old established customs," and somewhat exploded forms, may in some degree account for the many singularities of his character. His dress is of the simplest possible description, and his manners are those of the formal and reserved habits of the last century. If our memory serves us correctly, he prided himself on having made the tour of the continent and of having visited most of the European courts in the actual costume he wore during our passage. A loose blue frock-coat, evidently not one of Stultz's manufacture—a well worn seal skin cap, of no very graceful shape, and a pair of clumsy high shoes, formed the principal parts of this favourite dress—which exhibited a tout ensemble no way indicating a sacrifice to the shrine of modern fashion. Manners designate the man, and here it did not require the extrinsic aid of dress to establish the character of John Randolph. Few men that we have met possess the polished urbanity of the gentleman, united to the ease of the travelled man of the world, in a more eminent degree than he does. A slight departure from republican simplicity is observable throughout all this, and an adaptation of aristocratical habits supplies its place. His black servant constantly occupied a station at the back of his chair during meals, and devoted his services exclusively to his master; and, indeed, at all times was the medium through which Mr. Randolph signified his wants. This circumstance may, perhaps, be more the result of southern habits, but is quoted as one among many instances which might strike a stranger as a peculiar departure from the simplicity of American usages. The pleasures of the table are held in high estimation by him; not, however, sufficient to rank him as a gourmand, but enough to establish the character of a "gourmet," which on one occasion he appropriated to himself. Of his conversational powers we have before spoken; they are rich, varied, and abundant, possessing every possible qualification, both to instruct and to amuse; and although some years have passed since we enjoyed their influence, the remembrance is still vivid and lasting. We have heard the character and political tenets of this great man variously discussed since that period, but our impression remains the same, and we have been tempted to exclaim with one of his distinguished countrymen—"If this man is mad, it would be well for America to possess more such madmen."

In the imperfect sketch we have thus submitted to our readers, we feel we have not done adequate justice to the celebrated subject we have endeavoured to describe; many causes have produced this deficiency—enough, however, has, we trust, been portrayed to render it interesting—nor have we knowingly in one instance departed from strict veracity, either in the few details of his conversations, or in depicting the impression we formed at the time, of this truly original and celebrated individual. THE RAMBLER.

No. V.

BIOGRAPHY OF JACOB HAYS.

He is a man, take him for all in all,
We shall not look upon his like again.—Shaks.

Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to introduce to your acquaintance, Baron Nubem, a person who has a very taking way with him.—Tom and Jerry.

PERHAPS there is no species of composition so generally interesting and truly delightful as minute and indiscriminate biography, and it is pleasant to perceive how this taste is gradually increasing. The time is apparently not far distant when every man will be found busy writing the life of his neighbour, and expect to have his own written in return, interspersed with original anecdotes, extracts from epistolary correspondence, the exact hours at which he was in the habit of going to bed at night and getting up in the morning, and other miscellaneous and useful information carefully selected and judiciously arranged. Indeed, it is whispered that the editor of this paper intends to take Longworth's Directory for the groundwork, and give the private history of all the city alphabetically, without "fear or favour—love or affection." In Europe there exists an absolute biographical mania, and they are manufacturing lives of poets, painters, play-actors, peers, pugilists, pick-pockets, horse jockeys and their horses, together with a great many people that are scarcely known to have existed at all. And the fashion now is not only to shadow forth the grand and striking outlines of a great man's character, and hold to view those qualities which elevated him above his species, but to go into the minutiae of his private life, and note down all the trivial expressions and every-day occurrences in which, of course, he merely spoke and acted like any ordinary man. This not only affords employment for the exercise of the small curiosity and meddling propensities of his officious biographer, but is also highly gratifying to the general reader, inasmuch as it elevates him mightily in his own opinion to see it put on record that great men eat, drank, slept, walked, and sometimes talked just as he does. In giving the biography of the high constable of this city, I shall by all means avoid descending to undignified particulars; though I deem it important to state, before proceeding further, that there is not the slightest foundation for the report afloat that Mr. Hays has left off eating buckwheat cakes in a morning, in consequence of their lying too heavy on his stomach.

Where the subject of the present memoir was born, can be but of little consequence; who were his father and mother, of still less, and how he was bred and educated, of none at all. I shall therefore pass over this division of his existence in eloquent silence, and come at once to the period when he attained the acmé of constabulary power and dignity by being created high constable of this city and its suburbs; and it may be remarked, in passing, that the honourable the corporation, during their long and unsatisfactory career, never made an appointment more creditable to themselves, more beneficial to the city, more honourable to the country at large, more imposing in the eye of foreign nations, more disagreeable to all rogues, nor more gratifying to honest men, than that of the gentleman whom we are biographizing, to the high office he now holds. His acuteness and vigilance have become proverbial, and there is not a misdeed committed by any member of this community, but he is speedily admonished from all sides that he will "have old Hays [as he is affectionately and familiarly termed] after him." Indeed, it is supposed by many that he is gifted with supernatural attributes, and can see things that are hid from mortal ken; or how, it is contended, is it possible that he should, as he does,

"Bring forth the secret's man of blood!"

That he can discover "undivulged crime"—that when a store has been robbed, he, without stop or hesitation, can march directly to the house where the goods are concealed, and say, "these are they"—or, when a gentleman's pocket has been picked, that, from a crowd of unsavoury miscreants he can, with unerring judgment, lay his hand upon one and exclaim "you're wanted!"—or how is it that he is gifted with that strange principle of ubiquity that makes him "here, and there, and everywhere" at the same moment? No matter how, so long as the public reap the benefit; and well may that public apostrophize him in the words of the poet:

"Long may he live! out city's pride!
When lives the rogue, but flies before him!
With trusty crabstick by his side,
And staff of office waving o'er him!"

But it is principally as a literary man that we would speak of Mr. Hays. True, his poetry is "unwritten," as is also his prose; and he has invariably expressed a decided contempt for philosophy, music, rhetoric, the belles lettres, the fine arts, and in fact all species of composition excepting bailiffs' warrants and bills of indictment—but what of that? The constitution of his mind is, even unknown to himself, decidedly poetical. And here I may be allowed to avail myself of another peculiarity of modern biography, namely, that of describing a man by what he is not. Mr. Hays has not the graphic power or antiquarian lore of Sir Walter Scott—nor the glittering imagery or voluptuous tenderness of Moore—nor the delicacy and polish of Rogers —nor the spirit of Campbell—nor the sentimentalism of Miss Landon—nor the depth and purity of thought and intimate acquaintance with nature of Bryant—nor the brilliant style and playful humour of Halleck—no, he is more in the petit larceny manner of Crabbe, with a slight touch of Byronic power and gloom. He is familiarly acquainted with all those interesting scenes of vice and poverty so fondly dwelt upon by that reverend chronicler of little villany, and if ever he can be prevailed upon to publish, there will doubtless be found a remarkable similarity in their works. His height is about five feet seven inches, but who makes his clothes we have as yet been unable to ascertain. His countenance is strongly marked, and forcibly brings to mind the lines of Byron when describing his Corsair:

There was a laughing devil in his meer
That raised emotions both of hate and fear;
And where his glance of "apprehension" fell,
Hope withering fled, and mercy sighed, farewell!

Yet with all his great qualities, it is to be doubted whether he is much to be envied. His situation certainly has its disadvantages. Pure and blameless as his life is, his society is not courted—no man boasts of his friendship, and few indeed like even to own him for an intimate acquaintance. Wherever he goes his slightest action is watched and criticised; and if he happen carelessly to lay his hand upon a gentleman's shoulder and whisper something in his ear, even that man, as if there were contamination in his touch, is seldom or never seen afterwards in decent society. Such things cannot fail to prey upon his feelings. But when did ever greatness exist without some penalty attached to it?

The first time that ever Hays was pointed out to me was one summer afternoon, when acting in his official capacity in the city-hall. The room was crowded in every part, and as he entered with a luckless wretch in his gripe, a low suppressed murmur ran through the hall, as if some superior being had alighted in the midst of them. He placed the prisoner at the bar—a poor coatless individual, with scarcely any edging and no roof to his hat—to stand his trial, for bigamy, and then, in a loud, authoritative tone, called out for "silence," and there was silence. Again he spoke—"hats off there!" and the multitude became uncovered; after which he took his handkerchief out of his left-hand coat pocket, wiped his face, put it back again, looked sternly around, and then sat down. The scene was awful and impressive; but the odour was disagreeable in consequence of the heat acting upon the large quantity of animal matter congregated together. My olfactory organs were always lamentably acute: I was obliged to retire, and from that time to this, I have seen nothing, though I have heard much of the subject of this brief and imperfect, but, I trust, honest and impartial memoir.

Health and happiness be with thee, thou prince of constables—thou guardian of innocence—thou terror of evil-doers and little boys! May thy years be many and thy sorrows few—may thy life be like a long and cloudless summer's day, and may thy salary be increased! And when at last the summons comes from which there is no escaping—when the warrant arrives upon which no bail can be put in—when thou thyself, that hast "wanted" so many, art in turn "wanted and must go,"

"mayst thou fall
Into the grave as softly as the leaves
Of the sweet roses on an autumn eve,
Beneath the small sighs of the western wind,
Drop to the earth!"

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE AMERICAN NAVY.

THE re-organization of the navy of the United States is a subject of such moment to our national interests, of such vital importance to the navy itself, to its comfortable support, to its energies, its character for discipline, and its future glory, that it appears to us there is no object which can be presented to the executive or national legislature, that requires more deliberate and cautious action than this, both as relates to a critical examination into its departments, for the adoption of suitable, permanent, and proportionate provisions for its branches, grades, and rank, and to the formation of such fixed rules and regulations as have become absolutely necessary for its government.

Knowing this to be a matter of as great intricacy as moment, and presuming it to be one on which the representatives of the union would not willingly legislate annually, any farther than should be found necessary to pass appropriations for its support, we conceive the present period of peace and tranquillity a most auspicious one for placing so interesting a service on such a footing as will enable it to compare with any other navy in the world, if not for its numbers, at least for its appearance and its character, as well as its valour.

The day is perhaps fast approaching, when this national arm will be almost, if not altogether, the only one this government will require, to prevent invasion, repel aggression, suppress lawless piracy, and protect our commerce, when conveying to all quarters of the globe the products of our arts, our agriculture, and manufactures from legal depredation and open war.

The experience acquired during the last thirty years in expedients and substitutes, through vacillating systems; the rapid augmentation in its various grades; the number of ships; their increased force, and the rush of the best blood in the nation for its ranks, would seem to indicate that the occasion has presented itself which calls for an efficient legislation to place the navy on a footing of liberal policy.

It has been asked, why is your little navy, which has put itself at the head of all others in valour and skill, at the foot of all others in every thing else? Is it in future as in past times to be stationary? Are the officers to whom you trust your valuable property, the lives of your citizens, the honour and respect of your flag throughout the world, and in every sea, to continue to be deprived of authority for the protection of the one, and means for the support of the other?

Are the men who should be high-minded, and of the purest hearts, to be trusted with so much on the national account, unworthy of consideration on their own? Ought they to be subject, on the termination of a cruise, to supplicate for trifling executive allowances, to study an approximation to the nearest reimbursement of unavoidable expenses, originating in circumstances over which they had and could have no control? If not, the time has presented itself in which common justice, as well as the future efficacy of this service, calls for liberality in its grades, as well as remuneration for its labours, its hazards, and its deprivations. Mark this period, then, as the auspicious time on which the nation can look back with pride and pleasure, as the day of its regeneration, and the first dawning of a liberal policy, whereon to found our future hopes for its distinguished character, discipline and chivalry. National Gaz.

FEMALE AUTHORS.

Women, we fear, cannot do every thing; not even every thing they attempt. But what they can do, they do, for the most part, excellently—and much more frequently with an absolute and perfect success, than the aspirants of our rougher and more ambitious sex. No man, we will venture to say, could have written the letters of Madame de Sevigne, or the novels of Miss Austin, or the hymns and early lessons of Mrs. Barbauld, or the conversations of Mrs. Marcet. These performances, too, are not only essentially and intensely feminine, but they are, in our judgment, decidedly more perfect than any masculine productions with which they can be brought into comparison. They accomplish more completely all the ends at which they aim, and are worked out with a gracefulness and felicity of execution which excludes all idea of failure, and entirely satisfies the expectations they may have raised. We might easily have added to these instances. There are many parts of Miss Edgeworth's earlier stories, and of Miss Mitford's sketches and descriptions, and not a little of Mrs. Opie's, that exhibit the same fine and penetrating spirit of observation, the same softness and delicacy of hand, and unerring truth of delineation, to which we have alluded as characterising the purer specimens of female art. The same distinguishing traits of a woman's spirit are visible through the grief and the piety of Lady Russel, and the gaiety, the spite, and the venturesomeness of Lady Mary Wortley. We have not as yet much female poetry; but there is a truly feminine tenderness, purity, and elegance, in the Psyche of Mrs. Tighe, and in some of the smaller pieces of Lady Craven. On some of the works of Madame de Staël—her Corinne especially—there is a still deeper stamp of the genius of her sex. Her pictures of its boundless devotedness, its depth and capacity of suffering, its high aspirations, its painful irritability, and inextinguishable thirst for emotion, are powerful specimens of that morbid anatomy of the heart, which no hand but that of a woman's was fine enough to have laid open, or skilful enough to have recommended to our sympathy and love. There is the same exquisite and inimitable delicacy, if not the same power, in many of the happier passages of Madame de Souza and Madame Cottin—to say nothing of the more lively and yet melancholy records of Madame de Staël, during her long penance in the court of the Duchesse de Maine. Edin. Rev.

EARLY IMPRESSIONS.

I was but five years old when my mother died, but her image is as distinct in my recollection, now that twenty years have elapsed, as it was at the time of her death. I remember her as a pale, gentle being, with a sweet smile and a voice that was soft and cheerful, when she praised me, and when I had erred, for I was a wild, thoughtless child, there was a trembling wildness about it that always went to my little heart. And then she was so kind, so patient; I think I can now see her large blue eyes, moist with sorrow, because of my foolish waywardness, and hear her repeat, "my child, how can you grieve me so." I recollect she had for a long time been pale and feeble, and that sometimes there would come a bright spot on her cheek, which made her look so lovely, I thought she must be well. But then she sometimes spoke of dying, and pressed me to her bosom, and told me "to be good when she was gone, and to love my father a great deal, and be kind to him, for he would have no one else to love." I recollect she was very sick all day, and my little hobby-horse and whip were laid aside, and I tried to be very quiet. I did not see her for the whole day, and it seemed very long. At night they told me my mother was too sick to kiss me, as she always used to do, before I went to bed, and I must go without it. But I could not. I stole into the room, and laying my lips close to hers, whispered "mother, mother, won't you kiss me?" Her lips were very cold, and when she put her arm around me, laid my head upon her bosom, and one hand upon my cheek, I felt a cold shuddering creep all over me. My father carried me from the room; but he could not speak. After they put me in bed, I laid a long while, thinking, I feared my mother would indeed die, for her cheek felt cold, as my little sister's did, when she died, and they laid her in the ground. But the impressions of mortality are always indistinct in childhood, and I soon fell asleep. In the morning I hastened to my mother's room. A white napkin covered her face—I removed it—it was just as I feared. Her eyes were closed, her cheek was cold and hard, and only the lovely expression that always rested upon her lips, remained. In an instant, all the little faults for which she had so often reproved me, rushed upon my mind. I longed to tell her how good I would always be, if she would but stay with me. She was buried—but the memory of the funeral is indistinct. I only retain the impression, which her precepts and example left upon my mind. I was a passionate, headstrong boy, but I never yielded to this turn of my disposition, without fancying I saw her mild tearful eye fixed upon me, just as she used to do in life. And then, when I had succeeded in overcoming it, her sweet smile of approbation beamed upon me, and I was happy. My whole character underwent a change, even from the moment of her death. Her spirit was for ever with me, strengthening my good resolutions, and weakening my propensity to evil. I felt that it would grieve her gentle spirit to see me err, and I could not, would not, do it. I was the child of her affection; I knew she had prayed and wept over me, and that even on the threshold of the grave, her anxiety for my welfare had caused her spirit to linger, that she might once more pray for me. I resolved to become all she could desire. This resolution I have never forgotten. It helped me to subdue the waywardness of childhood, protected me through the temptations of youth, and will comfort and support me through the busier scenes of manhood. Whatever there is, that is estimable in my character, I owe to the impressions of goodness made upon my infant mind, by the exemplary conduct and faithful instructions of my excellent mother.

FEMALE COURAGE AND FORTITUDE.

At the time of the first emigration to this country, the females of England were well educated, and had a higher rank in the scale of mind, than at any previous age in British history. This had been effected, in no small degree, by the long and prosperous reign of queen Elizabeth, and her high reputation for talents and learning. Fashion has often the same control over the mind, as over the dress and equipage of a people. It was fashionable during the reign of this extraordinary queen, to think women as capable of reasoning upon public affairs as men. Our mothers brought something of the spirit with them. They knew from history how much their sex had done in the advancement of civilization and Christianity; and here was the finest field to prove that they still had the power and inclination. Naturally generous and enthusiastic, women have in every age been attached to the hero and the saint; and have followed the former to the battle-field, to bind up his wounds, and to sing his praises after victory; and the latter to the cross and the tomb. The wives of the pilgrims who landed at Plymouth, discovered more than Spartan fortitude in braving dangers and in supporting calamities. They were well educated women.

Among those who came after the pilgrims to settle the province of Massachusetts bay, were several women of high rank and superior refinement. Lady Arabella Johnson, daughter of the earl of Lincoln, and the wives of the gentlemen who formed the board of magistrates, were high bred dames; as well as the wives of the clergy, and many of the wives of their associates. Some of their chirography has reached us. It resembles the easy, flowing, fashionable hand of the present day, while the writing of the men of that day is difficult to be read. We have all seen the needle-work of that age in embroidered armorials, and genealogical trees; and these ancient records bear ample testimony to the industry, talent, and skill of the fair who wrought them. They shared the hardship of the times. Many a lovely daughter, in that day, who had been brought up in affluence and with tenderness, on her marriage, moved from her home and parents to some new settlement where her bridal serenade was the howlings of the beasts of prey, as they nightly roamed the desert.

If our mothers had a share, and a great share they had, in the trials of those days, why should they not be remembered in the history of this new-born empire? I contend, and who will deny it, that it required more courage and fortitude to stay on the skirts of the forest, unprotected by moat, ditch, or stockade, in the half built cabin, with decrepitude and infancy, listening to every step, anxious for the coming in of those who had gone forth in search of the foe, than it did to fight the foe when he was met. This was more than Spartan fortitude; for the enemy seldom saw the dwelling where the heroic mother of Sparta waited to hear the fate of her husband or children; but ours were in constant danger of an attack from the savages.

Many instances of female heroism, which occurred during the early settlement of this country, are on record, and should be carefully preserved. Among the most conspicuous was that of Mrs. Hannah Duston, of Haverhill, a pleasant village situated on the left bank of the Merrimack. On the fifteenth of March, 1698, Mrs. Duston was made prisoner by a party of Indians. She was on this day confined to her bed by sickness, attended by her nurse, Mary Niff. Seven children, besides a female infant six days old, were with her. As soon as the alarm was given, her husband sent away the seven children towards the garrison-house, by which time the Indians were so near, that despairing of saving the others of his family, he hastened after his children on horseback. This course was advised by his wife. She thought it was idle for her to attempt to escape. A party of Indians followed him, but the father kept in the rear of his children and often firing on his pursuers, he kept them back, and was enabled to reach the garrison with his children in safety. The Indians took Mrs. Duston from her bed and carried her off, with the nurse and infant; but finding the little one becoming troublesome, they took her from her mother's arms by force, and dashing her against a tree, ended her moans, and miseries, and life together. The mother had followed the Indians until this moment with faltering steps and bitter tears, thinking on the fate of herself, her babe, and her other children. After this horrid outrage, she wept no more; the agony of nature drank the tear-drop ere it fell. She looked to heaven with a silent prayer for succour and vengeance, and followed the infernal group without a word of complaint. At this instant, the high resolve was formed in her mind, and swelled every pulse of her heart. They travelled on some distance; as she thought, one hundred and fifty miles, but, perhaps, from the course they took, about seventy-five. The river had probably been broken up but a short time, and the canoes of the Indians were above the upper falls, on the Merrimack, when they commenced their journey to attack Haverhill. Above these falls, on an island in the river, the Indians had a wigwam, and in getting their canoes in order, and by rowing ten miles up the stream, became much fatigued. When they reached the place of rest they slept soundly. Mrs. Duston did not sleep. The nurse, and an English boy, a prisoner, were apprised of her design, but were not of much use to her in the execution of it. In the stillness of the night she arose and went out of the wigwam to test the soundness and security of savage sleep. They did not move; they were to sleep until the last day. She returned, took one of their hatchets and despatched ten of them in a moment, each with a single blow. An Indian woman who was rising when she struck her, fled with her probable death-wound; and an Indian boy was designedly spared, for the avenger of blood was a woman, and a mother, and could not deal a death-blow upon a helpless child. She surveyed the carnage ground by the light of the fire which she stirred up after the deed was done, and catching a few handfuls of roasted corn, she commenced her journey; but on reflecting a moment, she thought the people of Haverhill would consider her tale as the ravings of madness when she should get home, if ever that time might come; she therefore returned and scalped the slain; then put her nurse and English boy into the canoe, and with herself they floated down to the falls, when she landed and took to the woods, keeping the river in sight which she knew must direct her on the way home. After suffering incredible hardships by hunger, cold, and fatigue, she reached home, to the surprise and joy of her husband, children, and friends. The general court of Massachusetts examined her story, and being satisfied of the truth of it, took her trophies, the scalps, and gave her fifty pounds. The people of Boston made her many presents. All classes were anxious to see the heroine; and as one of the writers of that day says, who saw her, "she was a right modest woman." Has Anacharsis or Mitford, in their histories of Greece, anything to surpass this well authenticated story? Her descendants in a right line and by the same name, are now living where she was captured.

INDIAN ELOQUENCE.

A passion for eloquence is not confined to civilized man. The sons of the forest are as fond of it as the best cultivated minds in polished life. Indian history is full of the passion for eloquence. The speech of Logan is only a common specimen of their capacity for high attainments in the noble art.

When the Winnebagoes had a deputation at the seat of government last year, the interview between them and the president of the United States was conducted with great ceremony. After sitting a while in the audience chamber, the most aged chief, then ninety years old, bald headed, with his manly arms and chest bare, arose and advanced to the president; in a few words he stated the object of his visit, and his happiness in finding the great father of his people so kind and good, but should speak very little, but leave the details and exemplifications of the mission they were sent on, to the orator of the tribe. The aged chief retired with great dignity; the signal given, the orator advanced; he was of fine size and noble proportions. He stood an almost naked bust, and extending his arm, said, that he was not a chief by birth, but was made one by the fame of his talents, and by the power of his eloquence. He was a warrior who had never committed a crime, nor sunk to any meanness, or ever told a falsehood. His whole demeanour was full of grave dignity, and solemn serenity. After this interview, even the aged chief, who had kept sober before, joined in a most riotous, drunken frolic, while the speaker kept himself from the errors of his brethren, and retired from the scene, to preserve the honours of a Winnebago orator.

THE DUEL.

The relation which follows, however extraordinary, was communicated to us by a friend, who states, that it is literally true, and that the time, place, and circumstances are, as he believes, within the recollection of hundreds. The moral of the tale, it will be seen, is against duelling; a vice which, in our humble apprehension, can only be restrained by public opinion. So long as law-makers are challengers, and it is regarded a necessary point of honour that every one should fight who is challenged, the statute book against this offence must remain a mere nullity. We concur in the opinion of our correspondent, that true courage exists as much in suffering for the sake of conscience, as in daring for the sake of false honour.

At the commencement of the last war, a young man, a native of Vermont, who had graduated at one of our universities, possessing abilities rather above the common order, although diffident and retiring in his manners, and being without employment, resolved to join the army in defence of his country. He was of a respectable family, and had acquired a large circle of friends, by whose instrumentality he obtained a commission. During his leisure hours, he indulged in field sports, and was known to be the best shot in the neighbourhood. He had often, however, expressed his abhorrence of duelling, and no one supposed his opinion arose from cowardice, but from his ideas of justice, and moral obligation. Soon after he received his commission, the corps to which he was attached was ordered to our northern frontier, and by application to his duties, he soon made himself respected as an officer and a gentleman. Owing to his natural reserve and religious disposition, he did not mingle with his brother officers as often as they wished, and from some harmless jests, at first, which were received with indifference on his part, they were emboldened to insolence, inasmuch that after some time he became the butt of his fellows. Nevertheless, he had obtained the friendship of many of the officers, especially the surgeon of the regiment, whom he highly esteemed. This surgeon, who had remarked with some degree of interest the insults which his friend had received, and passed unnoticed, spoke to him respecting his forbearance, and observed to him that as an officer, if he persisted in that kind of conduct, he would be considered as unfit for the station he held, besides making himself the jest and laughing stock of both officers and men. On which he observed to the surgeon, that he should conduct himself as became a man on all occasions. He soon found, however, that the friendship of him he most esteemed began to subside, the insults of the officers to increase, and that he must throw up his commission, or be branded with the name of coward, if he remained in the service. At the next convivial meeting, at which most of the officers were present, after the repast, the conversation naturally led to those topics on which military men are most inclined to converse. The observations became pointed and personal, and of their motive no one could doubt. The most conspicuous in his insults, was a young ensign, who was reprimanded by our hero in such severe terms, that he took offence, and sent him a challenge without leaving the table. Whereupon his friend, the surgeon, told him there was no alternative but to accept, and offered his services as a second. He did so—the arrangements were made on the spot to meet the following morning.

When the parties arrived on the ground, it was decided that they should fire together. At the first fire, lieutenant G. fired in the air, and the ball of his antagonist passed him harmless. The ensign insisted upon a second trial, to which lieutenant G. did not object; which terminated as the first, excepting a slight flesh wound received by lieutenant G. The ensign, still not being satisfied, demanded one trial more; on which lieutenant G. whose patience was nearly exhausted, consented, and observed to the parties, that he had fulfilled the laws of honour to the letter, and respect for himself would not allow further forbearance; then turning to ensign L., he said to him, "I never yet have missed my mark—your time has come." They fired—the ball of lieutenant G. pierced the heart of his opponent, and he never breathed more. The survivor, with his friend the surgeon, returned to the mess-room, where all the officers of the regiment were assembled waiting the result, and walking up to the table, without a word from the party, wrote a challenge directed to any officer in the regiment, from the colonel to the lowest in commission, and placed it before them. There was a silent, solemn pause for some minutes. No one dared to accept it; on which lieutenant G. drew his commission from his pocket, tore it in pieces, which he threw on the table, and left the service of his country, and the company of those who could not estimate the character or feelings of an honourable man.

CHANGES OF MANNERS.

The following is from the pen of Captain Grose, the eminent antiquary, who died in the year 1791, at the age of sixty; it was written about the year 1782—"I am a man of little more than fifty years of age, and yet I have nearly outlived a variety of systems and manners. When I was a young man, there existed in the families of most unmarried men or widowers, of the rank of gentlemen, resident in the country, a certain antiquated female, either a maiden or widow, commonly an aunt or cousin. Her dress consisted of a stiff starched cap and hood, a little hoop, and a rich silk damask gown, with large flowers; she leaned on an ivory headed crutch cane, and was followed by a fat phthisicky dog, usually of the pug kind, who commonly reposed on a cushion, and enjoyed the privilege of snarling at the servants, and occasionally biting their heels with impunity. By the side of this good old lady jingled a bunch of keys, securing in different closets and corner-cupboards all sorts of cordial waters, cherry and raspberry brandy, washes for the complexion, Daffy's elixir, a rich seed cake, a number of pots of currant jelly and raspberry jam, with a range of gallipots and phials containing physic for the use of the poor neighbours. The daily business of this good lady was to scold the maids, collect eggs, feed the turkeys, et cetera, et cetera.

"Another character now worn out and gone, is the country squire. I mean the little independent gentleman, with a landed property of three hundred pounds a year, who commonly appeared in a plain drab or plush coat, large silver buttons, a jockey cap, and rarely without boots. His travels never exceeded the distance of the country town, and that only at assize and session time, or to attend an election. Once a week he commonly dined at the next market town, with the attorneys and justices. This man went to the parish church regularly, read the weekly journal, settled the parochial disputes with the parish officers at the vestry, and afterwards adjourned to the neighbouring alehouse, where he usually got drunk for the good of his country. He never played at cards but at Christmas, when a family pack was produced from the mantel-piece. He was commonly followed by a couple of greyhounds and a pointer, and announced his arrival at a neighbour's house by smacking his whip, or giving the view-halloo. His drink was generally ale, except on Christmas, the fifth of November, or some other gala days, when he would make a bowl of strong brandy punch, garnished with a toast and nutmeg. A journey to London was by one of these men reckoned as great an undertaking, as is at present a voyage to the East Indies; and undertaken with scarce less precaution and preparation.

"The mansion of one of these squires was of plaster, striped with timber (not unaptly called calamanco work) or of red brick with large casemented bow-windows, a porch with seats in it, and over it a study. The eaves of the house were well inhabited by swallows, and the court set round with hollyhocks. The hall was furnished with fitches of bacon, and the mantel-piece with guns and fishing-rods of different dimensions, accompanied by the broadsword, partisan, and dagger, borne by his ancestors in the civil wars. Against the wall was posted "King Charles's Golden Rules," "Vincent Wing's Almanack," and a portrait of the duke of Marlborough; and in his window lay "Baker's Chronicle," "Fox's Book of Martyrs," "Glanvil on Apparitions," "Quincey's Dispensatory," "The Complete Justice," and a book of farriery. In the corner, by the fire side, stood a large wooden two-armed chair, with a cushion; and within the chimney corner were a couple of seats. Here at Christmas he entertained his tenants, assembled round a glowing fire, made of the roots of trees and other great logs. The best parlour, which was never open but on particular occasions, was furnished with Turkey worked chairs, and hung round with portraits of his ancestors—the men in the character of shepherds, with their crooks, dressed in full court suits, and huge full bottomed perukes, such as the judges wear now."

COMFORT AND CARES.

"All human situations," says Franklin, "have their inconveniences: we feel those that we find in the present, and we neither feel nor see those that exist in another. Hence we make frequent and troublesome changes without amendment, and often for the worse. In my youth I was passenger in a little sloop, descending the Delaware; there being no wind, we were obliged when the ebb was spent, to cast anchor and wait for the next. The heat of the sun was excessive, the company all strangers to me, and not very agreeable. Near the river side, I saw what I took to be pleasant green meadow, in the middle of which was a large shady tree, where it struck my fancy I could sit and read, and pass the time agreeably till the tide turned. I therefore prevailed with the captain to put me ashore.—Being landed I found a great part of my meadow was really a marsh, in crossing which, to come at my tree, I was up to my knees in the mud; and I had not placed myself under its shade five minutes before the mosquitoes, in swarms, found me out, attacked my face, and legs, and made my reading and my rest impossible, so that I returned to the beach and called for a boat to come and take me on board again, where I was obliged to bear the heat I had strove to quit, and also the laugh of the company. Similar cases in the affairs of life have fallen under my observation."

A LIBEL.

In a recent prosecution in the King's Bench, of a London editor for publishing a libel, Lord Tenderden said: "It was contended by the defendant, that as the rumours to which allusion is made in the libel actually prevailed, it was lawful in him to print them. He (Lord Tenderden) must say, that he was surprised at hearing a gentleman who had conducted his defence with so much tact, ability and talent, advance so untenable a proposition. No man was at liberty to circulate rumours which are injurious to the reputation of another; much less can the editor of a newspaper give circulation to them by placing them in print; for many persons who would otherwise not be acquainted with them, would learn through the medium of his newspaper. If an imputation be cast upon an individual in a newspaper, it matters not whether the editor learned that imputation from rumour or not, for he makes it his own by printing it, and so imps the wings on which slander flies."

THE HEIRESS.

I loved thee for thyself alone,
The world approved my choice;
Yet wail thou know'st I claimed thee still,
With no unsteady voice.
They called thee fickle; oh! how blind
I blamed thee not for broken vows,
Rejoicing thou wert free.
My father told me thou wert poor,
Improvident and wild;
He said that want and poverty
Would kill his gentle child.
I answered not; but secretly
I scorned the tale he told;
And then stole forth to other thee
The heiress and her gold.

My mother said, "I do not heed
Thy fondling words of wealth;
But will be fondly cherish thee
In sickness and in health."
He has the restless eyes of one
Who leads a roving life;
He loves not as thou shouldst be loved,
O do not be his wife!

My father's anger moved me not,
Nor yet my mother's tears;
Thy fascination won my heart
From love, the growth of years:
With few and fleeting tears I left
The haunts of early youth,
And placing this weak hand in thine,
I trusted to thy truth.

My chosen dwelling would have been
Some quiet rustic seat;
But led by thee, I trod the halls
Where pleasure's votaries meet.

And if with joy I heard them praise
The beauty of thy bride,
Thou hast because I dearly prize
My husband's glance of pride.
But then a dreary time came on,
I often wept alone;
And when we met, thy voice had lost
Its former gentle tone.
I uttered no complaint, thou knowest
I never did repine;
And if my pale cheek chided thee,
It was no fault of mine.

I heard my boasted wealth was spent,
I smiled at such a loss;
My husband's love was more to me,
Far more than hoarded dross.
And was it only this that caused
The frowns upon his brow?
"That wealth has been his base," I cried,
"We shall be happy now!"

Vain hope! for thou dost shun the home
Thy folly rendered poor;
I know not how to win thee back,
My cheek has lost its hue.
I have no mother now to soothe
My sorrows on her breast;
And he, whose counsel I despised,
My father, is at rest.

I do not say I love thee not,
No, false one, come what will,
Return and be but kind to me,
And I should love thee still.
A broken mirror still reflects,
In every shattered part,
Thou then love seems but multiplied
In this poor broken heart.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

COLOSSAL STATUE OF WASHINGTON.—How fully, says the National Gazette, the term colossal is in unison with the character of the being! His public virtue had dimensions, like those of the Apollo of Belvidere, above the ordinary human figure. The inscription on the base might be the line of Pope—

"Ennobled by himself—by all approved."

His zeal was as comprehensive as inexorable; his dignity of manner correspondent to his rectitude and elevation of purpose; he stood firm and superior, on the solid base of true patriotism, of which justice and honour are principal materials. The statue should be translated from Baltimore to Washington, and so placed that it must be often passed by the members of all branches of the government. All might read salutary lessons on the sublime brow and in the serene aspect; there is that in his port, life and character combined, which no familiarity would deprive of its force as counsel or rebuke.

PATENTS.—The number of patents for inventions granted in England, since the reign of Charles the second to the present time, exceeds five thousand five hundred, of which nearly two thousand having been granted since 1815, are still in force. Years of speculation are remarkable for increase of patents, the number obtained in 1818 having amounted to one hundred and thirty, while that year of extravagance, 1825, produced no less than two hundred and forty-nine.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Abductions.—If the paradox somewhere advanced be true, that increase of crime in cities keeps pace with their progressive improvement and refinement, then are we warranted in inferring a high degree of advancement in this same city of ours. Crimes, the very mention of which would have made our forefathers shudder, and of which the possibility seemed doubtful not very many years since, are now committed with impunity in our most thronged thoroughfares, and in open day. "Can such things be?" And are women no longer safe, even at broad noon-day, unless protected by the stronger sex? So it would appear from some very recent instances. And it would further seem, that the arm of the law is too weak, or its eye too dim to ferret out, and bring to condign punishment, the insolent and audacious perpetrators of the most heinous wrongs which can be inflicted on a community. No means should be left unresorted to, no pains nor expense spared, by which the rights of an injured female and an afflicted family might be fully and satisfactorily redressed.

No half measures will apply to the case. The precedent must be obviated, or New-York will be compelled to hide her confusion and disgrace amidst the indignant reproaches of all who hear of the unavenged shame which has been fixed upon her reputation.

Pure water.—Of the numerous high and important trusts confided to the municipal authorities of a populous city, the preservation of the public health is one of the most prominent and responsible. A negligent or careless indifference to this great object, betrays a want either of humanity or of knowledge in those who preside in the edile chair, and should be promptly punished by the displeasure of those who have elevated them to office. In this city complaints have been frequently and loudly made, on account of the very inferior quality of the water; but until lately, little or no attention has been paid to the outcry. Mr. Bowne, the mayor, has, however, finally invited the discussions of the common council to this subject; and the assistant alderman of the first ward has, in consequence, introduced a series of resolutions, calculated to carry proper measures into effect to supply the city with pure and wholesome water. We have often raised our voice in strong appeal to the public authorities in behalf of the pressing demands of our fellow-citizens, and let us not be disappointed in the hope we are now flattered with, that they will be effectually and promptly granted. Let not this measure be allowed to undergo the course of wilful procrastination to which the so long talked of demolition of the jail and bride-well was shamefully doomed.

Maelzel's exhibition.—Seldom have we been more delighted than in witnessing the curious display of ingenuity at this novel scene of attraction in Broadway. In fact, we were forcibly reminded of the high-pressure dream of our facetious friend C. published in the Mirror of the sixth instant, in which we are introduced to "locomotive men" of a very respectable character. On the present occasion, we once more saw the intricate game of chess scientifically played by an automaton, who moved his head, eyes, lips, and hands, with the greatest facility, and distinctly pronounced the French word for check! We were next regaled with a select piece of music, by Rossini, performed on an instrument called the melodium. After this an artificial French oyster-woman came forward with a graceful obeisance, and very dexterously opened oysters for the company. This figure was succeeded by one in the character of an old French gentleman, of the ancient regime, who drank all our healths with great glee. A wonderful Chinese dancer closed this part of the entertainment. An automaton trumpeter, of full size, and dressed in the uniform of the French lancers, was the next candidate for approbation, and well did he deserve the loud plaudits he received. But the best of all was the troop of equestrians, consisting of twenty-one figures, who executed all the various feats of horsemanship and dexterity, usual at the tournaments of the European courts, together with many of the most difficult evolutions of the circus, with beautiful accuracy and grace. This was followed by figures that pronounced the words papa, mama; the whole concluded with automaton who performed the most elegant and astonishing feats on the slack rope. But it would be vain to attempt a description of this astonishing exhibition—it must be seen to be duly appreciated.

Savings bank.—The eleventh report of this institution has just been published, and presents results which must be exceedingly gratifying to its benevolent founders and zealous supporters. Six hundred and twenty-four thousand nine hundred and three dollars and fifty-eight cents have been deposited in the bank during the last year. A list is given containing a description of the occupations of the depositors, which is sufficiently curious. Domestic constitute the greatest number, there being four hundred and twenty-five of them; labourers are next, three hundred and forty-four; clerks are third in order, seventy-four. There are fifty-seven bakers and six butchers, only four physicians, and no lawyers!

General commissioner.—The commercial intercourse between this city and Georgia has been greatly facilitated by the recent appointment of William H. Maxwell, esq., as "commissioner for the state of Georgia in the state of New-York." The standing, talents, and worth of Mr. M. are sure guarantees that the confidence of the legislature of Georgia has not been misplaced. This gentleman now represents five states, and is rendering the office above-named very useful.

Clara Fisher.—There were sixty-two boxes taken for this lady's first appearance at New-Orleans before the doors were opened in the evening. The papers pronounce her the most attractive actress that has ever visited that city.

THE SOLDIER'S TEAR.

AS SUNG BY MRS. AUSTIN IN THE OPERA OF MUSIC AND PREJUDICE.—THE POETRY BY T. M. BAYLY—THE MUSIC BY A. LEH.

Up - on the hill he turn'd, to take a last fond look Of the val - ley, and the vil - lage church, And the cot - tage by the brook, He lis - ten'd to the sounds So fa - mil - iar to his ear, And the sol - dier lean'd up - on his sword, And wiped a - way a tear.

2—Beside that cottage porch,
A girl was on her knees,
She held aloft a snowy scarf,
Which flutter'd in the breeze;

She breathed a pray'r for him,
A pray'r he could not hear,
But he paused to bless her as she knelt,
And wiped away a tear.

3d—He turn'd and left the spot,
Oh! do not deem him weak,
For dauntless was the soldier's heart,
Though tears were on his cheek;

Go watch the foremost ranks
In danger's dark career,
Be sure the hand most daring there
Has wiped away a tear.

VARIETIES.

ON PRESENTING A ROSEBUD TO A BEAUTIFUL LADY.
[From the French.]

If but a bud I bring to thee,
And wish it to thy bosom pressed,
It is because I love to see
The infant on its mother's breast.

GRAVITY OF BREAKFAST.—Whether breakfast is the most serious and silent meal, because it is first, or because it is the soberest, it is difficult to say; but it does generally pass without much talk, or, at all events, without much talk that is worth recording. Punsters very seldom pun at breakfast, and the narrators of long-winded stories are at that time more sparing of their tales. There is then seldom any argumentative discussion or any play of wit. Breakfast is altogether a matter of business, an affair of life and death, because if people did not break their fast, they could not live. Dinner is quite another thing; that is more a matter of pleasure than of business; and they who speak of the pleasures of the table, are supposed to allude to dinner, and not to breakfast. A man may dine with Duke Humphrey five days in the week; but it is a much more serious matter to breakfast with Duke Humphrey.

SETTLEMENT OF BOSTON.—In a few months, says the Boston Courier, two centuries will have been completed since the first settlement of this peninsula. It is not known on what precise day the foot of the white man first planted itself here. William Blackstone, for some months, had taken up his abode on this side of Charles river, and had dwelt here long enough to authorise his neighbours at Charlestown to call the peninsula Blackstone's Neck. By the invitation of Blackstone, Isaac Johnson, an influential and leading man, removed, with several others, to this side of the river, and commenced a settlement, in the month of August. On the seventh day of September, 1630, O. S. the court of assistants, holden at Charlestown, ordered that this place be called Boston. It is from that day that the foundation of the city should be dated. Allowing for the difference of style, this anniversary would fall on the eighteenth of September.

AFFECTATION.—One of the most affected women ever known, said to Mrs. Chapone once, in a tone of the utmost languor, "You know one had better be dead than be affected."

Thus all condemn what they expect to be admired for; and hope, against all reason and probability, to impose on the world by the same arts, which they can themselves so easily discern in others, and so readily join to deride.

TOLERANCE.—A remarkable instance of religious tolerance has recently occurred in the canton of Thurgau, in Switzerland. At Romanshorn, the catholics and protestants united for rebuilding the village church and purchasing two bells. The catholics, out of respect to the protestants, placed their altars in the hinder part of the edifice, and removed many of the ornaments of their worship; and the protestants, on their side, built at their own expense a sacristy for the catholics. The consecration of the church, which took place on the fifteenth of November, was really a festival of concord and christian charity.

SCANDAL.—It is amazing to observe the courage with which, upon mere common report, facts are repeated, which tend to the utter ruin of character, and even motives confidently assigned, which it was impossible should be known.

ROUGE.—A lady consulted St. Francis of Sales, on the lawfulness of using rouge. "Why," says he, "some pious men object to it; others see no harm in it. I will hold a middle course, and allow you to use it on one cheek."

MODERN PHILANTHROPY.—Modern philanthropy may be well described under the figure of an allegorical personage, who is so busily employed in searching for distant objects of distress, that she stumbles over a pilgrim, who came to solicit immediate assistance.

ANECDOTE.—A matronly lady asked one younger in years why she did not require of her companion to teach her the French language. To which interrogation she replied that one tongue was enough for a lady.

RESIDENCE OF NAPOLEON.—Longwood, the house which Bonaparte occupied at St. Helena, has been let to a farmer, and the room he died in has been converted into a stable.

There is nothing which more denotes a great mind than the abhorrence of envy and detraction.

Wear your learning like your watch, in a private pocket, and don't pull it out to show that you have one; but if you are asked what o'clock it is, tell it.

MIDAS AND MODERN STATESMEN.

Midas, they say, possessed the art, of old,
Of turning whatsoever he touched to gold.
This, modern statesmen can reverse with ease,
Touch them with gold, they'll turn to what you please.

RECIPE TO MAKE A MAN OF GREAT CONSEQUENCE.

A brow austere, a circumspective eye,
A frequent shrug of the os humeri,
A nod significant, a stately gait,
A blustering manner, and a tone of weight,
A smile sarcastic, an expressive stare—
Adapt all these as time and place will bear:
Then rest assured—that those of little sense
Will deem you, sure, a man of consequence.

EPITAPHIC WIT.—Every body has heard of the late Colonel Congreve, of "rocket memory," so justly celebrated for his inventive genius in the art of destroying his fellow-creatures—(the college of physicians were mere children of innocence compared with our firework Congreve.) The colonel, who was a musical amateur, one day accompanied Madame Vestris and a party of ladies to view Purcell the composer's monument; and, "with good emphasis, and with good discretion," read aloud the epitaph—"He is gone to that place where alone his harmony can be exceeded."—Vestris, the satirical little syren, who never loses an opportunity of lanching a witticism, immediately exclaimed, "La! colonel, the same epitaph will serve for you, by merely altering one word, thus—"He is gone to that place where alone his fireworks can be exceeded." All laughed but the colonel, who spouted no more epitaphs that morning.

THE ANCIENT ROMANS.—When they were poor, they robbed all mankind—and as soon as they became rich, they robbed one another.

DEFINITION OF A DENTIST.—The following is the only epigram furnished by the whole of the annuals for the present year. It appears in the Gem:

"A dentist, love, makes teeth of bone,
For those whom fate has left without;
And finds provision for his own,
By pulling other people's out."

WEAK EYES.—The following epigram is one of the best of its kind. It was addressed to a lawyer who complained of the disadvantage of weak eyes in his profession:

Weak eyes are best, be ruled by me,
And view the joyous omen right;
Since able lawyers, all agree,
Most often have the feeblest sight.

A PORTRAIT.

AMBITION rules his soul—
It is his master passion; though his heart
Answers spontaneously the frequent calls
Made by compassion and humanity,
And from his hand the ready tribute flows.
Nature designed him not for selfish things:
He was not formed to coldly calculate,
And weigh each rising feeling in the scale
Of policy and prudence; but the world
Has done its work on his aspiring mind.
There are some traits of innate nobleness,
Some gleams of natural feeling, which break forth
At intervals, when for a moment he
Is off his guard—as if 'twere but to show
That where his faults are not all hidden, there
Virtue shines out more brightly. 'Tis his aim
To have no enemies; and it may be
That he has fewer than his fellow-men.
To please, is the sole study of his life—
The same to all, on all alike he smiles;
But 'tis not for a smile to win a heart.
Moments there are when it may be the dupe
Of its own fancy, in the deep romance
Of youthful feeling and credulity.
But still there must be something to support
Imagination's power: it will not hold
Its empire o'er a vision long. Life's dreams
Are changeable things: they wear a thousand shapes
In their fantastic visits; and without
Some slight foundation in reality,
They are the very essence of caprice—
Taking from one, the qualities they gave,
To fix them on another, till they meet
With something to fill up their emptiness,
And turn them to those deep consuming thoughts
Which feed upon the heart.

His is the power
To charm the fancy, and to fill the mind
With images of beauty—not to hold
The silent thoughts in bondage. Would he thus Unlock the springs of feeling, he must feel.
And yet what matters it, while still he bows
At fashion's shrine: many its votaries:
And while he mingles in the giddy train,
What need is there of nature? 'Tis enough
To learn the lesson, and to act the part.
He is not what he might be. He withholds
The confidence which could impart a charm
To conversation, and reflects too much
On what he means to say before he speaks.
He trusts no word on the free winds but such
As might be safely blown throughout the world.
And when we seek for candour, we but find Caution and cold reserve; and friendship feels
Her warmth congealed, and, calm and passionless,
Loses, beneath his glance, her strength and power.
Honour, and principle, and truth, are his;
And polish, and refinement, and good sense;
But every thing is studied; and in vain
We look to read the heart—each avenue
Is closely guarded with a vigilance
Unequalled. Art is baffled still by art.
Prudence stands sentinel at every turn,
And those who know him best, still know him not.
His step is on the ladder which leads up
To fortune and to fame; nor will he stoop
Even for happiness, till he has won
The destined goal.

Bright are thy gilded dreams,
Oh vain ambition!—but too soon they break,
Like ocean's sparkling waves, upon the shore.
Yet still, thy ignis-fatuis light lures on Unnumbered followers, who spend their youth
In grasping at a shadow; till at last
It lengthens in the setting sun of life:
And sickened, and disgusted, and surprised,
They turn and find the phantom they pursued
Was disappointment.

ESTELLE.

THE DIRGE OF THE YEAR.

There came a moan,
Borne on the night wind's breath;
It was a strangely solemn tone,
Of mingled life and death:
A breathing sound,
As the wing of time swept by,
O'er the silent earth, and the gloom profound
Of the shrouded midnight sky:

"I have gazed on all
The beautiful since their birth,
I have seen the star and the floweret fall,
With the mighty things of earth.

"I have tramped on
The pride of the fearless heart,
But the hour of might for aye has gone,
And the mighty must depart.

"I have seen decay
Come o'er the youthful brow,
The death chant met the warm sun ray,
Mine is the requiem now.

"There are shades below,
And midnight on the sky,
With the mighty wreck of the past I go,
It is my hour to die!"

WINTER.

Winter—time of frosty breathing,
Coldly thou hast swept the sea,
Garlands of the dark red wreathing
Round the aged forest tree.

Then where falling leaf and flower,
Nature's charms before thee flew,
Dreary now the leafless bower,
Ice-gems where the soft fruit grew.

Whirlwind's dreadful howl has found us,
Song-birds with their notes are gone,
Tempests send destruction round us,
Sweeping down the sunny lawn.

Where the summer rose was blushing,
Ruddier than a maiden's lip,
Where the silver stream was gushing,
Rippled by the swallow's dip;

There thy chilling hand was feeling
Blighting as the desert air;
Every frozen touch was stealing
Lovely shades of floweret's fair.

Softer winds than thine are blowing,
O'er sweet groves of deepest dye,
Where the orange tint is glowing,
'Neath a kindlier southern sky.

They'll be here—thy days of power,
Soon in joy we must forget.
Haste thee—let not spring's first hour
Find thee with us lingering yet.

LARA.

TO MARY.

O would some kindly genius grant
A magic wand to me,
That I might cast a spell upon
The wizard destiny!
Believe me, then, my gentle friend,
Thou wouldst not be forgot,
If freely to my will 'twere given
To shape thy future lot.
Then bright thy sun of hope should burn,
As in thy fairest day,
And not a cloud of sadness e'er
Obscure its cheering ray.
No hidden thorn in all thy course
Through after years should lie;
But bordering flowers of rich perfume
Unceasing glad thine eye:
And ever to thy charmed ear
The sweetest birds should sing,
And ever by thy sunny path
Joy's purest fountains spring:
And thou shouldst have no summer friend,
But all should be to thee
As true in heart, as firm in love,
As I, your humble

THE IDOL OF MEMORY.

Wake, idol of my faded years,
And let thy early memory be
A solace for life's countless fears—
A sunbeam hovering o'er its sea;
And from the past, where light and shade
In vista'd change are lingering still,
Let thy all-hallowed smiles pervade
My long and lingering days of ill.
O'er the deep eloquent delight,
That garnished youth's unsullied hours,
There swept a chill and cankering blight
Like frost on autumn's painted bowers.

And on the yearning heart of bliss,
That pictured all the future fair,
There came the taint of earthliness,
Like mists on evening's purple air!

Then the fond idols of my youth,
Love's precious gifts, were offered up;
The cold world lost its early truth,
And joy the sweetness of his cup.
Each bud, and leaf, and sunny dream,
Passed on the tide of time away;
And hours my soul had brightest deemed,
Were soonest darkened with decay!

Sometimes a seraph thought will wake
A radiance from hope's upper sky;
As morning sunbeams oft will break
From the cloud-draperies hung on high.
But ere the soul is rich with bliss,
Her songs are dying on the ear,
The dream hath lost its loveliness,
And stern reality is near!

And then the vain and restless throng
That jostle on life's pilgrim road,
Mar the clear fountain of my song,
That placid wave by heaven bestowed.
I see the proud and haughty crush
The innocent and helpless down;
I mark the sons of genius rush
Up the steep mountains of renown:

And then I hear the bitter words
That envy to ambition flings—
The ringing shields—the clanging swords,
Mingled with battle's mutterings:
I see the heroes rise and fall,
While smoke and flame, in volumes blent,
Fame's sad, but glorious coronal,
Floats through the azure element!

But from these moving scenes I turn,
Fair one, to dream again of thee,
And restless thoughts arise and burn,
My offerings unto memory.
The world, and all its shadowed hours,
Grow distant, indistinct, and dim;
And gathering memory's wasted flowers,
My soul is listening to thy hymn!

POPULAR TALES.

THE MYSTERIOUS WEDDING.

A DANISH STORY—BY STEFFENS.*

ON the north-west of Zealand stretches a small fertile peninsula, studded with hamlets, and connected with the main land by a narrow strip of waste ground. Beyond the only town which this little peninsula possesses, the land runs out into the stormy Cattegat, and presents an awfully wild and sterile appearance. The living sands have here obliterated every trace of vegetation; and the hurricanes which blow from all points of the ocean, are constantly operating a change on the fluctuating surface of the desert, whose hills of sand rise and fall with a motion as incessant as that of the waves which roar around them. In travelling through this country, I spent upwards of an hour in this district, and never shall I forget the impression which the scene made upon my mind.

While riding along through the desolate region, a thunder-storm rose over the ocean, towards the north; the waves roared, the clouds scudded along in gloomy masses before the wind, the sky grew every instant more dark, "menacing earth and sea;" the sand began to move in increasing volumes under my horse's feet, a whirlwind arose and filled the atmosphere with dust, the traces of the path became invisible, while air, earth, and ocean seemed mingled and blended together, every object being involved in a cloud of dust and vapour. I could not discern the slightest trace of life or vegetation around the dismal scene; the storm roared above me, the waves of the sea lashed mournfully against the shores, the thunder rolled in the distance, and scarcely could the lurid lightning-flash pierce the heavy cloud of sand which whirled around me. My danger became evident and extreme; but a sudden shower of rain laid the sand and enabled me to push my way to the little town. The storm

* This story, as told by Steffens, (a Dane by birth, but now, we believe, a professor at Breslau), forms the subject of two German novels and a Danish poem.

I had just encountered was a horrid mingling of all elements. An earthquake has been described as the sigh which troubled nature heaves from the depth of her bosom; perhaps not more fancifully might this chaotic tempest have typified the confusion of a widely distracted mind, to which pleasure and even hope itself have been long strangers,—the cheerless desert of the past, revealing only remorse and grief,—the voice of conscience threatening like the thunder, and her awful anticipations casting a lurid light over the gloomy spirit,—till at last the long-sealed up sources of tears open a way for their floods, and bury the anguish of the distracted soul beneath their waves.

In this desolate country, there existed in former times a village called Roerwig, about a mile distant from the shore. The moving sands have now buried the village; and the descendants of its inhabitants—mostly shepherds and fishermen—have removed their cottages close to the shore. A single solitary building, situated upon a hill, yet rears its head above the cheerless shifting desert. This building and the village church, was the scene of the following mysterious transaction.

In an early year of the last century, the venerable curé of Roerwig, was one night seated in his study, absorbed in pious meditations. His house lay at the extremity of the village, and the simple manners of the inhabitants were so little tinged with distrust, that bolts and locks were unknown amongst them, and every door remained open and unguarded.

The lamp burned gloomily,—and the sullen silence of the midnight hour was only interrupted by the rushing noise of the sea, on whose waves the pale moon shone reflected, when the curé heard the door below opened, and the next moment the sound of men's steps upon the stair. He was anticipating a call to administer the last offices of religion to some one of his parishioners on the point of death, when two foreigners, wrapped up in white cloaks, entered the room. One of them approaching, addressed him with politeness: "Sir, you will have the goodness to follow us instantly. You must perform a marriage ceremony; the bride and bridegroom are already waiting your arrival at the church. And this sum,"—here the stranger held out a purse full of gold—"will sufficiently recompense you for the trouble and alarm our sudden demand has given you."

The curé stared in mute terror upon the strangers, who seemed to carry something fearful—almost ghastly in their looks, and the demand was repeated in an earnest and authoritative tone. When the old man had recovered from his first surprise, he began mildly to represent that his duty did not allow him to celebrate so solemn a rite without some knowledge of the parties, and the intervention of those formalities required by law. The other stranger hereupon stepped forward in a menacing attitude: "Sir," said he, "you have your choice; follow us and take the sum we now offer you,—or remain, and this bullet goes through your head." Whilst speaking, he levelled his pistol at the forehead of the venerable man, and coolly waited his answer; whereupon the curé rose, dressed himself, and informed his visitors—who had hitherto spoken Danish, but with a foreign accent—that he was ready to accompany them.

The mysterious strangers now proceeded silently through the village, followed by the clergyman. It was a dark autumn night, the moon having already set; but when they emerged from the village, the old man perceived with terror and astonishment that the distant church was all illuminated. Meanwhile his two companions, wrapped up in their white cloaks, strode hastily on before him through the barren sandy plain. On reaching the church, they bound up his eyes; he then heard a side-door open with a well-known creaking noise, and felt himself violently pushed into a crowd of people whose murmuring he heard all around him, while close beside him some persons carried on a conversation in a language quite unknown to him, but which he thought was Russian. As he stood helpless and blindfolded, he felt himself seized upon by a man's hand, and drawn violently through the crowd. At last the bandage was removed from his eyes, and he found himself standing with one of the two strangers before the altar. A row of large tapers, in magnificent silver candlesticks, adorned the altar, and the church itself was splendidly lighted up by a profusion of candles. The deepest silence now reigned throughout the whole building, though the side passages and all the seats were crowded to excess; but the middle passage was quite clear, and he perceived in it a newly dug grave, with the stone which had covered it leaning against a bench. Around him were only male figures, but on one of the distant benches he thought he perceived a female form. The terrible silence lasted for some minutes, during which not a motion could be detected in the vast assembly. Thus when the mind is bent on deeds of darkness, a silent gloomy brooding of soul often precedes the commission of the horrid action.

At last a man, whose magnificent dress distinguished him from all the rest, and bespoke his elevated rank, rose and walked hastily up to the altar; as he passed along, his steps resounded through the building, and every eye was turned upon him,—he appeared to be of middle stature, with broad shoulders and strong limbs,—his gait was commanding, his complexion of a yellowish brown, and his hair raven black,—his features were severe, and his lips compressed as if in wrath,—a bold aquiline nose heightened the haughty appearance of his countenance, and dark shaggy brows lowered over his fiery eyes. He wore a green coat, with broad gold braids, and a brilliant star. The bride, who also approached and kneeled beside him at the altar, was magnificently dressed. A sky blue robe, richly trimmed with silver, enveloped her slender limbs, and floated in large folds over her graceful form,—a diadem sparkling with diamonds adorned her fair hair,—the utmost loveliness and beauty might be traced in her features, although despair now expressed itself in them,—her cheeks were pale as those of a corpse,—her features unanimated,—her lips were blanched,—her eyes dimmed,—and her arms hung motionless at her side as she kneeled before the altar; terror seemed to have wrapped her consciousness as well as her vital powers in deep lethargy.

The curé now discovered near him an old ugly hag, in a party-coloured dress, with a blood red turban upon her head, who stood gazing with an expression of malignant fury on the kneeling bride; and behind the bridegroom, he noticed a man of gigantic size and a gloomy appearance, whose eyes were fixed immovably on the ground.

Horror-struck by the scene before him, the priest stood mute for some time, till a thrilling look from the bridegroom reminded him of the ceremony he had come thither to perform. But the uncertainty whether the couple he was now about to marry understood his language, afforded him a fresh source of uneasiness. He ventured, however to ask the bridegroom for his name and that of his bride: "Neander and Feodora," was the answer returned in a rough voice.

The priest now began to read the ritual in faltering accents, frequently stopping to repeat the words, without however either the bride or bridegroom appearing to observe his confusion, which confirmed him in the conjecture that his language was almost unknown to either of them. On putting the question, "Neander wilt thou have this woman for thy wedded wife?" he doubted whether he should receive any answer; but to his astonishment, the bridegroom answered in the affirmative with a loud and almost screaming voice, which rung throughout the whole church, while deep sighs were heard from every quarter of the building, and a silent quivering like the reflection of distant lightning, threw a transitory motion over the death-pale features of the bride. When the priest turned to her with the interrogatory: "Feodora wilt thou have this man for thy wedded husband?" the lifeless form before him seemed to awake,—a deep convulsive throb of terror trembled on her cheeks,—her pale lips quivered,—a passing gleam of fire shone in her eyes,—her breast heaved,—a violent gush of tears flooded the brilliance of her eyes, and the "yes" was pronounced like the scream of anguish uttered by a dying person, and seemed to find a deep echo in the sounds of grief which burst from the surrounding multitude. The bride then sank into the arms of the horrid old hag, and after some minutes had passed in awful silence, the pale corpse-like female kneeled again, as if in a deep trance, and the ceremony was finished. The bridegroom now rose and led away the trembling bride, followed by the tall man and the old woman; the two strangers then appeared again, and having bound the priest's eyes, drew him with violence through the crowd, and pushed him out at the door, which they bolted from within.

For some minutes the old man stood endeavouring to recollect himself, and uncertain whether the horrid scene, with all its ghastly attendant circumstances, might not have been a dream; but when he had torn the bandage from his eyes, and saw the illuminated church before him, and heard the murmuring of the crowd, he was forced to believe its reality. To learn the issue, he hid himself in a corner of the building, and while listening there he heard the murmuring within grow louder and louder,—then it seemed as if a fierce altercation arose, in which, he thought he could recognise the rough voice of the bridegroom commanding silence,—a long pause followed,—a shot fell,—the shriek of a female voice was heard, which was succeeded by another pause,—then followed a sound of pick-axes which lasted about a quarter of an hour, after which the candles were extinguished, the door was flung open, and a multitude of persons rushed out of the church, and ran towards the sea.

The old priest now arose from his hiding-place, and hastened back to the village, where he awoke his neighbours and friends, and related to them his incredible and marvellous adventure; but every thing which had hitherto fallen out amongst these simple people, had been so calm and tranquil,—so much measured by the laws of daily routine, that they were seized with a very different alarm: they believed that some unfortunate accident had deranged the intellects of their beloved pastor, and it was not without difficulty that he prevailed on some of them to accompany him to the church, provided with picks and spades.

Meanwhile the morning had dawned, the sun arose, and the priest and his companions ascended the hill towards the church, they saw a man-of-war standing off from the shore under full sail towards the north. So surprising a sight in this remote district, made his companions already hesitate to reject his story as improbable, and still more were they inclined to listen to him when they saw that the side-door of the church had been violently burst open. They entered full of expectation, and the priest showed them the grave which he had seen opened in the night time, it was evident that the stone had been lifted up and replaced again. They, therefore, put their implements in motion, and soon came to a new, and richly adorned coffin, in which lay the murdered bride,—a bullet had pierced her breast right to the heart,—the magnificent diadem which she had worn at the altar no longer adorned her brows, but the distracted expression of deep grief had vanished from her countenance, and a heavenly calm seemed spread over her features. The old man threw himself down on his knees near the coffin, and wept and prayed aloud for the soul of the dead, while mute astonishment and horror seized his companions.

The clergyman found himself obliged to make this event instantly known, with all its circumstances, to his superior, the bishop of Zealand; meanwhile, until he got further instructions from Copenhagen, he bound all his friends to secrecy by an oath. Shortly afterwards a person of high rank, suddenly arrived from the capital; he inquired into all the circumstances, visited the grave, commended the silence which had been hitherto observed, and stated that the whole event must remain for ever a secret, threatening at the same time with a severe punishment, any person who should dare to speak of it.

After the death of the priest, a writing was found in the parochial register, narrating this event. Some believed that it might have some secret connection with the violent political changes which occurred in Russia, after the death of Catherine and Peter the first; but to resolve the deep riddle of this mysterious affair will ever be a difficult, if not impossible task.

CONFESSIONS OF AN IMAGINATIVE MAN.

MR. MORRIS—I am one of a numerous class in the human family, who, possessing imaginations more fertile than their fellow-men, luxuriate in every species of fiction which invention, in its most extended range, is capable of producing. With some individuals of this genus, the phenomena which characterizes the body, is exhibited in the form of fictitious narratives, tales, or adventures, in which they embody the ideal creations of their fancy. This is a harmless use of the malady, and frequently an amusing and instructive one, as the pages of your miscellany, can frequently testify—others, taking a bolder flight revel in the delightful regions of poetry, and

"Give to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name."

While some there are, who, wanting the activity and energy of those I have quoted, pass their lives in one continued delirium of imagination,

"Till, to the visionary, seem
Her day-dreams truth, and truth a dream."

I possess most of the properties of these respective classes, with the exception, that I have never before ventured to give to the world the prints of my invention, but have contented myself with being a mere verbal author, if the term may be permitted me. My peculiarity is, to invest the incidents and details of "every day life," with the embellishments and exaggerations of my ever teeming imaginative powers. Thus, sir, my conversation is divested of every "stern reality," and the "sober language of truth" has become to me as "a thing of nought."

The exercise of my imaginative powers commenced with my earliest recollections. At school, I would collect listening circles of my young companions, and engage their attention with extraordinary narrations regarding my family, the importance of our connections, and the wealth and honours which had been heaped upon my ancestors through successive generations, all of which were embellishments of the simple narrative, I delighted in procuring from an ancient domestic of the family, who had been my nurse. These "chronicles" of our house, aided by story books, that I read with an avidity surprising for my years, formed ample resources for my young imagination to draw upon, and embellish or enlarge as circumstances required. It is true, that even these precocious attempts at delusion, were frequently detected, and consequently exposed me to severe correction. I also will not disguise the fact, that I left school, with the character attached to me, of being a "notorious liar." You will naturally inquire, where was the restraint of parental authority? Alas, sir, no such restraint was ever imposed upon me. I lost my mother when an infant, and my father only saw in the displays of my fertile invention, proofs of an early genius, and by his praises of my ingenuity, rather confirmed my predilections, than curbed them by the exercise of his paternal authority. Thus left to riot in the full enjoyment of my favourite passion, I arrived at the age of manhood. At this period, I was taken into the mercantile house of which my father was the head, as a junior partner, and in the prosecution of our business, had occasion to visit Europe. I had now a wider scope for the display of my imagination than had before occurred to me. The letters I regularly forwarded to my friends during my absence, were proofs of my inventive faculties of no ordinary description, and could they be obtained, would, I doubt not, form an invaluable collection,—which, in the hands of an intelligent editor, might furnish an almost inexhaustible fund for the amusement of his readers—could the public but be impressed with the truth of their details. For the "hair breadth escapes"—the dangers by "flood and field," and the new discoveries they contain—form together a surprising series of adventures, only to be paralleled by the renowned Baron Munchausen or the veracious Lemuel Gulliver.

It must not be supposed that I confined the display of my inventive powers to epistolary correspondence, or that while I was enlightening my friends on this side the Atlantic, with the fruits of my observation and research, I was unmindful of my newly formed European acquaintance. No, sir, the connections I was now thrown amongst, equally shared the benefit of my fertile imagination with my countrymen. I indulged in my cherished passion to an uncontrollable extent, and many an exclamation of mingled wonder and chagrin, have I called forth from some prejudiced Englishman, or elicited the expressive national shrug of some courteous Frenchman, while detailing the magnificence of our public establishments,—the vast resources of our country—the rapid progress we had made in manufactures—and the perfection we had arrived at, both in science and in art. Here, sir, I have perhaps only followed the practice of more distinguished travellers, my countrymen, who, exercising their imaginations, describe our country as it may be some fifty years hence, instead of simply stating the gradual and progressive improvement we are actually making. In the indulgence of these inflated descriptions, I occasionally found myself confronted with some individual who had visited our continent, and who felt inclined to dispute my veracity; but the minuteness of my details, and the fact of my being a native of the country I was describing, in most cases left me undisputed master of the field. In my details of personal adventure, I was not so fortunate. The extraordinary narrations I indulged in, were sometimes too strong for the "plain matter-of-fact" men I was principally brought into connection with, and before I returned home, I found that I was listened to with evident marks of suspicion and contempt.

On my return to America, my travels formed abundant materials for conversation, and during the course of a long life have afforded a never-failing resource for the exercise of my talent for fiction and embellishment. There is one series of adventures connected with them that I have so constantly repeated, until it has become a matter of doubt to myself, whether, I have not actually passed through the scenes I describe, so familiar have they become by repetition. I am in a similar position with many of my stock anecdotes, and it is only when my friends correct my statements, by referring to my former narration of the same story, that I can realize the fact of the whole being the produce of my glowing and creative brain.

Another faculty I possess is, that I invariably become the hero of my own tale. No adventure, however improbable, can be narrated, but I can find a parallel in my own experience, or, when the case will not admit of my own personification of the hero, I have always some particular friend who has been similarly situated. I have at all times foreign advices on matters of general interest different from the public despatches on the same subject. I have friends in congress and in the legislature, who furnish me with information on proposed acts previous to their being submitted to those bodies. In cases of every day occurrence I am always provided with statements different from the received accounts on such heads; and even the domestic affairs of my neighbours and friends are represented by me in a totally different light to what actually exists. I need not add that I draw on my own prolific brain for these varied sources of intelligence. The simplest paragraph in a newspaper, after passing through the alembic of my imagination, would not be recognised by its writer, nor the plainest fact be identified by the individual to whom it occurred, after I had embellished it, with my fertile powers of invention and exaggeration. You will readily suppose, sir, that I am sometimes placed in rather an unpleasant position when these fictions of mine are repeated; but my character is now so proverbial, that, when the stories are traced to me as the author, no notice whatever is taken of the circumstance. My foible is now generally known; and as it is allowed that I never maliciously distort facts to answer any bad end, I am permitted the use of my harmless propensity, paying only the penalty of being designated by the mild term of "a romancer." There is one subject of annoyance to me that I cannot pass over, which is, the indifference now manifested by my acquaintance to the relation of my best narratives: age may have deadened my powers, or the world in these times of change and improvement may not be so credulous as I found it in my youth, but the fact is certain, that I now scarcely ever obtain a believing hearer to my narrations, unless a complete stranger to my character falls in my way. Even you, sir, may perhaps doubt the truth of all I have written; print it, however; it will gratify my friends, and prove to them, that at least, in one instance, I have spoken the fact in calling myself

AN IMAGINATIVE MAN.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

Snow and sleigh-rides have passed away—rough winds and rainy weather linger yet—but, ever and anon, the soft southern breeze passes over the city, gently whispering that spring is coming. Spring is coming! what a cheerful sound it hath? The face of man and woman brighteneth at its approach, and birds and business become more brisk and lively as it steals along. It sendeth joy into the heart of the mantua-maker, for the fashions come with it; and the tailor standeth behind his counter, nervously snapping his shears in expectation of a customer. Good man, he longeth to be a cutting out! Even now, unthought of bonnets, and unimaginable coats, with the London and Parisian gloss yet fresh upon them, are tossing about amid the dreary solitudes of the Atlantic. Blow, gentle gales, and waft them safely hither! Let not the naiads and mermaids flit about in their coral coves, arrayed in frills and flounces intended for Broadway belles; or mermen, who dwell in ocean's remotest depths, try on those pattern trowsers which Whitmarsh & Co. would have multiplied a thousand fold, to adorn the exquisite young republicans of the city. Blow, gentle Eurus, or in common phraseology, blow, eastern wind! preserve from fish what was meant for flesh, and send the London and Havre packets safe into the harbour! But what, inquires some person of slow perception, unskilled in the connexion of cause and effect, what has spring to do with the Park theatre? Much, very much. Ice and poetry combine not well together. The sharp north-west winds congeal the tears of Melpomene, and chill gay Thalia's smiles. But when the sun begins to warm the world and open the canals, then the hey-day of theatrical prosperity commences. When the North river is opened, then are the boxes filled—when the roads are in a good condition, then is Shakespeare admired. When nature casteth her "mantle green" over the earth, then Mr. Simpson pocketeth the change, and Mr. Barry brings forth the "various novelties that have been for several weeks in preparation"—strangers flock into the city from every quarter, trade flourishes, and money flies. To all the world beside spring is only the season of hope—of promise; but to the managers of the Park it is that of fulfilment, of fruition; their autumn time, when they gather in the golden harvest that repays them for the losses and privations of the past winter, and enables them to endure the heat and desertion of the coming summer.

During the short vacation, the virtue of the city has evidently retrograded, police cases have multiplied, and an old woman had her pocket picked in Leonard-street on Saturday last. If this does not conclusively prove that the theatre is a school for morals, we do not know what does. A masquerade has been given, but it was a very poor affair. It wanted tone and respectability, being neither countenanced by Walter Bowne nor Mr. Hays; and divers little boys, and candidates for the penitentiary, amused themselves by breaking the windows and pelting the maskers as they entered, without having the fear of the law before their eyes. There were a great many present, dressed as different characters, but very few attempted to sustain their assumed parts, and those who did, had much better have let it alone; they ought all to have been labelled, which would have enabled the company to read what they were intended to represent; otherwise, it was impossible to tell. The dresses were chiefly furnished from the wardrobe of the theatre, and in two or three instances, we recognised the habiliments of our excellent friend Richings moving around; but where was the goodly, well-proportioned frame and lordly carriage by which he adorns his garments in place of their adorning him, or rather by means of which they mutually reflect credit on each other? there were also the blue trowsers and hose of the facetious Woodhull; but where were the spirit-stirring murders and tremendous denunciations that invariably accompany their appearance on the stage? there was the dress and umbrella of Mr. Paul Pry, but nothing else, not even a tittle of the noisy humour and amusing volubility with which Hilson invests that most pleasant of intruders. In short, the whole affair was "stale and flat," though from the number there, we should think not "unprofitable." After wandering about two or three hours, we consulted our watch, and found, like Mr. Claudius Bradshaw, that it was "twelve o'clock and no pleasure yet!" and so took our departure in peace, wondering how it came to be necessary to pass laws to prevent such a piece of foolishness. The truth is, this species of amusement is but ill calculated for English and Americans. It is against the nature of the people; they are too proud, stiff, and unbending, and lack lightness and vivacity to enter with spirit into the gay follies of a masquerade. As Sterne says, "they order these things better in France."

The theatre opened on Monday for the benefit of Mrs. Austin, and we were really happy to see that it was, to use the regular formula, "so full and fashionably attended." The performance consisted of a number of incongruities jumbled together. First, there was the very broad farce of 33 John-street, then came an act of the Tempest, with the gentle Ariel and the floating melodies of the enchanted isle—then a soldier's hornpipe, and the overture to Der Freischutz—then an act of Hamlet exhibiting the crazed Ophelia, in which Mrs. Austin sung delightfully, and acted—as well as she could, followed by another soldier's hornpipe and the overture to Tancredi—then Mr. Richings, who does the patriotic business of the house, gave "Columbia forever"—then a sailor's hornpipe—then the landing scene from Tancredi, in which Mrs. A. surprised even her warmest admirers—then another broad farce, and that was all. These olla podridas show a very vile taste indeed; but the public countenance them, and so there is no more to be said about the matter, excepting that the public are fools for their pains.

By the advertisements it appears that numerous new pieces are to be speedily forthcoming; it is to be hoped they will prove worth the seeing. Would not an engagement with Booth and Forrest be as attractive here as in Boston? There are many glorious plays in which they might appear together, not only for the amusement, but the instruction of the public. It is understood that the stage-manager will shortly proceed to Europe, in order to make arrangements with several stars; and in a short time we may expect some radiant luminaries. Mr. Barry will be sadly missed. Both as actor and manager, he is a general favourite with the public. In grave comedy, such parts for instances, as Lord Townly, Sir George Touchwood, or Joseph Surface, it will be impossible to supply his place, for in them and similar characters, he certainly has no equal on this side of the water.

LOVE OF CHANGE—HOUSE-HUNTING.

Man never is, but always to be blest.—Pope.

THERE must be a great quantity of Dutch blood in this city, for the euphonious names of Vanbenschoten, Vanvredenburgh, Vanvoorhis, Vanouterstorp, Vanschaick, Vanbokkelin, Vanmeerbekie, Vogelsang, Vonck, Volk, Vogt, &c. are to be met with in every street, and at every corner; but in what street or at what corner are to be found the still and tranquil virtues, the sedate and circumspect demeanour, the profound love of ease and phlegmatic temperament of the ancient denizens of Manahatta? In the good old times that have for ever passed away from this island, a man might be born, reared, married, and buried within a circuit of three miles; and a true Dutchman would as soon have thought of going to bed without his night-cap, as of chopping and changing about from one house to another. Wherever he first inhaled the breath of life, there he exhaled it. It was quite clear to his mind that Providence had cast his lot in a certain street, and a certain house, and for him to think of emigrating to another, would not only be presumptuously setting up his judgment against high authority, but a great waste of bodily exertion. Indeed, when he looked around, and saw all the furniture firmly fixed—the ponderous dresser—the solemn clock—the substantial table—just as his great-grandfather had placed them when the first ship first drifted from Holland to this coast, the idea of pulling them from their places, carrying them out into the open air, and setting them up in another domicile, seemed not only a sacrilegious disturbance of the household gods, but an enterprise requiring so much toil and trouble, as to make it scarcely worth the while attempting, considering the short time that is allotted for man to sojourn in this world. So lived the forefathers of a goodly portion of the present quicksilver generation. They worked when there was no help for it, and sat still whenever they could; they counted over their bright silver dollars (the only kind of change a Dutchman loves) and put them carefully away in their old stockings—they took their glass of genuine Schedam, they smoked their pipes in peace—

"They eat and drank and slept. What then?
They eat and drank and slept again."

And even so passed away the mortal existence of the forefathers of the identical Master Cicero Vanderscholten, that goes to masquerades, and executes pigeon-wings and pirouettes with such grace and agility; and so lived the progenitors of Miss Cecilia Amelia Anna Maria Vanwaggenen, that makes a noise on the piano, and keeps an album! O tempora, O mores!

Of all the civilized nations on the face of the earth, the Americans seem to attach the least value to "a local habitation;" and of all the parts of America, New-York is the most restless. Its citizens seem to be born with a feverish love of change and excitement, which pervades, more or less, every action of their lives, and to this they sacrifice friends, interest, and convenience. They put no faith in the proverb—"let well enough alone"—but are always ready to give up "well enough" in the desperate hope of getting something better. They must be in motion, and that motion is about as different from that of their Dutch ancestors as the motion of a duck pond on a calm day is to the rapids of Niagara. In business they are fickle to a degree that appears, and really is, heartless and unfeeling. They will give up a tradesman that has served them well and faithfully, and in whom they can place confidence, to run after some fresh adventurer, of whom they know nothing. But this is the way all over the country; and a tradesman has in reality just about as little consideration for his customers as his customers have for him. A man commences business in a small city; in the course of time forms acquaintances and connexions, and finds himself getting along, as he says, "as comfortably as he can wish," when suddenly he hears of some new town that has sprung up in the wilderness, where they "are doing considerable of a business;" and, without more to do, he sells off his stock, takes leave, without regret, of kind friends and familiar faces, and sets off to the land of promise to run a similar career. This is a national trait, and does not attach, with any peculiar force, to this city; but, for the love of change in their places of residence, the New-Yorkers are particularly famous. They never regard a house as a kind of inanimate friend—one who has protected them from cold, and rain, and tempest, and by whose hearth they have spent many happy hours, and enjoyed many comforts; but merely as a temporary covering, under whose roof it would be a sin, shame, and a folly to live two years in succession. Accordingly, on the first of May, when people all over the world are enjoying that charming season among fields and flowers, the sagacious citizens of New-York think they have lived quite long enough in one place, and prepare to pitch their tents elsewhere. Those that live up town come down, and those that live down town go up; and amidst disjointed furniture, broken crockery, dust, dirt, and vermin, they hail the genial approach of smiling May. After spending their money, losing their regular dinners, and suffocating themselves for three or four days, they squat down in their new domicile for another twelvemonth.

But it is not only the miseries attending the committal of the act itself, but also the preliminary ones which bespeak its approach, that are to be taken into account. There is a great and crying evil at present existent in this city, entitled, "house hunting," which disturbs the peace of families, and is productive of much scandal and other ill consequences. It appears that on the first day of February the householders notify their several landlords that they have only one more quarter's rent to expect from them, and immediately after such notification, nearly all the tenements of the city are labelled "this house to let," inquire so and so. A stranger would naturally suppose that the plague, the yellow fever, or some tremendous evil was momentarily expected, and that the inhabitants were about to seek safety, en masse, in flight. No such thing; but from that time the proud boast, that "a man's house is his castle," no longer belongs to the citizens of New-York. A Spaniard's doors are not more open to the holy fathers of the inquisition, or a place-hunter's to a man in office, than are his to all the impertinent people who please to demand admittance. They march through his rooms, peep under his bed and into his closets, and not unfrequently surprise him and his family in very equivocal situations; after which, they express a hope that they have not disturbed them, to which they receive a lying answer in the affirmative—beg leave to trouble them "for a glass of cold water"—say they don't think the house will answer—and go about their business; and the only satisfaction the poor people have, is to go unto their neighbour and do likewise. But this is not all. There is a nest of old maids in the city, who, having given up all hopes of ever being obliged to look after a house on their own account, kindly volunteer to do so for their friends, in order to indulge their penchant for inspecting their neighbour's affairs, and discuss the interesting tittle-tattle arising therefrom. Under various pretexts they pop their noses into every hole and corner of pantries, parlours, kitchens, and cupboards, and spy into the barrenness of the house; and all this is noted down in a sort of diary, to be used afterwards at visits and card-parties, as occasion may require. I am slightly in the good graces of the niece of one of these ancient women, who favoured me with a peep at her aunt's land log-book, from which I made the following extracts. For obvious reasons, the names of the people and numbers of the houses are omitted.

February 5.—No.—Greenwich-street. Called at the house of Mrs. D.—. Rooms small—no garrets—wonder where the goodness all the children sleep. Carpets very shabby—remains of a turkey carefully put by in the pantry, and black woman making her dinner off cold mutton. Eldest Miss D. has a new silk pelisse—wonder where the money came from. MEM. The D.'s may be honest enough, but can't imagine how some people make a living!

Same day.—No.—Broadway—looked in upon my dear friend Mrs. W.—the house to let, going to take a larger one. Cut a great dash—hope it may last. Mr. W. is, to be sure, cashier of the — bank, but his salary cannot be much. Some how or other, people in banks never want money. MEM. If Mr. W. should be back in his accounts and commit suicide, which is not unlikely, what would become of poor dear Mrs. W.?

February 17.—No.—Hudson-square. Fine looking house—great deal larger than what I wanted, but went in to see it. Mrs. M. not at home; was shown through the house by Miss M. a poor white-faced creature, with her hair out of curl, who looked as if she had just got up. Recollected meeting a prettyish sort of a girl of that name at Mrs. K.'s party last night. Found out it was the same—should never have known her! Not quite so much colour as she had when dancing last night—suppose she can get more when she wants it. MEM. Good gracious! how the poor men are deceived!

Same day.—Went through the sausage-manufacturer's premises in the Bowery.—MEM. Eat no more sausages, &c. &c. It would be tedious to give more of these precious records; suffice it to say, that there was scarcely a house from the East river to the North, or from the Battery to the regions round about Fourth-street, that had not been inspected by one or more of these scandalous old women, who meet at night and compare notes; and not a single kind remark or charitable supposition was ventured upon by any one of them. They went altogether on Sir Peter Teazle's principle, "that it was a bad world, and the fewer that speak well of it the better."

But this is by no means the only evil to which the citizens subject themselves by this love of change. They are innumerable; and, perhaps, one of the heaviest is the injury done to the periodical literature of the country. A man will subscribe for a paper or magazine, with which he professes himself agreeably entertained and well-satisfied; but if any new adventurer springs up, and promises impossibilities in a flaming prospectus, he straightway relinquishes that which he knows to be good, for the chance of getting something better; and this, in its turn, is thrown aside for fresh experiments. In no country are there so many and such abortive attempts to get up fresh publications, and this, in a great degree, accounts for it. Of the majority it cannot be said, that

"'Tis pity they're short-lived."

They do no good and much harm, for by diverting public patronage into so many channels all are inadequately rewarded, and hence the poor state of the public press generally, compared with other countries. In all sorts of business it is precisely the same. If a man finds that past endeavours are no security for future favours, he naturally relaxes in those endeavours, and will as soon sell a bad article as a good one, when there is an equal chance of his customer returning; thus, the evils which the buyers inflict upon the sellers in the first instance, eventually return upon themselves, and no one gains by those proceedings but those who, under a better state of things, would be neglected entirely.

But what avails talking? What can be expected from the inhabitants, when the "fathers of the city" set them such examples? The people move themselves, but the corporation move the houses. Their committee come and squint along a street, and then say unto a man, "Sir, you must shift your house sixteen feet back!" Shade of Wouter Von Twiller! shift a house! What would a genuine Dutchman think of such a proceeding; or, indeed, any European? A little Frenchman, fresh from Paris, and who thought every thing on earth was to be seen there, lately witnessed a performance of this kind. He was met by a friend soon after, in a high state of excitation. "Oh, mon dieu!" said he, "I have seen what in Paris I navare have seen—navare! I have seen one house taking one leetle walk! Mon dieu!" But the evil may not stop here. In time streets and squares may be found travelling about the city, and it is just possible that a man may be run over by a church. C.

THE TRAVELLER.

SKETCHES OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

MR. GALT.

THE subject of the present sketch is no less distinguished as being one of the first living novelists of the age, than he is for the many eminent qualities that form his private character. To a sound and vigorous understanding is united a kind and benevolent heart, an urbanity of manners, and integrity unimpeachable. It may be supposed, that with these qualities Mr. Galt is justly esteemed by a very large circle of private friends. The writer of this article had occasional opportunities of meeting him in society during his late temporary residence in Canada, and can with much sincerity add his single testimony to the generally received estimation Mr. Galt is held in by his friends and acquaintances.

The appointment of Mr. Galt as one of the commissioners of the "Canada Company" created no small degree of excitement in the provinces to which his labours were to be directed. It was during his visit to the seat of government of Lower Canada, in 1826, that I first saw the celebrated author of Andrew Wylie. A numerous circle, comprising the élite of the city, were assembled to meet him. He was evidently the "lion" of the evening; but no assumption evinced the popular author. He answered any question respecting his works with frankness, and evaded the numerous compliments that were paid him, with a modesty peculiarly the characteristic of true genius.

The personal appearance of Mr. Galt is extremely imposing. A tall athletic frame, with a countenance strongly indicative of the mental energies which mark his character, immediately strike the beholder as belonging to no ordinary individual. A general repose of manner prevents any appearance of singularity in his demeanour, and harmonizes admirably well with the unobtrusive character of the man. But in moments of conviviality and unrestrained social intercourse, he is at once the life and spirit of the company. He is particularly happy in the ebullitions of that broad Scotch humour perceptible in his graphic pictures of his countrymen. I have heard the conversational powers of Mr. Galt spoken of in the highest terms of approbation by those who had frequent opportunities of testing their merits, and all have ceded to him the possession of this talent in an eminent degree. Indeed, an old member of the "Noctes Ambrosiana" of Blackwood's facetious periodical, could not fail in bringing a portion of the spirit which imbues those celebrated orgies into the intercourse of social life. The sting of malicious sarcasm which equally characterizes the "merry meeting" of the witty contributors to "Ebony," Mr. Galt very wisely leaves behind; and it is somewhat difficult to realize the belief in witnessing the suavity and evident kind-heartedness of this distinguished man, that he is one of the oldest contributors to that sarcastic miscellany.

During Mr. Galt's stay in Quebec his active and inquiring mind was ever on the alert; nothing escaped his observation that tended to enlarge the fund of useful information necessary for the important trust he had assumed. The habits and manners of the Canadians were noted with that discriminate tact which characterizes his favourite works, and every circumstance worthy of imitation in their experimental knowledge of the climate was preserved with care, to be acted upon as occasion should require in the new settlements he had the charge of forming.

In pursuance of the express objects of his visit, the principal part of his time was passed during his stay at the capital. He, however, yielded to the request of some personal friends, connected with the garrison, to gratify the public by writing a short dramatic entertainment, which was performed by the officers of the regiments then in garrison, who, in the absence of a regular theatre, are accustomed to beguile the tedium of a Canadian winter, by giving occasional performances in aid of the charitable institutions established in the city. The piece was a jeu d'esprit, written on the spur of the moment, embracing most of the localities of the place, and was received, by a crowded audience, with reiterated peals of laughter; added interest was given to the performance by the personification of a highland chief, bent on a matrimonial speculation with a young American heiress, represented by Dr. Dunlop, another of the shrewd contributors to Blackwood's Magazine, who had accompanied Mr. Galt on his visit, and was reported to have furnished a portion of the whimsicalities which formed the principal merit of this hastily written production. From this essay in dramatic composition, and from a subsequent attempt Mr. Galt made in New-York, it may be inferred that he is not eminently successful in his writings for the stage, and proves the truth of the assertion of his celebrated contemporary, Sir Walter Scott, that "it requires very different qualifications for the making of a good dramatist than is generally possessed by the successful novelist."

The merits of Mr. Galt as a writer are so familiar to the reading public, that any attempt to point out his particular beauties, or laboured criticism on his defects, would be alike superfluous. There are few readers who have not enjoyed the quiet simplicity and subdued humour of the "Annals of the Parish," the "Ayrshire Legatees," and "The Provost," or have not dwelt with delight on the fascinating pages of his entertaining "Sir Andrew Wylie." His "Entail," and "The last of the Lairds," abound, perhaps, in broader strokes of humour than his earlier productions; but it is doubtful whether they have added to the reputation he had before so deservedly acquired. A new work from his prolific pen is now in the course of publication, to be entitled "Lowrie Todd, or the Back Settlers." From the title it may be inferred, that his visits to this continent will furnish matter for the forthcoming tale. He is about entering upon the same arena with the successful author of "The Pioneers." Whether he will come out of the conflict superior to his talented antagonist is, perhaps, a doubtful question. The competition, however, is an honourable one; and it may be supposed that the graphic pen of Galt, aided by his shrewd powers of observation, will not leave him very far behind in this "keen encounter" with the celebrated American novelist. Since Mr. Galt's return to England, a series of letters have appeared in the New Monthly Magazine, dated from New-York, which are attributed to his pen. They contain much interesting matter, and are written in a style of candid and friendly feeling which alike do justice to their supposed author, and to the people and country they describe.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

INVENTION OF THE CHEROKEE ALPHABET.

THE invention of the Cherokee alphabet has excited the astonishment of the philosopher in this country and in Europe; but as I have not as yet seen any satisfactory account of the progress and history of this greatest effort of genius of the present day, I will state what I know of it, from the lips of the inventor himself.

In the winter of 1828, a delegation of the Cherokees visited the city of Washington, in order to make a treaty with the United States, and among them was See-quah-yah, the inventor of the Cherokee alphabet. His English name was George Guess: he was a half-blood; but had never, from his own account, spoken a single word of English up to the time of his invention, nor since. Prompted by my own curiosity, and urged by several literary friends, I applied to See-quah-yah, through the medium of two interpreters, one a half-blood, Captain Rogers, and the other a full-blood chief, whose assumed English name was John Maw, to relate to me, as minutely as possible, the mental operations and all the facts in his discovery. He cheerfully complied with my request, and gave very deliberate and satisfactory answers to every question; and was at the same time careful to know from the interpreters if I distinctly understood his answers. No stoic could have been more grave in his demeanor than was See-quah-yah; he pondered, according to the Indian custom, for a considerable time after each question was put, before he made his reply, and often took a whiff of his calumet, while reflecting on an answer. The details of the examination are too long for the closing paragraph of this lecture; but the substance of it was this: That he, See-quah-yah, was now about sixty-five years old, but could not precisely say; that in early life he was gay and talkative; and, although he never attempted to speak in council but once, yet was often, from the strength of his memory, his easy colloquial powers, and ready command of his vernacular, story-teller of the convivial party. His reputation for talents of every kind gave him some distinction when he was quite young, so long ago as St. Clair's defeat. In this campaign, or some one that soon followed it, a letter was found on the person of a prisoner which was wrongly read by him to the Indians. In some of their deliberations on this subject, the question rose among them, whether this mysterious power of the talking leaf, was the gift of the Great Spirit to the white man, or a discovery of the white man himself? Most of his companions were of the former opinion, while he as strenuously maintained the latter. This frequently became a subject of contemplation with him afterwards, as well as many other things which he knew or heard, that the white man could do; but he never sat down seriously to reflect on the subject, until a swelling on his knee confined him to his cabin, and which at length made him a cripple for life, by shortening the diseased leg. Deprived of the excitements of war, and the pleasures of the chase, in the long nights of his confinement, his mind was again directed to the mystery of the power of speaking by letters. The very name of which, of course, was not to be found in his language. From the cries of wild beasts, from the talents of the mocking-bird, from the voices of his children and his companions, he knew that feelings and passions were conveyed by different sounds, from one intelligent being to another. The thought struck him to try to ascertain all the sounds in the Cherokee language. His own ear was not remarkably discriminating, and he called to his aid the more acute ears of his wife and children. He found great assistance from them. When he thought that he had distinguished all the different sounds in their language, he attempted to use pictorial signs, images of birds and beasts, to convey these sounds to others, or to mark them in his own mind. He soon dropped this method, as difficult or impossible, and tried arbitrary signs, without any regard to appearances, except such as might assist him in recollecting them, and distinguishing them from each other. At first, these signs were very numerous; and when he got so far as to think his invention was nearly accomplished, he had about two hundred characters in his alphabet. By the aid of his daughter, who seemed to enter into the genius of his labours, he reduced them, at last, to eighty-six, the number he now uses. He then set to work to make these characters more comely to the eye, and succeeded. As yet he had not the knowledge of the pen as an instrument, but made his characters on a piece of bark, with a knife or nail. At this time he sent to the Indian agent, or some trader in the nation, for paper and pen. His ink was easily made from some of the bark of the forest trees, whose colouring properties he had previously known; and after seeing the construction of the pen he soon learned to make one; but at first he made it without a slit; this inconvenience was, however, quickly removed by his sagacity. His next difficulty was to make his invention known to his countrymen, for by this time he had become so abstracted from his tribe and their usual pursuits, that he was viewed with an eye of suspicion. His former companions passed his wigwam without entering it, and mentioned his name as one who was practising improper spells, for notoriety or mischievous purposes; and he seems to think that he should have been hardly dealt with, if his docile and unambitious disposition had not been so generally acknowledged by his tribe. At length he summoned some of the most distinguished of his nation, in order to make his communication to them—and after giving them the best explanation of his discovery that he could, stripping it of all supernatural influence, he proceeded to demonstrate to them, in good earnest, that he had made a discovery. His daughter, who was now his only pupil, was ordered to go out of hearing, while he requested his friends to name a word or sentiment which he put down, and then she was called in and read it to them; then the father retired, and the daughter wrote; the Indians were wonder struck, but not entirely satisfied. See-quah-yah then proposed, that the tribe should select several youths from among their brightest young men, that he might communicate the mystery to them. This was at length agreed to, although there was some lurking suspicion of necromancy in the whole business. John Maw, (his Indian name I have forgotten,) a full blood, with several others, were selected for this purpose. The tribe watched the youths for several months with anxiety; and when they offered themselves for examination, the feelings of all were wrought up to the highest pitch. The youths were separated from their master, and from each other, and watched with great care. The uninitiated directed what the master and pupil should write to each other, and these tests were varied in such a manner as not only to destroy their infidelity, but most firmly to fix their faith. The Indians, on this, ordered a great feast, and made See-quah-yah conspicuous at it. How nearly is man alike in every age! Pythagoras did the same on the discovery of an important principle in geometry. See-quah-yah became at once school-master, professor, philosopher, and a chief. His countrymen were proud of his talents, and held him in reverence as one favoured by the Great Spirit. The inventions of early times were shrouded in mystery. See-quah-yah disdained all quackery. He did not stop here, but carried his discoveries to numbers. He of course knew nothing of the Arabic digits, nor of the power of Roman letters in the science. The Cherokees had mental numerals to one hundred, and had words for all numbers up to that; but they had no signs or characters to assist them in enumerating, adding, subtracting, multiplying, or dividing. He reflected upon this until he had created their elementary principle in his mind; but he was at first obliged to make words to express his meaning, and then signs to explain it. By this process he soon had a clear conception of numbers up to a million. His great difficulty was at the threshold, to fix the powers of his signs according to their places. When this was overcome, his next step was in adding up his different numbers in order to put down the fraction of the decimal, and give the whole number to his next place. But when I knew him he had overcome all these difficulties and was quite a ready arithmetician in the fundamental rules. This was the result of my interview, and I can safely say, that I have seldom met a man of more shrewdness than See-quah-yah. He adhered to all the customs of his country, and when his associate chiefs on the mission assumed our costume, he was dressed in all respects like an Indian. See-quah-yah is a man of diversified talents, he passes from metaphysical and philosophical investigation to mechanical occupations, with the greatest ease. The only practical mechanics he was acquainted with, were a few bungling blacksmiths, who could make a rough tomahawk or tinker the lock of a rifle; yet he became a white and silver smith, without any instruction, and made spurs and silver spoons with neatness and skill, to the great admiration of people of the Cherokee nation. See-quah-yah has also a great taste for painting. He mixes his colours with skill. Taking all the art and science of his tribe upon the subject, he added to it many chemical experiments of his own, and some of them were very successful, and would be worth being known to our painters. For his drawings he had no model but what nature furnished, and he often copied them with astonishing faithfulness. His resemblances of the human form, it is true, are coarse, but often spirited and correct; and he gave action, and sometimes grace, to his representations of animals. He had never seen a camel hair pencil, when he made use of the hair of wild animals for his brushes. Some of his productions discover a considerable practical knowledge of perspective; but he could not have formed rules for this. The painters in the early ages were many years coming to a knowledge of this part of their art, and even now they are more successful in the art than perfect in the rules of it. The manners of the American Cadmus are the most easy and his habits those of the most assiduous scholar, and his disposition is more lively than that of any Indian I ever saw. He understood and felt the advantages the white man had long enjoyed, of having the accumulations of every branch of knowledge, from generation to generation, by means of a written language, while the red man could only commit his thoughts to uncertain tradition. He reasoned correctly when he urged this to his friends as the cause why the red man had made so few advances in knowledge in comparison with us; and to remedy this was one of his great aims, and one which he has accomplished beyond that of any other man living, or perhaps any other who ever existed in a rude state of nature.

It perhaps may not be known that the government of the United States had a font of types cast for his alphabet; and that a newspaper, printed partly in the Cherokee language, and partly in the English, has been established at New Echota, and is characterised by decency and good sense; and thus many of the Cherokees are able to read both languages. After putting these remarks to paper, I had the pleasure of seeing the head chief of the Cherokees, who confirmed the statement of See-quah-yah, and added, that he was an Indian of the strictest veracity and sobriety. The western wilderness is not only to blossom like the rose, but there, man has started up, and proved that he has not degenerated since the primitive days of Cecrops, and the romantic ages of wonderful effort and god-like renown.

Knapp's Lectures.

AN UNFORTUNATE SOLDIER.

A short time since, a man named François H. Dennell, whose garb and demeanour denoted that he had led a military life, called on the greffier of the court of assizes at Rouen, to request he would deliver him a copy of the judgment that had sentenced him to ten years imprisonment. Such a demand, expressed in a tone of voice equally free from impudence and humility, excited a degree of surprise, which led the persons present in the room to inquire into the circumstances. The petitioner's answer was in substance as follows:—"I have been twenty years a soldier, and have fought in many battles under the orders of Custine, Dumouriez, Kellerman, Lafayette, Jourdan, Brune, and Napoleon. I was promoted to several grades on various occasions, on the very field of battle; and, on retiring from service, I was allowed a pension of three hundred and ten francs. In 1814 I ran to defend our threatened frontier, but victory had abandoned our colour, and I was compelled to return to my humble roof through an invaded country. My wife and daughter had accompanied me; and one day, having perceived a party of foreign troops, whose sight created within me sensations of intolerable pain, we took a by-road, which led us to a less frequented part of the country. As we met with no inn whither to obtain refreshments, my wife took a five-franc piece, and went to a distant farm to procure some bread. The farmer, mistaking her intentions, cut a very slight morsel of a loaf, and throwing it to her in a disdainful manner, ordered her rudely to depart. My wife attempted an explanation, which was answered only by repeated insults, and a threat to drive her away with a weapon, which the inhospitable host brandished over her head. I heard my wife's shrieks, and hastened to her relief. I reproached the villain for his behaviour, and struck him in the face. The blood issued from his nose. Alas! he was the mayor of the village! I was soon arrested, imprisoned, and condemned. The scar of infamy covered the glorious wounds I had received in the defence of my country. Eight years have I lived in chains. My services, the nature of my crime, the incontestable testimonies of my conduct while in the ranks, had won the interest of my jailers—they petitioned in my favour, and obtained the remission of two years' imprisonment. Since then I have been deprived of my small pension, and am grown old and unable to labour for myself and my wife. Some charitable persons at Abbeville, where I now reside, have advised me to procure a copy of my trial, that they may join it to some documents they intend addressing to the king in my behalf; and I am come on foot, with the help of my wife, to beg you will deliver me the necessary paper, for which I confess I cannot offer you payment." The greffier, moved with the artless narrative, immediately verified the alleged facts, and not only granted the petitioner's claim, but, by begging of the veteran to accept some money, proffered an example, which was immediately followed by all present. A subscription has also been opened at Rouen, which, in all probability, will be productive.

PRIZE POEM.

The committee to whom were referred the several poems and tales presented for the premiums offered in the Craftsman, report: that they have selected "Lexington," as the best poem presented, and therefore entitled to the highest premium. Of the poems selected, the first was chosen for its combined excellencies. It has more beauties than can meet the view of a casual reader. As a work of art, the drapery which floats around it is charmingly graceful, but there are beauties in every line and lineament which can be discerned only on inspection, and which will be more perfectly developed at every new perusal. The oftener the lover of genuine poetry reads this little emanation of genius, the more he will admire it, and the higher will be his gratification.

LEXINGTON.

WRITTEN BY PROSPER M. WESTMORE, ESQ. OF THIS CITY.

"It was a scene of strange and thrilling interest—they stood there, to oppose an authority which they had been taught to fear, if not to venerate. Many were armed but with their weapons—others had caught up in haste the rude weapons of the chase; but there was determination in every look. Well did the auxiliaries meet their assault upon that little band of patriots. Long shall the deeds of that day be remembered. It was the opening scene of a glorious drama."

There was a fearful gathering seen
On that eventful day,
And men were there who never had been
The movers in a fray:
The peaceful and the silent come,
With darkling brows and flashing eyes;
And breasts that knew not glory's flame,
Burned for the patriot-sacrifice!
No pomp of march—no proud array—
No brazen trumpet's sound—
As solemnly they took their way
Unto that conflict round:
Sdly, as if some tie were broken—
But firm, with port erect, austere,
Dark glances passed, and words were spoken,
As men will look and speak in fear;
Yet coursed no coward blood
Where that lone platoon stood,
Ruck-like, but sternly wrought—
A strange unwonted feeling crept
Through every breast—all memories slept,
While passion there a wild kept,
For one common thought—
To live a fettered slave,
Or fill a freeman's grave!
Though many an arm was weaponless,
The clenched fingers grate full well
The stern resolve, the low tones,
That danger could not quell;
Yet some, with hasty hand
The rust-encumbered brand
Dark glances passed, and words were spoken,
As men will look and speak in fear;
Yet coursed no coward blood
Where that lone platoon stood,
Ruck-like, but sternly wrought—
A strange unwonted feeling crept
Through every breast—all memories slept,
While passion there a wild kept,
For one common thought—
To live a fettered slave,
Or fill a freeman's grave!

Proudly, as conspirators come
From a field their arms have won,
With bubble-blast and loud of drum,
The British host came on:
Their banners unfurled, and daily streamers—
Their polished arms in the sun-light gleam—
In;
Frenzied of peril, of colour bright,
With a joyous glee they were idly dancing
Of a bloodless triumph mirth:
The heavy tread of the war-horse prancing,
The blinding gleam of bayonets dancing—
Broke on the ear, and flashed on the eye,
As the columned foe in their strength advanced—
But their war-pieces to the echoing sky!
'Twas a gallant band that marshalled there,
With the dragoon's plume in air;
For England's colours then her pride,
The waving of the Union flag;
Names to heroic deeds allied,
The strong of heart and hard;
They came in their panopied mail,
In the pride of their valour's name;
For music to them were the sounds of the fight—
On the red carnage-field was their altar of Lure:
They came as the ocean-wave comes in its Wrath,
When the storm-spirit frowns on the deep;
They came as the mountain-wind comes on its Path,
When the tempest hath roused it from sleep:
They were not to the rock meets the wave,
And leaves its fury to air;
They were not as the ice should be met by the beave,
With hearts for the conflict, but not for despair!

What power hath stayed that wild career?
Not mercy's voice—nor a thrill of fear—
Tis the dread roar of the doom-laden wave,
Ere it sweeps the bark to its yawning grave—
'Tis the fearful howl of the brooding storm,
Ere the lightning-bolt hath sped;
The shock hath come, and the life-blood warm,
Conceals on the breast of the dead!
The strife—the taunt—the death-cry loud—
Are rising through the sulphurous cloud,
As fully the contest wages;
While hard to land, the meek—the proud—
Are darkly wrayed in the battle-shroud;
'Tis the feast of death where the conflict rages
Wo! for the land thou trumpet o'er,
Death-dealing field of war!
Thy bath-bloods are dyed in gore,
Red havoc drives thy car;
Wo! for the dark and desolate,
Down crashed beneath thy feet—
Thy frowns hath been a withering fate,
To the mourning and the dead!
Wo! for the pleasant cottage-home,
The love-thriving at the door;
Vainly they think for the evil come—
Their cherished ones no more:
Wo! for the broken hearted,
The lone-cave by the hearth;
Wo! for the bliss departed—
The Pleiad gone from earth!

'Twas a day of chance and fate,
For the foe of the taunted land;
And the host that came at noon in state,
Were a broken throng ere the sun's decline;
And many a warrior's heart was cold,
And many a noble spirit crushed—
Where the crimson tide of battle rolled,
And the avenging lessons noted!
Wreaths for the living conqueror—
And glory's need for the vanquished!
No triumph song may their deeds restore,
But the brave names are cherished;
When the summons flew for the patriot-call,
They gave no thought to the glory or the fall,
But pressed to the field as a festival!
They bared them to the adversary,
Nor quailed an eye when the fury broke;
They fought like lions for the hard to die—
For "freedom" was their little cry—
And loud it rang through the conflict smould!
Up with a nation's banners! They fly
With an eagle flight,
To the far blue sky—
'Tis a glorious sight,
As they float abroad in the azure light,
And their fame shall never die!

When nations search their brightest page
For deeds that gladden man,
And shine, the meek-minutes of story—
Britain, with swelling pride shall hear
Of Custer's field, and old Pontones,
And battles of the American
Faint glances, gleam with a kindling eye
To the days of her belted chivalry,
And her gallant frontiers:
Old Scotia, too, with joy shall turn
When she hears the field of Bannockburn,
And Falkirk's field of glory:
Land of the free! Though young in fame,
Earth may not boast a nobler name:
Plato's splendor is in thee—
Lucetta, nor Marathon!
Yet look where lives in glory's line,
The day of Lexington!

RIDING ON HORSEBACK.

In some of the former numbers of this journal, we have taken notice of those species of exercise which are within the reach of almost every class of society—of the poor as well as the rich; we proceed now to the consideration of others, which, as they involve considerable expense, must necessarily be confined, in our cities at least, to individuals in affluent circumstances.

First upon the list, is riding on horseback: one of the most manly, innocent, and useful kinds of exercise of which any one can partake, and by the use of which, the invalid has not unfrequently been surprised into health.

Bishop Burnet, in one of his works, expresses his surprise that the lawyers of his time enjoyed, in general, better health, and were longer lived, than individuals of other professions. Upon consideration, he was led to attribute this entirely to their being obliged to "ride the circuit" almost constantly, in order to attend the various courts held in the different parts of England; and which they were accustomed to do chiefly, if not entirely, upon horseback. It is certainly very reasonable to suppose, that this circumstance may have had a very beneficial influence upon their health, and have aided not a little in prolonging their lives.

It has been supposed by some, that riding is a more salutary exercise, and ought to be preferred to walking. This however, is by no means the case, under ordinary circumstances. Riding occasionally is confessedly a very powerful aid to health; as an ordinary means of exercise, it is, however, inferior to walking—the latter being in general much better adapted to promote an equal distribution of the fluids to the different parts of the body—to impart to the fibres their due degree of elasticity, and in this manner to augment the health and strength of the whole system. In those cases, however, in which a debilitated constitution, or the presence of disease prevents a sufficient amount of exercise from being enjoyed on foot, riding on horseback is to be preferred. As a general rule, it may be said, that walking is best adapted to the preservation of health—riding to the relief of chronic disease. In active diseases neither of them are advisable.

By the dyspeptic, and those predisposed to pulmonary consumption, in particular, riding on horseback is an exercise which should never, if possible, be neglected.

Though we are not prepared to assert with Sydenham, Cullen, and some other physicians, that "horse exercise is an effectual antidote to the consumption," after it has once become seated in the lungs; yet we have seen sufficient to convince us, that when, from predisposition, the disease is to be feared, or the individual already experiences its rapid approach, riding on horseback, persevered in daily for a length of time, in connexion with a well regulated diet and proper clothing, is the best, perhaps the only means by which its attack can be avoided or its further progress completely arrested, and a comfortable existence enjoyed for a series of years.

In riding for exercise, or to preserve health, eight or ten miles a day are sufficient; but for the purpose of restoring health, these little excursions will avail but little. It is not from the fashionable half hours' ride, morning and evening, in which the same ground is travelled over, for the most part, every day, and the surrounding objects cease to interest, from being too frequently presented to the view, that the invalid is to anticipate any decidedly beneficial effects. To produce these, hours must be daily spent on horseback,—the mind must be free from depressing or intense reflections; and in the company of an agreeable and judicious companion, such portions of the country should be visited, in which the novelty or beauty of the scenery is calculated to interest the mind and elevate the spirits. Long journeys have hence, with great propriety, been recommended to invalids. To such as can afford it, a ride at a proper season of the year, to some one of our remote watering places, or springs, presents a very excellent means for recruiting health. Let not the indolent and irresolute object to this latter jaunt, in consequence of the distance, or the roughness of the road over which, in many instances, they would be obliged to travel. These circumstances are to be viewed rather in a favourable than an unfavourable light. We can conceive of but little benefit that would be derived, in the way of exercise, from a journey of any distance, upon a rail road, and in one of the new self-propelling cars.

Against a species of passive exercise, in which many are fond of indulging, we beg leave here to protest—we allude to the practice of lounging on horseback—in other words, moving at a snail's pace over a smooth road, with the external senses but half awake, and the mind in a state approaching to complete apathy. It is true, that the individual who practices this gentle kind of riding, may enjoy the benefit of the fresh air; but as to bodily exercise, he experiences even less than the child does upon his rocking horse, or the rustic in his favourite swing upon the barn-yard gate.

Exercise upon horseback should be taken, during summer, in the cooler portions of the day—in general it is better adapted to clear weather in the more temperate seasons of the year, than to those seasons accompanied by extreme heat or intense cold.

OLD CUSTOM.

There is an old custom in Scotland, never to grant a light of fire to any one out of their houses upon the first day of the new year, an instance of which occurred on that day in Nelson-street, Glasgow. A stucco-manufacturer went from door to door among all his neighbours, but could not obtain the light of a candle.

SINGULAR ESCAPE.

A gentleman belonging to Edinburgh lately ran an imminent risk, not only of being bereaved of his life, but also for a time, at least, of christian burial. He is so singularly hardy in bodily temperament, and so erratic in disposition, that sea-bathing is altogether as pleasing to him in December as it is in June to other people. At the dawn of Saturday morning, while enjoying himself in the cooling waters of the ocean, a considerable way off the pier at Leith, a sportsman fired at his head, under the impression that he was aiming at a seal. The sportsman was seized with inexpressible surprise and alarm, when he saw a man slowly leave the water, and appear on an adjoining rock. When the hardy bather reached the shore, the sportsman made a suitable apology, and, probably for the first time, expressed his unqualification, without regret, that his shot had completely missed. It was, certainly, a narrow escape, as the hail struck the water round the gentleman's ears, and though the sportsman had a double-barrelled gun, he fortunately fired but once.

ADVANCEMENT OF THE WEST.

I spent an evening with a venerable clergyman of Kentucky. He talked of the west with a warmth of emotion, and a comprehensiveness of views, which were the proper result of his zealous devotion to its best interest, and of his long and familiar acquaintance with the details of its history. "Forty-six years ago," he said, "I stood on a hill, in the neighbourhood of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and lifted up my eyes upon this western country. I drew a line from the spot where I stood north to Lake Erie, and south along the range of the Alleghany and Cumberland mountains to the gulf of Mexico. West of this line was almost entirely a waste wilderness. Settlements, it is true, had been commenced in Mississippi, Tennessee, and Kentucky, but they were rising amid tears and blood, and the whole population of the west was then scarcely five hundred. Lexington, now numbering six thousand, and Louisville, which now contains twelve thousand souls, had not begun their existence. Cincinnati, which now numbers twenty-five thousand inhabitants, was then an abode of savages; and Columbus, now the seat of government of Ohio, with more than three thousand inhabitants, was to remain nearly thirty years a dense forest. But what a mighty change has God wrought! And I thank him that I have lived to see it. In forty-six years five hundred inhabitants have been increased to four millions!"

PRECEDENCY.

When Matthews was a young man, he happened to be engaged with a party in Wales. The manager in the midst of the season lost his wife; the house was closed, and the performers, as in duty bound, mustered their sables to pay honour to the deceased partner of their leader. When the procession was about to move, a question as to its order arose. "My dear M." said one of the actors to the manager, "we are a little at a loss here, how we are to go." M. we ought to have premised, was sincerely sorry for the loss of his wife. "My dear friend," wiping his eyes, "thank ye for putting me in mind of these matters—I am really so grieved—I can't attend to anything. How are you to go? Let me see—oh, I suppose two by two—yes, that's it." "Nay, my dear M., that's not it; I mean in what order are we to walk?" "Order, my dear friend—I am so cast down—I don't understand you—pray explain!" "Why, you know there is a certain order to be observed in these cases; now we wish to know which of us are to precede?" "Oh, my dear friend," weeping, "you are so kind to look after these arrangements, I can attend to nothing myself! yes, yes, it is proper to be orderly—let the tragedy people go foremost."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Colonel Henry Rutgers.—Seldom have we been called upon to witness a more general expression of public respect than was paid on Saturday last to the obsequies of this departed patriot and benevolent man. A hundred carriages were insufficient to accommodate the vast concourse of citizens assembled to follow him in his last departure from the home of his fathers. He was indeed the poor man's friend, and long will his charities embalm him in the grateful memory of the numbers who were relieved in distress by his munificent and unstinted bounty. He was pious without ostentation, ardently attached to the cause of freedom and his country, zealous in promoting effectually the interests of every institution calculated to advance the public weal, and a generous patron of science and literature. He enjoyed also the rare felicity of reaching an advanced and honoured old age. May those who succeed to his wealth and worldly advantages, inherit with their blessings, his virtues and benevolence.

Nathaniel H. Carter.—The death of this amiable man and accomplished scholar has left a void in the editorial circle of New-York. Disease had encroached but too successfully on a constitution naturally delicate, and quite worn down by incessant application to literary toil and study. He died at Marseilles, on the second day of January, in the forty-third year of his age; and it is gratifying to learn, that his remains were attended to their last silent resting place by a numerous concourse of English and American friends. Instead of offering any remarks of our own on the merits of the deceased, we shall avail ourselves of the tribute paid to his memory by his successors in the paper which he once so ably and satisfactorily conducted:

"In announcing to the readers of the Herald and Statesman the death of Mr. Carter, we may be permitted to make a few additional remarks. To the early patrons of the Statesman no apology will be necessary for devoting a little space to a notice of the founder and able conductor of that paper. His name derived no fictitious consequence from wealth, office, or family connexions; but his merit gained him a reputation more desirable, and his extensive circle of friends embraced many of the most worthy and distinguished men of the country. By those will his loss be felt, and his memory cherished.

"Mr. Carter was a native of Concord, New-Hampshire. He was educated at Dartmouth college, where he graduated in 1811, standing in the first rank in a class distinguished for numbers and talent. For several years he devoted himself to teaching, in which he was eminently successful and popular. In 1816, while in charge of the academy at Portland, he was elected professor of languages at Dartmouth university, where, however, he remained but a short time, in consequence of the unfortunate dissensions at that time threatening the subversion of the institution. He next engaged in editing the Albany Register, a paper supporting the interests of Mr. Clinton, whose splendid talents had excited his admiration, and whose personal kindness and friendship he ever after enjoyed. In 1822 he removed to this city, and in connexion with the late Mr. Prentiss, instituted the New-York Statesman, the editorial department of which he chiefly conducted till the summer of 1825, when he embarked on a tour through Europe, and was absent nearly two years.

"Mr. Carter's character as a man was most amiable and irreproachable. He was modest and unobtrusive in his manners, affectionate and confiding in his friendships, liberal, benevolent, and charitable towards all, and of the most unblemished integrity and rectitude of purpose. He possessed the genius of a poet, a lively imagination, acute sympathies, and an enthusiastic relish for the beauties and sublimity of nature. His style of writing was chaste, easy, and engaging; and his powers of description equalled by few. His Letters from Europe, though necessarily written in haste, and corrected during the languor of disease, have gained him a high reputation in that branch of literature. Among his poetic effusions, most of which have been published without his name, may be selected many of great beauty, which will not suffer in comparison with the productions of our best poets."

Literary prizes.—The system of offering premiums for well written literary essays in prose and poetry, (which, by-the-by, originated with the editor of this paper) seems to fulfil all the expectations entertained of its power of eliciting the happiest exertions of native talent. The pages of several periodicals bear testimony to this fact, and among others, are those of the Craftsman, an interesting miscellany, edited by E. J. Roberts, at Rochester. The committee appointed to award the premiums to the best productions offered on certain proposed subjects, have announced that Prosper M. Wetmore, of this city, is entitled to the first prize allotted to the poetical department. The successful poem is entitled "Lexington," and will be found in the present number. The second best poetical effusion is from the pen of Cornelius C. Vanarsdale, of New-Brunswick, N. J. The prose articles are both tales; the first "Wakondah," was written by Willis Gaylord, of Otisco, Onondaga county, in this state; the second, "The Abduction," by Henry C. Murphy, of Brooklyn, Long Island. We are pleased to recognise among the successful candidates two of the correspondents of the Mirror.

The piano-forte.—Among the tasteful and fashionable accomplishments of modern females, the art of music holds a conspicuous rank. It has now become a branch of their education, and every one, with the least pretensions to gentility, makes it a part of their juvenile studies. We feel it a duty, therefore, to inform our lady readers that this elegant art is taught on the piano-forte by Mrs. Reid, an English lady, of great taste and science, who has just arrived in this city, and made arrangements to give lessons on very moderate terms. Mrs. R. has studied under the best masters in her native country, and cannot fail of giving perfect satisfaction to her pupils.

Fashionable tour.—The brothers Carvill have in press and will publish in a few weeks, the Fashionable tour, or Traveller's guide. The present edition is to be greatly enlarged and improved, and is designed as a complete manual for travellers visiting the middle and northern states, furnishing not only much interesting geographical and historical matter, tables of distances, general directions, and sketches of natural and artificial objects, but also a description of the various public improvements that have been completed or are in progress. The whole is to be embellished with engravings, and accompanied with a map of the various routes, upon an improved plan.

Generous act.—Some time ago, says the New-England Palladium, when rents were at the highest, a seven years lease was taken of a store, at six hundred dollars a year, which at that time was considered a fair price. At the expiration of one year from the date of the lease, rents had considerably fallen, and the store was not worth what was paid for it. The lessee called upon the proprietor—a possessor of large estates in that city—and suggested to him the fact of the depreciation of the value of the store. He took the subject into consideration, and the next day handed the lease to the occupant, with a receipt of six hundred dollars, being a reduction of one hundred dollars a year for the unexpired term of the lease. Rents continuing to fall, the subject, two years after, was again laid before the owner of the store, and an additional reduction was made of one hundred dollars a year for the remaining four years; making in all the sum of one thousand dollars—thus manifesting a spirit of generosity rarely witnessed in men of affluence, and setting a laudable example to owners of estates similarly circumstanced.

Another tragedy wanted.—Mr. Pelby, of the Philadelphia theatre, offers the sum of five hundred dollars, and a gold medal of the value of one hundred dollars, for an original tragedy, in five acts, to be approved as the best by a committee of literary gentlemen. Manuscripts will be received by him, until the first of next November. The offer is highly liberal, says the National Gazette, but it should have been limited to a tragedy absolutely good. The best presented may be unworthy of the premium.

Morning-gowns.—A modern Alcibiades was asked a few days ago, by a friend who called on him, and who saw seven morning-gowns spread out in his dressing-room, if his tailor had sent them for him to make choice of one. "Oh! no," replied the spark, "they are those which I mean to put on this week."

Mexican manuscripts.—Several Mexican manuscripts, sent some time ago to Europe, and forming part of the celebrated collection of Botturina, have been purchased for the royal library. Amongst the number is the report of the spics sent by Montezuma to the Spanish camp; a third manuscript represents the human sacrifices.

Advance of fortune.—The present lord mayor of London was formerly a journeyman printer. By those gradations in wealth and rank, which industry and honesty always beget, he became proprietor of a newspaper, and hence through all other advances to the highest office in his native city.

Divorces.—The supreme court of Vermont, at its late session in Rutland, granted six divorces. At a previous term in Addison county it granted eight. The united age of one of the divorced couples was one hundred and seventy years.

Mademoiselle Sontag.—This celebrated woman has become the countess of Rosai, and assumed the name.

Madame Garcia.—Bourne has just published a fine lithographic likeness of this distinguished vocalist.

Webster's dictionary.—This work has been put to press in England.

American statesmen.—It was an Irish gentleman, we believe, says the National Gazette, who said, "he wished to die, for the sake of hearing the world speak well of him." Every American statesman must be content to await his final exit, to know that any merit can be allowed, or any justice done to him, by political antagonists.

OH! NOW THE DARK-EYED EVEN.

AN ORIGINAL SONG—FOR THE GUITAR—WRITTEN AND COMPOSED FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MODERATO.

Oh! now the dark-eyed even Weeps o'er its roses pale, And o'er the brow of bea-ven Floats moon-light's sil-ver veil; Such hours, so soft, so lone-ly, Fall on the heart like balm, They seem made for it on-ly, And mus-ings high and calm.

But there's an hour still dearer,
 (When will it smile on me?)

The hour that brings me nearer
 To heaven and to thee;

When will my spirit wander
 In eager search of thine,

Among the lights that yonder
 In endless beauty shine!

VARIETIES.

A DISAPPOINTED BRIDE.—A young gentleman was upon the point of going to church to be united to a lady of considerable fortune, but much older than himself. They met at a friend's house to breakfast, it being a convenient distance from the church. In the course of the refreshment their hostess, fancying her husband had made some blunder in the directions he had given to the servants, rung him such a peal as might have saved the intended bride the expense of employing the church bell-ringers to usher in the happy day. The candidate for matrimony took a friend aside, thus addressing him—"Heavens! is it possible that a woman can rate a husband so?" and immediately disappeared. The carriages being ready, and all things prepared for the cavalcade, every one was uneasy at finding the bridegroom non est inventus. Search was made after him in every direction, but in vain, until the mystery was solved by the arrival of a billet from the next post town, intimating, that he had changed his mind. The bride swooned, the whole house was in an uproar, and the lady of the house resumed her bob-majors, in scolding the servants for letting him go without her knowledge.

THE TOMB OF A VICTIM OF CRITICISM.—Some years ago, an anonymous writer attacked the Dublin stage in a bitter, but witty satire, called "familiar epistles." This was attributed to a certain literary character distinguished in the political world, but, if the effect assigned be true, he has small reason to be satisfied with the cause; it does little credit to his head, and less to his heart. Among the persons attacked was Edwin, the comedian; and, it is said, he never again held up his head. He drooped like a mortally wounded man, and died shortly after. His wife, as a memorial of affection to the melancholy fate of her husband, as well as of vengeance on his supposed murderer, erected a tomb with the following inscription, in St. Werburgh's churchyard, Dublin, where I went to see and copied it:

Here lie the remains of
 Mr. JOHN EDWIN, of the theatre royal, who died
 February twenty-two, 1805, aged thirty-three years.
 His death was occasioned by the acuteness of his sensibility.

Before he was sufficiently known to the public of this city to have his talents properly appreciated,
 he experienced an illiberal and cruel attack on his professional reputation
 FROM AN ANONYMOUS ASSASSIN.
 This circumstance preyed upon his mind to the extinction of life;
 while he was in apparent bodily vigour, he predicted his approaching dissolution.
 The consciousness of a brain reeling with agony, accounts for that prescience, and incontrovertibly establishes the cause of his death.

This stone is inscribed to the memory of an affectionate husband,
 as a tribute of duty and attachment, by her, who, best acquainted with the qualities of his heart, can best record their amiability.

There is not on stone, I believe, such another epitaph as this, in either ancient or modern times, recording the death of a man killed by a literary attack. Horace alludes to the death of Lycambes in consequence of the severity of Archilochus' verses: and in our own days, one of our periodicals is nicknamed the Keats-killer, because it is supposed to have murdered a poor poet with the same weapon; but no person had put it on their tombs, and this, I suppose, is the first monument ever erected to a man murdered by a critic.

A WITTICISM.—A witticism may be worth printing, but not re-printing; the following is so good that we make it an exception to our rule in this particular:—"Your hand annoys me exceedingly," said the prince of La Roche-sur-yon to a talkative person who was sitting near him at dinner, and who was constantly suiting the action to the word. "Indeed, my lord," replied the babbler, "we are so crowded at table, that I do not know where to put my hand." "Put it upon your mouth," said the prince.

BONAPARTE.—During the consulate, Bonaparte, according to Bourrienne, used sometimes to perambulate Paris in disguise, in order to learn the opinion entertained of him by the commonalty; and on one of these occasions he was actually driven out of a shop by an old woman, and he and his secretary were obliged to take to their heels, because the first consul had spoken disrespectfully of himself.

GIPSY WIT.—A short time since, two young ladies near Camberwell were accosted by a gipsy woman, who told them, that for a shilling each she would show them their husbands' faces in a pail of water; which being brought, they exclaimed, "We only see our own faces!"—"Well," said the old woman, "those faces will be your husbands' when you are married."

MEMORY.

ART thou the spell we cling to, thou,
Binding dark fetters o'er the soul,
And stamping on the haughty brow
The death-prints of a fierce control?
Art thou the form we worship, thou,
Spirit of bitterness and fear,
That bid'st the weary numbers flow,
That met my wakening ear?
Thou sad'ning power of memory,
Thou poisoned fount of burning pain,
How have I sought to turn from thee,
And perish, or forget—in vain!
Upon my heart the ties are twined,
The sealing bond is graven there;
I thought to crush it or unwind,
But the lone echo is—despair.
Thou comest a spectre to the heart,
From the deep grave of buried ill,
Nor morning bids the form depart,—
It lingers o'er the darkness still;
It guards the fountain depths of woe,
It speeds the current deep and strong;
Unlit its course, unchecked its flow,
As life is borne its wave along.
Now bind I o'er my heart a chain,
Now breathe a spell upon its tide;—
It will not still the power of pain,
But it will grant—the power to hide!
And must the vision haunt me yet?
I'll shrine it in the heart below;
And if 'tis crime to not forget,
It bears its penance in its woe.

HINDA.

TO DOCTOR ———,

On his requesting the authoress, at a wedding, to write on a broken heart.

"A broken heart!" 'Tis a hacknied theme,
With too little of novelty,
And too much of truth for the poet's dream,
Or the wanderings of memory.
And few would suppose, who had heard thy name,
'Twas a fitting thought for thee,
While pursuing thy proud career of fame,
And thy brilliant destiny.
"A broken heart!" Oh, it is not now
That such visions of sadness should cloud thy brow,
Mid this scene of gaiety;
Where the vows of the lovers have just been plighted,
And the heart and the hand are for ever united.

It is true, that full many a bridal wreath
Has been worn with an aching heart,
As the wild-flower blooms o'er the barren heath,
In its lonely beauty apart;
And full many a nuptial vow has been heard
By those who could never know
How the crushed affections and feelings seared,
Were performing their work of woe.
The blasted hope and the hidden grief,
(For which even thy skill could have no relief,)
A poison sure, though slow,
Which told at length that the heart was broken,
Though in voice or eye was no outward token.

'Tis a beautiful world for the happy, and thou
Who hast seen its most beautiful part,
And art rich in its knowledge, oh, why is it now
Thou shouldst speak of "a broken heart?"
Doth thy fancy roam to the dungeon cell,
Or to poverty's lowly cot;
Or unmask the great, with the wizard spell,
Of deep and familiar thought?
Oh, lift not the veil! there is anguish and pain,
And keen disappointments, a desolate train,
In the high and the envied lot;
And, broken hearts, 'tis in vain we endeavour,
From the bright scenes of life the dark vision to sever.

ESTELLE.

CHANGE.

Change—'tis pencil'd in words of light,
On all that the eye can view;
'Tis stamp'd on the silver brow of night,
On the morning's crest of blue;
On the golden cloud in the sunset west,
On the bow which spans the sea;
There's a change for the worst—and a change for the best
For each and all but me.

There's a voice of change for the huntsman's ear,
'Tis heard in the hound's deep bay;
And the warrior too that voice may hear,
It swells in the trumpet's bray;
There's a song of change in the autumn air,
For the bird of pinion free;
For the forest, the grove, the glen—but where
Is a song of change for me?
A voice of change for the placid deep,
It rings where the tempests roar;
For the widow's dream, for the orphan's sleep,
It chants from the wreck-strewn shore.
The breathing lute and the sounding hall,
The blossom which scents the tree;
There's a change for each, and a change for all,
But where is a change for me?
Give me the meed of the bosom's dread,
To cope with the flashing spear;
To weep alone by the voiceless dead,
To watch by the midnight bier!
Bring me the laugh of reckless mirth,
Though hollow and wild it be;
A dirge to chant o'er a desolate hearth,
So thou bring change to me. HARP OF THE ISLE.

STANZAS.

Oh, bid me seek some trackless sea,
Where winds and waves are roaming free,
With no green isle to bud and bloom,
Like sun-light mid the tempest gloom;
And where no rainbow-hues are flung,
To soothe my lone and beating heart;
But oh! let not my soul be wrung,
To think we must for ever part.

Oh, not for ever! though I go,
Where rise the eternal hills of snow;
Where no rich gleam has ever smiled,
Through the dark forest's untrod wild;
'Twill be with joy, if I can think
That once again thy angel tone
Will, with its magic sweetness, link
My life's dull music to thy own.

Though grief awhile may dim the wreath,
In which the fairest roses breathe,
Yet hope's own star, with smiling ray,
Can fling the gathering dews away.
'Then tell me not that all our love,
Though shrouded now with mist and tears,
Must fade, when sweetly shines above
A ray to gild our future years.

HERMION.

POPULAR TALES.

THE ARABIAN STEED.

BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY.

ADA was the daughter of a powerful rajah, who, in the reign of the emperor Akbar, dwelt in a superb palace on the banks of the Jumna.

The rajah was proud of his beautiful child and loved her, as far as his stern nature was susceptible of such a passion. But the duties of his situation and his warlike pursuits called him frequently from her; and much of the dark-eyed Hindoo's time was spent in dreary solitude amid the gardens of her father's palace.

Beautiful as those gardens were, sparkling with gilded pavilions, the air cooled with silver fountains, and rendered fragrant by the odours of every rare plant, still this perpetual solitude wearied her, the society of her female attendants failed to interest her, and as she reclined beneath the pendant branches of a date tree, she sighed, and felt more like a prisoner in a cage, than a princess in the pleasure-garden of her palace.

She had dismissed her attendants, and lay thoughtfully leaning her head upon her hand, when a rustling amid the branches of an orange tree attracted her attention, and she started to her feet in an instant with an exclamation of alarm and surprise, as she distinctly saw among the clustering leaves and blossoms, the bright eyes and dark glowing features of a man.

The branches hastily parted, and a young Mahomedan rushing forward, knelt before her.

"Who art thou?" she exclaimed. "Mercy, mercy, I am defenceless, spare me!"

"Mercy," replied the Moor, "'tis I must crave mercy of you; I am defenceless, fair lady. I am at your feet, and in your power."

"What brought you here?" she replied. "Know you not the danger?"

"A danger I have braved too often to heed it for an instant now."

"Often! What mean you?"

"Daily at this hour, the hour of your solitary ramble, have I entered these gardens, daily have I lurked behind the shrubs that surround your favourite bower, daily have I gazed on you unseen."

"For what purpose?"

"My purpose! madness—death!"

"Death? to me who never wronged you, who never injured a human being?"

"To you, lady—no, no—not to you—I would not harm you for the world."

"Death to whom then?"

"To myself."

"Why—what brought you here?"

"Accident, or perhaps idle curiosity first brought me here; and I looked on you for the first time; need I say why daily, after I had once beheld you, I came again?"

"Oh, if you are seen," cried Ada, "nothing can save you from my father's rage; you know the barrier, the awful impassable barrier that divides your race from mine—madness, begone!"

The young Moor, whose face and form were such as might have been chosen by a sculptor who wished to represent the perfection of eastern beauty, spoke not, moved not; he continued kneeling before the agitated girl, while his dark brilliant eyes fixed upon her countenance seemed eagerly to read its varying expression, that memory might have a store of sweet thoughts to live upon, when the reality should no longer stand before him.

Ada could not bear the earnest gaze of those fond eyes; where was her anger, her indignation at the intrusion of the stranger?—gone! She called not for her attendants; no, she trembled lest they should come.

"I await my doom," at length muttered the intruder. "I scorn to fly; my dream of secret love is over; my stolen watchings, so dear, though so hopeless, are at an end; you will call your father's guards, and I shall die."

"No, no—you shall not die—not if Ada can save you; I will not call them, no, I dread their coming."

"Then you forgive my boldness?"

"Yes—only begone—save yourself."

"Shall we meet again?"

"Never!"

"Then I will stay and die; better to die here, at your command, in your presence, than to go hence and linger out a life of hopeless love, never beholding you again."

Poor Ada had never been before addressed in love's own language. Her hand had been sought by princes and nobles, who, secure in her father's sanction, had addressed her in terms of admiration, but whose looks and accents were cold and spiritless when compared with the ardour of the youthful lover who knelt before her.

"For my sake, if not for your own, go," she cried.

"Then we may meet again?"

"Yes, only leave me now, you know not half your peril. To-morrow is the annual festival in honour of Vishnu, I shall be there, and will contrive to speak to you—hark!"

She pointed to the orange trees. A footstep was heard at a distance. The Moor grasped her hand, pressed it to his lips, and was lost among the orange blossoms just as the chief officer of the rajah entered the bower to inform Ada that her father desired her presence. She cast one anxious glance around her, breathed more freely when she found that her lover lay unsuspected in his fragrant ambush, and followed by her attendant, returned to the palace. There was no festival in Hindostan so splendid as that celebrated annually in honour of Vishnu in the province over which the rajah governed. The gardens on the banks of the Jumna were splendidly decorated for the occasion, and at noon were filled by crowds of persons, all eager in their various situations either to see or to be seen; to pay due reverence to Vishnu, or to be duly revered.

Kettle drums sounded, golden armour glistened, downy feathers waved in costly turbans; cavaliers bearing silver battle axes rode proudly on their prancing milk-white steeds, and princely ladies were borne in glittering palankeens on the backs of elephants.

Ada was there, pale and sad; her stolen mysterious interview with her unknown lover, was so recent, so unexpected, so unlikely to end happily, that she lay on her rose colour cushions, fanned by her favourite slave, without taking the trouble to draw aside the amber curtains of her litter to look upon the festivities which surrounded her.

Towards evening the gardens were illuminated with thousands of many coloured lamps; she raised herself and looked around her, but glancing hastily over bright vistas and radiant bowers, her eyes rested on a wide spreading tree beneath whose overshadowing branches a comparatively dark space remained. She there saw the form of her unknown lover: he was leaning against the tree, with his eyes fixed upon her; she told her slave with assumed levity that she had vowed to gather a cluster of the blossoms of that tree, alone to gather them, and desiring her to await her return, she hastened beneath the canopy formed by its boughs.

Selim was indeed there.

"Speak not," she earnestly whispered. "I must not stay for an instant, I dare not listen to you—but mark my words, and if you love me obey them. I do not doubt your love, I do not doubt your constancy, but I shall appear to doubt both when you hear my request."

"Speak lady, I will obey you," said the Moor.

"Go," whispered Ada, "buy the swiftest of Arabian steeds, ride him across yon plain three times in every day; in the morning, at noon, and in the evening; and every time you ride him, swim the Jumna on his back."

"Is that all?" said Selim; "it shall be done."

"It is all," replied Ada; "to prove your love you will I know readily do it, but to prove your constancy, or rather to ensure our safety, it must be done three times every day for the space of one year!"

"A year!"

"Yes, and at the expiration of the year, at this festival, on this very day, if neither courage nor constancy have been wanting, meet me again on this spot. I can wait for no reply—bless you, bless you."

Ada, with a few leaves of the tree in her trembling hand, hastened back to her palankeen, and Selim again, alone, gazed from his shadowy hiding-place on the gay festival, in which his eyes beheld one form alone. How brief seems the retrospect of one year of happiness! How sad, how interminable seems the same space of time, in anticipation, when we know that at its close some long looked for bliss will be obtained, some cherished hope realised!

Selim bought a steed, the whitest and the swiftest of the province, and he soon loved it dearly, for it seemed to be a living link connecting him with Ada.

He daily three times traversed the valley, and thrice he forded the deep and foaming river; he saw not his love, he received no token from her; but if his eyes did not deceive him, he occasionally saw a female form on the summit of her father's tower, and a snow-white scarf was sometimes waved as he speeded rapidly through the valley.

To Ada the year passed slowly, anxiously; often did she repent of her injunction to the Moor, when the sky was dark and stormy, and when the torrents from the mountains had rendered the Jumna impetuous and dangerous. Then on her knees on the rajah's tower, she would watch for her lover: dreading at one moment lest fear should make him abandon both her and the enterprise, and then praying that he might indeed forsake both, rather than encounter the terrors of that foaming flood! Soon she saw him speeding from the dark forest; he plunged fearlessly into the river: he buffeted with its waves; he gained the opposite shore; again and again she saw him brave the difficulty, again he conquered it, and again it was to be encountered. At length the annual festival arrived, the gardens were adorned with garlands, and resounded with music and gladness: once more, too, Selim stood beneath the shadow of the wide-spreading tree.

He saw crowds assemble, but he heeded them not; he heard the crash of cymbals and the measured beat of the kettle drums. The rajah passed near him, with his officers and armed attendants, and these were followed by a troop of damsels; then came Ada the rajah's daughter. She was no longer the trembling bashful girl he had seen at the last festival. Proudly and self-possessed she walked the queen of the procession, her form glittering with a kingdom's wealth of diamonds. Selim's heart sunk within him.

"She is changed, she will think no more of me!" he involuntarily exclaimed. But at that moment her dark eye glanced towards his hiding-place.

She spoke to her attendants, and the procession paused as she approached the tree alone, and affected to gather some of its leaves.

"Are you faithful?" said she, in a low tone; "nay—I wrong you by the question; I have seen that you are so; if you have courage, as you have constancy, you are mine, and I am yours—hush—where is your steed?"

Selim held its bridle rein.

"Then in your hands I place my happiness," she added; "these gems shall be our wealth, and your truth my trust—away! away!"

Selim in an instant bore Ada to the back of his Arabian, and ere the rajah and his attendants were aware she had quitted the cavalcade—swift as the wind he bore her from the gardens.

The pursuit was instantaneous, and uttering curses and indignant reproaches, the rajah and a hundred of his armed followers were soon close at the heels of the fugitives.

"Follow! follow!" cried the foremost, "we gain upon them, we will tear her from the grasp of the Mahomedan. They approach the river's bank! and turbulent as it now is, after the storm of yesterday, they will either perish in its waters, or we shall seize them on its brink."

Still they gained upon them; the space between the pursuers and the pursued became smaller and smaller, and the re-capture of Ada seemed certain. When, lo! to the astonishment of those who followed him, Selim's well trained steed plunged into the foaming torrent, battled bravely with its waves, bore his burthen safely through them, and bounding up the opposite bank, continued his flight!

The pursuers stood baffled on the river's bank; their horses having been trained to no such feat as that they had just witnessed, it would have been madness to have plunged amid the eddying whirlpools of the swollen Jumna.

Every tale should have its moral. What then will be said of mine, which records the triumph of a disobedient child in a secret, unauthorised attachment? A temporary triumph which so rarely leads to happiness! For this part of my story I have no apology to offer; but from the little history of Selim and Ada, this small grain of moral inference may be extracted: Ladies will do well to try the integrity and prove the constancy of their lovers ere they marry; and lovers should endure trials and delays with fortitude, and thus prove the unchanging truth of their affection.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

HINTS TO JANUSES.

MAN is a back-biting animal, and yours is a vocation older than free-masonry, if that be as old as Solomon. You need never be at a loss for subjects; they are always at hand, and were they not, if you look within yourselves, you will find some rather ungracious traits that will well apply to all. No man is perfect, nor woman neither, and lest others should forget this fundamental principle of your order, impress this fact upon them unceasingly, for virtue would grow proud were she not reminded of her weakness. Let your commendation be like Mrs. Candour's, so that men would rather suffer your reproach than your praise. Though your assertion is as good as another man's proof, it is well enough to give colouring to what you affirm, and if you can contrive at the same time to mix calumny with ingratitude, it will advance your character for consistency. Therefore, if the friend who took you up a founding in the field, as the countryman brought a similar protege to his winter fire, if this benefactor should have an unlucky pimple on his face, begin your approaches by an acknowledgment of his favours, and your grief to report any thing of him but good, but that you have suspicions of intemperance. If another friend, equally weak, has lent you fifty dollars, which you have kept till gratitude has become a burden, and the lender distasteful, let the rogue endure some of the iniquities his long and inquiring face has inflicted on you. Turn the tables upon him; give out that his affairs are in disorder, and that he withholds from you the same sum that he was fool enough to lend.

But your favourite objects, like Mark Antony's, will be the ladies. They are too pure, and must be reduced by your alloy; and purity would be too happy for your turn of mind, without a little detraction. Besides, in this there is no danger, and none but a brute loves that, though in dealing with men there might be a little peril. But you can wound a female as the fowler lacerates a dove; and as it gives joy to the sportsman to see the bleeding quarry, so will it delight you to see your victim writhe with pain, while she endeavours to conceal the wound. If you are learned, read Shakespeare, and you will find a good model in an excellent fellow called Iachimo.

Lastly, much may be done, in your way, without saying a word—by yielding a ready assent to what is said by others of a similar disposition; for a willing listener to a tale of calumny does as much service to Beelzebub as the narrator himself.

CARRIAGE RIDING.

Riding in a carriage is among those species of passive exercise most ordinarily resorted to for the purposes of health, but from which less advantage is to be anticipated than from almost any other. We, of course, have more immediate reference to what are termed pleasure-carriages, the cushioned seats and well-adjusted springs of which are devised for the very purpose of guarding the muscles of those who occupy them against that exertion with which the preservation of health is so intimately connected. It is greatly to be lamented, that the class of persons by whom this mode of conveyance is commonly resorted to, are those who stand most in need of active exercise.

Were, indeed, the luxury of a family-carriage to be very generally dispensed with in our cities, we are persuaded that it would tend, in some degree, to reduce the annual amount of suffering from dyspepsia, hypochondria, nervousness, and gout.

Resorted to almost constantly by the females of the family, in their out-door excursions, the carriage thus deprives them of the little exercise they would otherwise enjoy, were their tours of shopping, or their visits of duty, ceremony, and friendship, performed on foot. By the head of the family, the carriage is most frequently ordered to the door at that period of life, when increasing wealth enables him to withdraw from the every-day bustle of active business; and when it is all-important, for the preservation of health, that some kind of regular exercise should be resorted to, in the absence of even that which, previously, his avocation forced upon him.

It is true, that a ride of some distance in a vehicle, the motion of which is communicated to the body of the occupant, may have a very excellent effect in the case of those who are too debilitated to partake of a sufficient amount of exercise on foot, or upon horseback. But, under such circumstances, this kind of riding is, in general, the one most carefully avoided.

Riding in a carriage has been supposed by many to be an admirable means for exercising in very cold or rainy weather. The reverse, however, is the fact. Carriages, excepting in the case of the invalid, whom urgent business calls abroad, at a period when all unnecessary exposure is to be guarded against, should never be employed, excepting in clear weather, and at those seasons of the year when one or more of the blinds can be kept open during the ride. In so small a space as the interior of a carriage, especially when occupied by more than one person, the air very quickly becomes contaminated by respiration, and prejudicial to those who continue to inhale it.

For many reasons, a chair or gig, driven by the individual himself, is preferable to a covered carriage. Fresh air, occupation, and a considerable degree of exercise, may be obtained by riding in the former, while all of these, as we have seen, are, in a great measure, precluded in the latter.

During youth, and a state of health, walking, either alone, or alternated with riding on horseback, should invariably supersede the use of a carriage; and even those who are induced to ride, for the prevention of a threatened disease, or for the recovery of health, if their strength is not too much exhausted, will find, on horseback, the object they are in search of, much more certainly than in any of the carriages, to the invention of which convenience or luxury has given rise.

Sleighting, which, in the northern portions of our country, affords during the winter season so attractive an amusement, can scarcely be considered an exercise, in the trifling motion it communicates to the body. As a means, however, of drawing "forth into the bracing air," many who for want of this inducement might, probably, never quit for any length of time the atmosphere of a stove room, it is not unproductive of benefit.

We would, however, admonish all our readers in those states in which sleighting is more frequent than it has been, of late years, in our more southern clime, to be cautious, that, while partaking of this amusement, their feet, as well as the rest of the body, be preserved comfortably warm, by a sufficient covering; otherwise, from the total inaction in which they are necessarily kept, they would be extremely liable to injury from the effects of cold.

ANECDOTE OF A SLEEP WALKER.

During the revolutionary war there was a gentleman of large property residing in Brooklyn, who was addicted to the habit of walking in his sleep; panic struck at the invasion of the enemy, he daily expected that his dwelling would be ransacked and pillaged. Under the influence of these fears he rose one night, and taking a strong box, which, when awake, he never attempted to lift without assistance, he proceeded down stairs, furnished himself with a lantern and spade, and in a deep wooden glen about a quarter of a mile from his house he buried his treasure, carefully replacing the sods so as to create no suspicion of their having been removed. This done, he returned, undressed, and went to bed. Next morning he was the first to discover the absence of the "strong box," without having the slightest remembrance of what had passed. Enraged at its loss, he immediately accused his domestics of the robbery, as no traces of violence were perceptible either on the locks or doors of his house, that could induce him to suspect strangers. Month after month elapsed, and still the mystery was not solved, and his family began to want the necessities of life without the means of procuring them. At that period of public calamity no money could be raised on real estate, and it was at that season of the year when agricultural labours had ceased, which left him no means of earning a support for his family. To augment his misery, his only son lay confined by a violent fever without any of those comforts which his situation demanded. The mind of the despairing father was strongly affected by this melancholy view of the future; his rest became more frequently broken, and he would often wander from room to room all night with hurried and unequal steps, as if pursued by an enemy. His wife and daughter, who were accustomed to these nightly wanderings, never attempted to disturb him, unless they were fearful some accident might befall him; in this case it was necessary to employ the most violent means to awaken him, upon which he would exhibit so much fear and distress, that they usually suffered him to recover gradually from his trance, which was always succeeded by a drowsiness, after which he would sink into a light and natural sleep, which generally continued for several hours.

One night as his daughter was watching at the couch of her sick brother, she heard her father descend the stairs with a quick step, and immediately followed him; she perceived he had dressed himself, and was lighting a lantern at the hearth, after which he unbolted the door and looked out; he then returned to the kitchen, and taking the lantern and spade he left the house. Alarmed at the circumstance, which was not usual, (though it sometimes occurred as above related without the knowledge of his family, she hastily threw on a cloak and followed him to the wood, trembling with apprehensions of—she knew not what, both for herself and for her father.

Having gained the place where he had three months since buried the box, he set down the lantern, so as to reflect strongly upon the spot; he then removed the sods, and striking the spade against its iron cover, he laughed wildly, and exclaimed, my treasure is safe and we shall be happy! And shouldering his heavy burden with the strength of a Hercules, he stopped not as before to replace the sods of the earth, but snatching up his lantern, pursued his way directly home, to the joy of his daughter, who could scarcely support herself from the fears she had experienced, which were that he was about to dig a grave, and either commit suicide, or murder some one of his defenceless family. Inexpressible, therefore, was her joy, on seeing him ascend the stairs and place the box in its former recess; after which, as usual, he retired to rest. His wife and daughter, however, were too anxious to sleep themselves; the one sat impatiently watching the dawn of day, and the other retired to the apartment of her suffering brother, to relieve his mind by the joyful event, and her consequent hope of his immediate recovery.

When the gentleman arose in the morning, his wife observed the same settled gloom on his countenance as he anxiously inquired about the health of his son, and expressed his sorrow at not being able to procure those comforts for his family which were so much needed. Finding him perfectly unconscious of all that had passed, the preceding night, she watched the effect which the restoration of the box would have upon his mind; and (as she expected) with an astonishment almost amounting to phrensy, he exclaimed, "Who has done this? from whence came that box?" Not until he had listened to the evidence of his daughter, could he be convinced of the possibility of his performing such an act while asleep. Suffice it to say, that now health, peace, and competence, were once more restored to his dwelling, and the result of these blessings had a salutary effect upon his mind; and although he still continued his midnight excursions, yet his friends were gratified to find them much less frequent than formerly, and his future dreams also (to judge by his appearance) seemed to partake of the mild, serene character of his waking thoughts.

BURNING OF A LOVE LETTER.

"Sometimes they were put to the proof by what was called the fiery ordeal."—History of England.

No morning ever seem'd so long!—
I tried to read with all my might!
In my left hand "My Landlord's Tales,"
And three-pence ready in my right.
'Twas twelve at last—my heart beat high!—
The postman rattled at the door!—
And just upon her road to church,
I dropt the "Bride of Lammermoor!"
I seized the note—I flew up stairs—
Flung to the door, and lock'd me in—
With panting haste I tore the seal,
And kiss'd the B in Benjamin!
'Twas full of love—to rhyme with dove—
And all that tender sort of thing—
Of sweet and meet, and heart and dart—
But not a word about a ring!
In doubt I cast it in the flame,
And stood to watch the latest spark,
And saw the love all end in smoke,
Without a parson or a clerk!

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

AURORA BOREALIS IN NORWAY.—We were often out at night, says M. Everest, admiring the aurora borealis. It was seldom bright, but its faintness was always beautiful. Sometimes only a small piece of it appeared among the clouds, on a dark and gloomy night, so pure and so pale, that we might have imagined it something like mercy and truth shining on a world of sin. But on the eighteenth of November it shone forth in full glory. There is a kind of light yellow cloud, which is in England known by the name of horse-tails, and is, in truth, an assemblage of long flakes, or tresses, thrown about in all directions. Imagine a number of these, of a pale colour, like moonlight, and irregularly wreathed together, so as to form a band across the heavens, like the arch of a rainbow, with the centre of the arch to the westward of the pole-star. Such it appeared to us when we first came out. The majestic meteor gradually expanded itself, for in spite of a sharp wind against it, it was steadily approaching the zenith, and having gained its point, rested there awhile. The bright canopy was awfully near above our heads, and we were inclosed in its broad effulgent arms. New streaks of light continually kindled as the old ones faded. Sometimes one of the tresses would whirl, us though it were the fold of a dragon's tail; then again it would lose its waved appearance, and showed only a number of straight vertical stripes, like a rain of fire; then a hurried indistinct motion of the shapes of light, which we compared to a mysterious dance of spirits.

WOOD ENGRAVING.—A late number of the Berlin Journal of Arts contains an article on engraving in wood, in which a comparison is instituted between the state of that branch of art in England, and the improvements which have lately been made in it by German artists, particularly by a wood-engraver named Gubitz. It is stated that this artist has overcome every difficulty in the imitation of crayon drawings, and produces from wood coloured prints, the execution of which is perfect.

LIGHT.—The velocity of light is such, that in one second of time, viz., during a single vibration of a common clock pendulum, it would go from London to Edinburgh and back two hundred times, and the distance between these is four hundred miles. This velocity is so surprising, that the philosophic Dr. Hooke, when it was first asserted that light was thus progressive, said he could more easily believe the passage to be instantaneous, even for any distance, than that there should be progressive movement so inconceivably swift. The truth is now put beyond a doubt.

LITERARY NOTICES.

DARNLEY

A CONSIDERABLE time has now elapsed, during which we have not found leisure and inclination to read a novel, and express upon paper an opinion of its merits; this has been partly owing to the pressure of other (if not more important, at least) more necessary avocations, and partly to the giving way of our courage and energies, before the torrent of new books with which our country, in common with many others, is literally deluged. For a time we bore up well against the inundation, and with a most heroic and devoted resolution, read faithfully every thing that was placed before us; but there are limits to human perseverance; and we question much if that most indefatigable of all possible prime ministers, the present premier of England, would not eventually be compelled to yield in a contest like that in which the conscientious editors of this publishing and writing era are bound in duty to engage. In despair, we at last resolved to read no more "upon compulsion;" and our determination has been well adhered to. But still we like a novel, when it is good, and therefore we have read the novel which forms the subject of this article. An English copy, with its clear plain type and spacious margins, was a temptation which, although strong, we might have resisted but for those seducing words, "By the author of Richelieu," which graced the centre of the title-page. The author of Richelieu! a clever man you are, undoubtedly, Mr. James; and this your last, is a very clever novel, although perhaps not altogether equal to its predecessor.

The scene of Darnley is laid in France and England; the time (as its other name, the "Field of the Cloth of Gold," imports) the early part of the reign of bluff King Henry, the principal historical personages are the youthful kings, Henry and Francis, and the Cardinal Wolsey. According to the established formula, the hero of the story is a miracle of courage, gallantry, and honour; and after undergoing sundry "moving accidents by flood and field," arrives at last at the summit of his wishes, and makes his bow to the reader in the last chapter, "as happy a man as you shall see upon a summer's day." Most of the fictitious characters are excellently drawn and well sustained, particularly a certain learned Theban, by name Sir Cæsar, or Cæsar il dotto, who exhibits, in the course of the work, a variety of mysterious accomplishments, which in the sixteenth century were wont to obtain for their possessor the reputation of a sorcerer. The ladies, into whose society we are brought, are generally creations of great beauty, but more especially a Lady Constance de Grey, with whose fair hand the hero is at last rewarded, and a capricious, beautiful young termagant, the Lady Katrine Bulmer, between whose characters a perpetual and interesting contrast is kept up with exceeding skill and exquisite effect.

The main faults of this new work of Mr. James are two; and the same are to be found in Richelieu. The first and greatest is a constant straining after wit, and ludicrous quaintness of expression, which, if successful, would be but a very trifling merit; and being, as it is, a total failure, deserves the title of a blemish.

The other fault arises more, we suspect, from want of practice than from any inherent deficiency of talent; we do not know of any single word in the English tongue by which it can be adequately designated; the French would call it inconsequence; but we, for want of any such convenient appellation, are obliged to give our idea somewhat paraphrastically. The fault of which we speak, then, is dwelling too long upon unimportant matters, which have no influence upon the development of the story. In the novels of Sir Walter Scott a wonderful tact is displayed in this particular; if an individual or a place be described at any length, however little he, she, or it may seem to have to do with the story at the time, it will invariably be found that the place or person becomes important in the end, and that the minuteness of the previous description was necessary for the perfect understanding of the subsequent events. In Darnley, as in Richelieu, the reverse is sometimes found to be the case; pages are bestowed upon mere episodes; amusing or interesting episodes, it is true, but still not sufficiently connected with the story to require or deserve so copious a description.

Despite these faults, however, Darnley is a superior work, and well sustains the reputation its author had acquired by his coup d'essai.

It is now, we understand, in the press, and will be published by the brothers Harper, in the course of the ensuing week.

HYPOCHONDRIA.

O wad some pow'r the gittie gie us,
To see ourselves as others see us !
It wad frae monie a blunder free us,
An' foolish notion ;
What airs in dress an' gait wad lea'e us,
An' e'en devotion !—Burns.

HYPOCHONDRIA is a disorder produced by the disorganization of the nervous system, whereby the patient ceases to view things as they exist, and acquires the property of seeing others that have no existence. His faculties become changed, and he regards chimeras as realities, and realities as chimeras. On all points excepting one, a hypochondriac may be perfectly sane, but on that one he looks upon the rest of the world as fools, and himself as the only person to whom heaven has given light. There are many shades of this disorder, and the ways in which it manifests itself are innumerable. Doctor Johnson gives a very meagre definition of a hypochondriac when he says it is "one affected with melancholy." Now, though in some instances this may be the primary cause, in nine cases out of ten it is the offspring of vanity and ignorance, which, secreting themselves in a man's brain, engender there strange and overweening notions of his own qualities and capabilities; this, in the first stage of the disorder, is termed self-conceit, but which, swelling beyond all imaginable or endurable bounds, becomes at last a confirmed case of mental delusion, and takes the form of medical, legal, religious, political, or literary hypochondria.

One of the peculiarities of this disease is the manner in which those who are affected with it laugh and jeer at all who are in a similar predicament with themselves—the quickness with which they detect their neighbour's infirmities, and the obstinacy with which they shut their eyes to their own. Thus, a well-informed gentleman, who eat, drank, slept, and behaved himself like other people, could never get over the strange belief that he was a barleycorn, and at the mere sight of a barnyard fowl he would fly into his house and lock himself in, for fear of being picked up and transferred to the crop of his enemy the rooster; yet the same gentleman was very much tickled with the story of another hypochondriac, who in walking imagined that he did not possess the power of turning, but must of necessity move on in a direct line, and who had cut himself severely by marching straight through a shop window which unfortunately crossed his way—just as one foolish hypochondriacal author will laugh at another's expectations of immortality, at the same time he does not entertain the shadow of a doubt of its being his own inheritance. I knew a profound scholar, and what is more, a sensible man, but who, nevertheless, insisted that he was cursed with a cast-iron nose. No arguments could convince him of the fallacy of what he considered so self-evident that it might be observed by any one; and when a storm of thunder and lightning occurred, he was to be seen running about in an agony of fear, and using all sorts of precautions to prevent his metal proboscis attracting the electric fluid; after the storm he would regain his composure, and thank heaven for his remarkable deliverance. A friend, to cure him of this fancy, told him of another person who imagined he had a glass nose, and was afraid of going out on a windy day for fear of getting it injured, at which he laughed immoderately, and proceeded to show very plainly that no man ever had, or could by any possibility have a glass nose. The other then began gently to insinuate doubts respecting the existence of any metallic substance on his friend's face, upon which he grew mightily offended, hit his nose a sharp blow, and asked him if he could not hear it was cast-iron by the sound! This would all seem ridiculous enough to a spectator, but how many hundred thousands are there in this world who terrify themselves with evils just as imaginary as cast-metal noses, at the same time that they laugh heartily at the fears of those who entertain apprehensions for their glass ones? but because their numbers are such as to keep each other in countenance, they escape the charge of hypochondria which manifestly attaches to them.

Of all classes of hypochondriacs, the health-preserving are perhaps the most numerous and notorious. These are the people for whom heaven has not been able to make anything fit to eat. Every dish that is set upon the table is, according to their view of things, impregnated with subtle poison. One produces flatulency, another acidity—beef is indigestible, ham is bilious, tea nervous, and so on from the simplest receipt in Dr. Kitchener's cookery to the most complicated effort of Mons. Ude. Whenever they eat they say, "I know it is wrong," and look upon a person who makes a hearty, careless, miscellaneous meal, as one who is not long for this world. All their conversation turns upon their internal concerns, and in company they favour the unfortunate lady or gentleman who sits next them with anecdotes of their stomach and digestive reminiscences for the last three weeks. They are amateurs in physic, and swallow all sorts of abominations with infinite relish; and then they wonder for all the care they take of themselves, that they are no better. Poor wretches! the undertaker eyes them as he walks along, the coffin-maker takes their dimensions in his "mind's eye," and proceeds to make their mahogany resting-places on speculation; the sexton chuckles at their approach, and says he hopes he "sees them well!" the resurrectionist marks them for his own, and the surgeon, surveying their formation with a scientific eye, longs to settle some disputed point in anatomy by means of their unfortunate bodies. Death comes at last and pops the little life out of them that dieting and doctoring has left, and they are troubled with hypochondria no more!

Literary, as well as health-preserving hypochondria, is not unfrequently occasioned by a slight touch of dyspepsia. Young gentlemen with yellow faces and weak digestions, mistake the sickly fancies produced by a diseased state of the humours for the coruscations of genius, and whenever they feel a little unwell, concoct what they call poetry, which is merely a number of hypochondriacal notions strung together, in which they abuse the "unfeeling world," and long for "pleasant death," and the "quiet peaceful grave," at the same time that they are taking their spring physic, and using all necessary precautions to avoid one and keep out of the other as long as possible. They poetize somewhat after this fashion:

My burning brow—my burning brow!—
My burning heart—my mad'ning brain!
Would—would—that ye were quiet now,
And I at rest from all my pain!

The grave—the grave!—how calm they sleep
Who lie where yonder yew-trees wave!
They neither sob, nor cry, nor weep—
Oh give me that—the grave! the grave!

and such like abominable nonsense, which many people call "very pretty," and "very pathetic," and so they come all at once to believe themselves poets, and go on wishing themselves dead, until people of common sense would have no objection if they were taken at their word. One of the most offensive peculiarities of this tribe is, their invariably assuming that physical imbecility and mental strength go together, and vice versa, as if a sound constitution, a cheerful temper, and a vigorous and imaginative mind were incompatible. William Shakespeare, Walter Scott, and Robert Burns were, in their several ways, the three greatest men that ever lived, and at the same time three as healthy, hearty, and merry fellows, as the world has seen, and never wrote a line of regular churchyard poetry in their lives.

Political hypochondriacs are as thick as flies at midsummer, and are more headstrong, absurd, and obstinate, than any of the other classes. No matter how monstrous their dogmas are, the pertinacity with which they cling to them leaves the man with the cast-iron nose far behind. A member of the English parliament got it into his head, and all the other members could not get it out, that the great cause of distress among the poor was the plentifulness of the grain harvests, that starvation was a necessary consequence of over-production, and the more wheat there was grown the less there would be to eat. In this country, certain people advocate a tariff that will increase commerce and support the navy, by doing away with the necessity for ships and sailors; while others believe in a dissolution of society, in consequence of a few men calling themselves masons getting together in a snug room, for the purpose of singing and drinking without fear of interruption. Indeed, there is no notion too improbable to find its way into the head of a political hypochondriac. Many well-meaning individuals firmly believed as soon as General Jackson became president, that men would hang on trees as thick as acorns, that he would fire the city of Washington, destroy the constitution of the United States, put the country under martial law, keep his hand in practice by shooting a dozen or so citizens in a morning before breakfast, and do a number of other improper things for reasons best known to himself; and when they are told that no such thing has happened, they very wisely shake their heads, and say the idea of March are not yet over. There are another set of political hypochondriacs who credit whatever the newspapers tell them, and of course are worse than all the rest put together.

Then there are the religious hypochondriacs, who firmly believe that no one can be in the right excepting themselves—

Some think on Calvin heaven's own spirit fell,
While others deem him instrument of hell.

But this is ticklish ground. In theatricals the cases of hypochondria are innumerable, and generally incurable. I have seen matrons of forty-five years of age and one hundred and fifty pounds weight, who really thought they looked and played the girlish Juliet to perfection, and whom no criticism could convince them to the contrary; and I have seen a little fat fellow of five feet and an inch, who looked upon himself as the beau idéal of Roman grandeur and dignity. I have seen Miss — fancy she could play a fashionable lady, and Mr. — imagine that he looked like a gentleman. I have seen — but cases multiply too fast.

The greatest hypochondriac of modern times, however, is undoubtedly Robert Owen. This very singular individual has taken it into his head, that by means of certain strange doctrines which have the immediate effect of crazing the intellects of those who dabble in them, the world has to be regenerated, and the perfectibility of human nature accomplished. He actually believes that the time is coming when men will not lie, nor women flirt—when banks will not break nor bills be protested—when tailors will keep their words and gentlemen pay their debts—when brokers will be generous and politicians independent—when a man will love his neighbour as himself, and lend him money without interest or security—when Cobbett will be consistent and Lady Morgan unaffected, and other things equally strange and improbable. This is the greatest case of hypochondria on record, either moral or medical. And any man who will believe these things, will believe that the world is growing honester.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

SCHILLER.

AMONG the writers of the concluding part of the last century, there are few more deserving of notice, than Frederick Schiller; the world, no less than Germany, seems already to have dignified him with the reputation of a classic, and to have enrolled him among that select number, whose works belong alike to every nation, and are destined to float down the stream of time, untouched by the flood of oblivion, which soon overtakes the mass of authors, as it does the mass of other men.

In this country there are few readers, who have not dwelt with interest and delight on the pages of his most popular work, "the Robbers;" while to the dramatic amateur, the frequent representations of this early specimen of Schiller's splendid genius, has become as familiar as the "names of his household gods."

The high destiny which this celebrated writer has attained in the world of letters, may render even this meagre sketch interesting; and in hastily tracing the progress of his life, or, in wandering through his intellectual creations, we cannot fail of being deeply impressed with the overwhelming force of superior genius, struggling through the many barriers opposed to its development, until it at length bursts forth free and unconfin'd, to the full perfection of acknowledged excellence.

Schiller was born at Marbach, in 1749. His father had been a surgeon in the Bavarian army; but subsequently settled himself in the service of the duke of Würtemberg, as superintendent of the nurseries and pleasure grounds of that prince. The early culture of Schiller's talents, were obstructed by the confined circumstances of his parents. His mother is represented as being a woman of superior taste and intelligence, considering the sphere in which she moved. To her devoted attachment to poetry may be traced the germ of that passion which Schiller evinced at an early period of his life, and which, at a time when others are only completing their youthful studies, broke forth in the full blaze of maturity in "the Robbers."

He is described in his boyish days, as exhibiting no particular indications of that peculiar and splendid talent which has raised him to the high rank he afterwards attained in the literature of his country. The early occupation of his father, and the consequent itinerant life he led, as a follower of the army, added to the difficulty he found in obtaining even the first rudiments of learning, has been attributed as the cause of this absence of any distinguishing traits of future excellence in his boyhood. Yet still, some few peculiarities have been remembered of this period, which constitute in him what is termed "poetic character." A frank integrity, an appetite for things grand or moving, has been described as discernible amidst all the caprices of his early years. It is said, that once during a tremendous thunder storm, his father missed him from the young group within doors, and after an anxious search, found him at last, in a solitary place in the neighbourhood, perched on the branch of a tree, and watching, with eager delight, the tempestuous sky, and the flashes of lurid lightning; and when chided for his absence, he excused himself by saying, "the lightning was so fine." Such anecdotes, are perhaps of no real value, even if authentic. To the admirers of Schiller, the picture of the boy watching the conflict of the elements, is not without a certain degree of interest.

On the appointment of his father to the situation we have named under the duke of Würtemberg, Schiller was duly admitted to the public school of Ludwigsburg, and commenced a course of education necessary for qualifying him to assume the sacred functions of a priest. Schiller's temper was naturally devout; with a delicacy of feeling which tended towards bashfulness and timidity, there was mingled in him, a fervid impetuosity, which was ever struggling through its concealment. Such a turn of mind easily took the form of religion, impressed upon him as it had early been by the example and instruction of his maternal parent. He looked forward to the sacred profession with alacrity; it was the serious day-dream of his boyhood and much of his youth. His studies were pursued without much interest, being more the result of duty than any fixed inclination or love for the task. He is reported to have enjoyed the representations at the Ludwigsburg theatre, better than the dry theological disquisitions and learned authors he at this time was prescribed to devote his attention to; and in the annual examinations during this period, he was only designated by his superiors as "a boy of good hope."

At the age of fourteen, a circumstance occurred which entirely changed his future destination. The duke of Würtemberg had lately founded a free school for certain branches of education, and had now transferred it from its original destination to Stuttgart. The duke proposed to give the sons of his military officers a preferable claim to the benefit of this institution, and having formed a good opinion of young Schiller, he invited him to profit by the opportunity, which after some conscientious scruples on the part of the father, and objection from Schiller, was accepted. He enrolled himself in 1773, and turned with a heavy heart from freedom and cherished hopes, to grief, and seclusion, and the law.

In this seminary he continued six years. Submitting with no patient disposition to the stiff formality and military drilling which formed the regulation of the school. The study of the law was to him a source of continued annoyance and embarrassment. No predilection was felt for this newly assumed study. The constraints and seclusion he was now subjected to, preyed upon his mind, and produced a habit of constraint and shyness which clung to his character through life.

Meanwhile the youth was attaining manhood, and the fetters of discipline lay heavier on him, his eyes became open to the stirring interests of the world, which seen, only through perspective, appeared more gorgeous in its colours on that account. Poetry, it has been observed, was his favourite study; and from these sources he had drawn vague and imaginary pictures of men and life, and had also imbibed visionary dreams of literary glory, which the solitude and restrictions he endured, only served to cherish and expand. Goethe's Gotz von Berlichingen, had directed his attention particularly to the drama: his mind, full of nameless aspirations, naturally issued in imitation—he plunged with ardour into this new field for his powers—and produced his first tragedy, Como von Medice, fragments of which he retained and inserted in his Robbers. Occasional contributions to the magazines of the day, at this period, also show the new tendency of his thoughts, and faintly discover the destination he was finally to attain.

The difficulties which surrounded his present situation, were felt by Schiller, with feelings of acute and painful sensibility—he saw the obstacles which presented themselves in formidable array, to prevent him from attaining that stand in the literary world his anxious aspirations were so eagerly directed to, he brooded gloomily over the restraints imposed on him, and severely felt the mortifying truth, that he must arrive at some consideration in the real world before he could attain the eminence he aimed at in the ideal.

He had about this time changed his studies for the law to that of medicine—he accepted it only in exchange for a servitude more galling. His mind was bent on higher objects, and the stern necessity of being compelled ultimately to toil for his daily bread, was yielded to with reluctant acquiescence, without destroying the indulged hope that some brighter destiny awaited him.

During the indulgence of these various feelings, he framed his Robbers. He had scarcely attained his nineteenth year, when this work, which will transmit his fame to many generations, was commenced. The circumstances under which it was written, may be traced in all its parts, and forms an era not only in Schiller's history, but in the literature of the world. He finished the original sketch in 1778, but for fear of offence, kept it secret till his medical studies were completed. An anecdote is given of him during this period, which it may not be uninteresting to relate. One of Schiller's teachers surprised him on one occasion reciting a scene of the Robbers to some of his intimate companions. The words death, heaven, eternity and damnation, occurred in the scene. While Schiller was uttering these words, and stamping in desperation up and down the room, the master entered. "For shame," said he, (addressing the young author,) "to get into such a passion, and curse so." The scholars tittered covertly at the worthy master, and Schiller called after him with a bitter smile, "a noodle."

Shortly after completing his medical studies he was appointed surgeon in the Würtemberg army. This advancement enabled him to complete his project of publishing his Robbers; the unbounded popularity of which immediately unlocked the portals of fame he had so ardently aspired to enter, and stamped him at once among the first literary men of the age. Translations of this work soon appeared in almost all the European languages, and were read in all of them with a deep interest. In Germany the enthusiasm which the Robbers excited was extreme, and produced discussions in all ranks, of the most fervid and animating description. The general sentence was loudly in his favour, yet he found detractors as well as praisers, and both equally beyond the limits of moderation.

In the midst of this literary glory, the pure and virtuous mind of Schiller received a severe shock. He was accused of having injured the cause of morality by his work; of having set up a fiery and impetuous model, which the sanguine temperament of inexperienced youth would readily imitate, rather than follow in those safe and beaten tracks which caution and prudence offered for their pursuits. It was even stated that a practical exemplification of the pernicious tendency of his work occurred shortly after the publication. A young German nobleman, infatuated with the character of Moor, had thrown away the fair prospects he was born to, and betaking himself to the forests, after copying this fictitious hero through a series of wild and profligate adventures, at length finished his career by a disgraceful death. This story has been denied by the advocates of Schiller. The German nobleman proves to have been a debauché, whose riotous extravagance had reduced to want; who took to the highway with a tainted character and a blackened reputation, which needed no further incentive to urge him to the commission of crime, than what arose from his degraded situation and his impoverished purse. The charge of immorality was not the only anathema that Schiller had now to contend with. The elevated sentiments of liberty, contained in the Robbers, arrested the attention of "the powers that be," and the author was denounced to the duke of Würtemberg as being too dangerous a person to be retained in the service of that august personage. Schiller was summoned to appear before his highness, and it proved, that not only were the moral and political errors of the work condemned, but it was found deficient in literary merit. This last defect the duke condescendingly offered to improve by proffering his own services for the task. Schiller declined the proposal, and the interview terminated in the duke's commanding the young author to abide by his medical subjects; or, at least, beware of writing poetry without submitting it to his inspection.

Mortifications of every description that could be invented by the malice of his superiors, now awaited him; the most scrupulous fidelity and the exercise of superior skill in his profession, could not exempt him from their attacks. At this period circumstances brought him into acquaintance with the director of the theatre at Mannheim, and under his countenance the Robbers was re-modeled, and brought upon the stage. With the natural eagerness of an author he ventured to quit his station, and went incognito to Mannheim to witness the first representation of this tragedy. This dereliction from duty was discovered and punished by a week's imprisonment; the offence was repeated, and stricter measures of coercion were inflicted. During a festivity in the garrison, he contrived to elude the vigilance of his jailers, and bade adieu for ever to the restraints which had so long oppressed him. Fearful of remaining near his enemies, he passed into Franconia, where for some time he lived under the assumed name of Schmidt. The manager of the theatre at Mannheim supplied his wants, and other friends gradually sprang up to open the future to him with more pleasing prospects.

In this retirement he produced the "Conspiracy of Fiesco," and "Court intriguing and love," which, by their original and striking character, supported the popularity his first production had excited. His friend, the manager, shortly after the publication of the last named piece, obtained him the appointment of poet to the theatre at Mannheim, and he was shortly afterwards elected a member of the German society, at the same place. Those honourable testimonials of esteem, united him closer with men of kindred pursuits and tempers, and effectually quieted any apprehensions from the government of Stuttgart. He was acknowledged a subject of the Elector Palatinate, and had nothing further to fear from the duke of Würtemberg.

Our limits will not allow us to follow him through the various changes of situation and place he afterwards experienced; through all of which he sustained the high reputation he so suddenly attained. He died at Weimar in 1805. H.*

COMMUNICATIONS.

A CHAPTER FROM A MANUSCRIPT WORK.

Begin, begin; the mystic spell prepare.—Milton.

Look to my house:

There is some ill a brewing towards my rest.—Shaks.

It was a fine evening, in the latter part of July, 1784, and the beautiful and picturesque scenery of our Hellespont* was gilded by the last rays of the setting sun. The broad sheet of water was dimpled by a thousand eddies, which constantly whirled back a portion of the gliding wave, whose rising current continued to increase in rapidity as the mid-tide approached. This singular spot is the scene of enchanting variety. At the moment when the ebb or flow is complete, its slumbering water presents a smooth and glassy surface, intersected by rugged shelving rocks and verdant islands; and at times it reflects beautifully the rich and changing tints of the sky; not a breath of air disturbs the foliage of the trees, which stoop from its banks; whole companies of humming insects are on the wing, and venture far and fearlessly from their sedgy home. The white sail is spread, but no courteous breeze attends it; the colours (then newly stamped with stripes and stars) droop to the centre, and no sound is heard but of song and idle glee, and the careless dipping of the oar, to which the boatmen resort with little industry, well deeming that with the tide will come the favouring breeze. Then commences the change, with a low hollow murmuring of the current; this sound, indistinct at first, gradually increases into a noise, hoarse and deep, like to the roaring of a cataract, particularly at half flood, when the pot,† on the one hand, in violent agitation, extends its boiling waves to the very centre of the tide. On the other side, off the foot of Barn island, lies the hog's-back, a lofty ridge, over which the water falls in a sheet of foam, and with a thundering sound; yet, towards this the practised helmsman steers, to make safe his passage from the more dangerous whirlpool. I knew of one, who, in the darkness of a cloudy night, with over-caution, wore his little bark too far above the rock; it passed over, diving, like a duck amid the stream, in which, for a second, he sat fearfully engulfed; yet, heaven-directed, it brought him up again in safety.

I have witnessed others who, too timid to face the grisly ridge sufficiently long, were drawn into the vortex of the pot, and their frail vessel was filled and sunk, or was cast with violence to the shore.

Added to these phenomena, the numberless and stupendous masses of rock, which have stood for ages the strength of the current, and the shocks of the raging element, particularly the mill-rock, Hancock's, the flood-rock, and the middle reef, whose dark sides rise like leviathans amid the boiling waters, greatly increase the sublimity of the scenery.

The moon had risen high in the heavens, on the beautiful evening before-mentioned, when a small skiff, with two persons in it, shot into the little cove, on the north side of the mill-rock. Having thrown their anchor-rope across a ledge, to secure their boat, the two men hastily moved, in Indian file, to the further extremity of the rock, the surface of which is about an acre. Here Rob and Sambo had erected a fishing-hut, and some of their implements could be discerned hanging against the wall, by the moon-beams that shone through the crevices and open door of their badly constructed little shed.

"We are here before them," said the foremost of the two men, who had just landed, as he returned from reconnoitring the interior of the hut.

"Dat likely enoup, massa," replied the other, "for when Rob and Sambo promise, no knowing when dey perform—dey deal wid de debble—and pity—but he was neber honest, massa, but always broke he word when too late to seek anoder's—go home, dear massa, don't trust the debble or his impes—dey are all bad alike."

"Foolish boy!" cried Arthur, "are you afraid of demons? if so, take to the boat and begone—the gang will be here presently—they will see me safe home. I have nothing to fear from men who have shared my kindness so frequently as they have. So, go your ways, Trial."

"No—Trial no stir a foot, massa."

"I will compel thee, then, boy. Go, or I will strike thee with my paddle, else."

"Ah, massa, my oar longer den your paddle; but Trial no leabe you now, if he die for it—but see, see! dey hab been here already! Here's Sambo's foot, massa; neber was dare such a big foot in all creation afore!"

"Well, if it be so," replied Arthur, "we may as well take to our boat again. We will follow and overtake them at the north side of Barn-island; for thus it was agreed between us, in case I did not find them here."

"Oh, massa! but dat Little Hell-gate is a scarish place at night. I no like him at best o' times—and den, half-tide over, he foams and he bellows like some mad bull—you may hear him now above all de rest."

"Have you no confidence in your master's prudence and long experience in the navigation of these waters, Trial?"

"At anoder time, massa, I'd no fear a rush; but when bad men are abroad on ebil work, and when dem creech-owl cry so in dat dark wood, massa, steering too near against, I tink it bode no good to white man nor nigger."

"Slender foundation for your fears, my good Trial," said Arthur, kindly; "but pull a quick and steady oar, my man, and we will soon leave behind us this patch of wood, and its noisy but harmless tenants."

"He no harmless, massa; he big rogue as Rob or Sambo, who fetch away our lame chicken last week! You know it was one night-walker or t'oder."

"Poor bird," sighed Arthur; "but slacken your right oar, Trial, and pull briskly with your left, so as to bring the skiff snugly round."

They had reached Little Hell-gate, and, beneath the bright moon, all the wildness of the place was visible; broken ledges of rock, which appeared to extend through the centre of the current, and others which ranged with the shore on either side, were covered and white with foam from the turbulence of the waves amid them.

In a narrow space, apparently no broader than their little bark, the tide flowed smoothly, but with alarming swiftness, as if it were hastening, with quiet dread, from the scene of tumult and danger; on this the little skiff kept its rapid course, directed by the skilful hand of Arthur, who sat with his eye steadily fixed on a certain mark, while the quick dipping of the oars was scarcely perceptible in the undimpled race of waters.

"That was handsomely effected, Trial, my man," cried Arthur, as his servant brought the little bark neatly round, and laid it alongside of a flat rock, under the shadow of a luxuriant willow, that grew on the bank of the island, whose long sweeping branches swung gracefully to the light breeze, and, at intervals, wooed the fleeting waves.

"Here our little vessel may lie unobserved, for scarcely the eye of the moon beholds it," said Arthur, as he stepped from the boat.

"De moon a man, massa? I always tought he had been a green cheese; he so round, he no shape like a man."

"No, you foolish boy, nor does it always wear its present appearance; it is constantly changing; at times it is but half that size."

"Well, massa, I know dat too; but den I tought it was a cut cheese."

"Some other time, Snow-ball, I'll explain it to you."

"Oh, I tink you, massa; but if you beat him into me as you did dat catechise, I no care what he be; I roder not know, for he ony make my brain topsy-turvy."

"Be silent, Trial, and as soon as you have fastened the boat, follow me," and Arthur ascended the bank.

"Stop, stop, massa! me no stay here ahind you for all Kidd's money!"

So saying, poor Trial trod so quickly in his master's steps as to merit several severe rebukes. They had walked about fifty yards when they came to a small valley, or rather a hollow; here they found the mulattoes, Rob and Sambo, waiting for them.

Rob, the moment he saw Arthur, came towards him with a slow and measured step, bearing in his hand a hazle-wand; and, raising his hat, he said,

"As ever, true to your word, my master?"

"Surely so, Rob," replied Arthur; "are all things in readiness to commence the work?"

"All," was the answer.

Sambo was seated on a rock, with his head between his knees, muttering a sort of unintelligible jargon.

"Look, massa, look!" cried Trial angrily; "dat conjure man 'bout no good!—he call a name in vain. I hear him say debble; and wise man tell you, ony talk o' him and he appear. Massa, better come away."

"Be silent, Trial, I command you to be silent. And now, Rob, let thy art discover the hidden treasure which but for thee might remain for ever in the bowels of the earth, and be of use to no one. One man sows and another reaps. So it is even now; but the harvest must be gathered, and why not we as well as another? So let us to work."

Sambo rose, and placed in Trial's reluctant hand a spade, and taking another in his, was prepared to follow; at the same time observing the strictest silence, notwithstanding the thousand questions of his lagging companion.

Rob, with his wand carefully poised on his fingers, led the way, with the solemn step and air of a thorough adept in the art; while the aged Arthur, evincing an entire respect for his deep proficiency, cautiously followed, his unerring eye sharply fixed on the secret talisman.

"We are near the treasure," said Rob, suddenly pausing.

"So indicates this rod;" and he waved it three times in the air, each time repeating an incantation, to strengthen the charm. The wand, obedient to the power of attraction, at length, like the mind of man, bowed low to the alluring metal, to the complete gratification of Arthur, and the joy of the mulattoes, who fell to work with the greatest industry, throwing up the earth with their spades, chattering the while, and making their calculations respecting the quantity of wealth they were about to disintomb. Even poor Trial stood looking on, in the pleasing expectation of beholding those promises verified which hitherto he had so often reprobated as abominably false and wicked; while the good Arthur, completely duped by their arts, stood, with folded arms, and the air of one who had realized his best expectations.

"Listen, master!" cried Sambo, raising his head exultingly, "here is a box or chest beneath my spade."

"Strike again," cried Arthur, as he inclined his ear over the hole. "There, I heard the sound distinctly;" he added, "set your spade once more, Sambo.—oh! 'tis there! 'tis there! to all intents and purposes!" and clapping his hands, he bade them raise the treasure; which they had scarcely attempted, when flashes of fire and sulphurous smoke were seen to arise from the ground within, blackening the whole air above them, and choking them almost to suffocation.

The face of the moon, but a moment before unclouded, was now invisible; all around them was dark, save when lighted by unnatural flashes, which ceased not to burst from different parts of the earth, attended by rumbling sounds like those of an earthquake.

The blacks threw themselves on their faces, and remained in a state of great agitation for a time. Arthur alone stood undaunted; and, after five minutes had elapsed, all again became quiet; the dense fog of smoke and flame had dispersed, and the moon shone forth in all her splendour.

"Thank heaven!" said Arthur, "the difficulty is over; arise, Rob and Sambo, and recommence your labours."

"We work again, my master, when the devil has shown how angry he is! Did you not see his blue lantern rising like a flaming sword?"

"I do not fear him nor his works," said Arthur resolutely. "There is but one that I fear, and he is above all, and over all! We will make one more trial for the money; should that fail, I will pursue it no further."

The mulattoes reluctantly raised their spades, and striking them suddenly into the earth, the same sound was returned which had before convinced Arthur of the presence of the valuable treasure he had risked so much good money to acquire.

They at length attempted to pry up the box, when a flame, preceded by a strong sulphurous smell, warned them to hasten from the pit, which they did, dragging Arthur with them to some distance.

In a moment a tremendous explosion took place within the pit, and a shower of small stones and fragments of earth and sticks came down upon their heads. Whole volumes of black smoke again filled the air; and, to add to their alarm, a dreadful bellowing was heard, and immediately after the demon himself appeared among them, like a walking bull, with hide and horns, and his tail switching around on every side, in the most alarming manner.

Arthur, for an instant, was really disturbed; but, as the enemy approached too near him, he collected his fortitude, and boldly bade the wicked one get behind him. At this the demon vanished.

"He demands more gold!" said Rob, "before he will yield us this; but such an immense treasure as lies here, is worth spending an estate for."

"I shall give no more," replied Arthur, calmly yet firmly; and, as if he had made oath to the same, they understood his final purpose, and moved off, vexed and disappointed.

Arthur turned towards Trial, who still lay extended along the earth, convulsed with terror; and, not until his master repeatedly assured him that all was safe, could he be persuaded to look up. Large drops of sweat stood upon his face like dew, and his eyes seemed starting from their sockets.

"Arise, be of good cheer, my poor snow-ball," cried Arthur, endeavouring to comfort him; "they are all gone, and I will never hold council with them more."

"Dat make me berry grad, massa; berry grad, indeed, massa;" and Trial sprung upon his feet, and followed to the boat, which still lay snugly moored beneath the sheltering willow.

Safely seated in their little bark, Arthur, well wrapped in his cloak, gave himself up to meditation, while Trial plied the oar, and whistled at intervals an old continental air.

The night was pretty far advanced when they reached their habitation, and over-fatigued, each retired to his rest.

Arthur had slept tranquilly for about an hour, when a strange noise in the chimney of his apartment awakened him, and rising on his elbow he distinguished, by the flickering of his taper, the huge demon he had seen on the island, standing in the broad fire-place; his eyes glaring strangely through enormous eye-let holes, and his horns and tail much discomposed and out of place, owing to his intricate descent through the chimney.

"In the name of heaven, why came you here?" demanded Arthur.

"I come to demand my right," returned the demon. "'Tis your gold that I want!"

"In the name in which I questioned, I now bid you depart in peace," cried Arthur, as he slipped from his bed, and snatching an old rusty sabre, that hung near the chimney; and, finding that the fiend vanished not at the sound of the sacred name, on the contrary, that he stood his ground, determined to possess himself of the gold he came for, the old warrior darted a pass at his mercenary enemy; at the same time warning him to leap from the window, if he wished to preserve his forfeited existence. The devil wisely took the hint, and, with one spring, reached the casement, preferring to risk the dangerous leap rather than encounter the vengeance of old Arthur, who, as the monster flew from the window, caught fast hold of its tail, which had before appeared so formidable, and thereby retained in his grasp the entire disguise, which proved to be nothing more than an old ox's hide and horns!

"What a dupe I have been!" exclaimed Arthur, as he threw the skin into a corner of the room, which he paced three times around in his customary circle, and then stretched himself upon his bed to slumber in quiet till the early dawn of the morning.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

SINCE the pleasant days of Paul Pry, there has not been a more amusing piece imported than the new three-act farce of Snakes in the Grass, now in the full tide of popularity at the Park. It is a dramatic version of one of Theodore Hook's clever Sayings and Doings, and the situations, the exits, and the entrances, are managed with much skill and effect; one of the best proofs of this is, that it would be impossible to curtail the piece in the smallest degree, without injuring it. There is no feeble and unnecessary dialogue or fatiguing explanations, and the whole affair goes off as glibly as the author, actors, or audience could desire. To be sure there is but little humour and less wit visible throughout, and Snakes in the Grass is rather an ingenious specimen of how ludicrous and amusing a drama may be made with a scarcely perceptible admixture of either one or the other. The charm of the piece is the manner in which the foibles and weaknesses of mankind are hit off; and this of itself is sufficient to insure success, for there is nothing so gratifying to an audience as to see their own petty vanities and failings exposed to ridicule in the persons of others. In this the author has been completely successful. Every character is a portrait, and has its counterpart in all the cities, towns, or villages in christendom. We have all seen just such people as Mr. and Mrs. Janus, Mr. and Mrs. Skinner, and Mr. and Mrs. Walton. The servant Fact, who inflexibly adheres to truth in all situations, is the only character who seems a stranger to the spectators; all the rest are old acquaintances. The plot is simple. The scene of action is a small town in England, and at the commencement all is compliments and congratulations on account of the approaching nuptials of Mr. Francis Skinner and Miss Cecilia Walton. The heads of these two respectable houses, the Skinners and the Waltons, it appears have been the Montagues and Capulets of the district, on account of a contested lawsuit about a meadow, but have waived their claims at the intercession of their children, the village Romeo and Juliet. At this period, Mr. and Mrs. Janus (the two snakes in the grass) arrive, and, under pretence of peace-making, manage to set the whole dramatic personæ by the ears. The children break off the match—the fathers recommence the lawsuit, and the mothers scold, with infinite spirit and astounding volubility. A Captain Agitate also arrives for the express purpose of easing his conscience, and conferring a benefit on society, by terminating the mortal career of Mr. Janus, that gentleman having slandered the gallant captain, and broke off the match between him and the sprightly widow Bloomly. Janus, however, compliments him out of his intentions, and then manages to make matters still worse; and in the meantime himself makes improper advances to Mrs. Bloomly. A succession of most laughable scenes ensue, arising out of the quarrels and misunderstandings of the parents and lovers; at last, Janus is surprised by his wife at the feet of the widow, and exposed, the several parties reconciled, the lovers united, and the lawsuit ended. We have seldom seen a piece better acted throughout; indeed, there was nothing that any reasonable person could find fault with. Mr. Simpson, as the agitated Agitate, Mrs. Hilson, as the sprightly widow, Mrs. Hackett and Mrs. Wallack were all agreeable and entertaining; but Hilson and Mrs. Wheatley, as Mr. and Mrs. Janus, were more than that—they were excellent. These two parts will rank amongst the best performances of these valuable comedians. In conclusion, we can safely say, that all who desire a hearty laugh may have it by going to see Snakes in the Grass. C.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Horticultural Society.—We are always pleased to see professional men engaged in advancing the interests of general science. Their opportunities are more numerous, their facilities greater, and their inducements stronger to enter into the investigation of subjects connected with the improvement of the arts, and the promotion of that knowledge which is indispensable to the comforts and luxuries of civilized life. Horticulture is at once an elegant and a useful pursuit. It ministers to the nice taste of the scholar, to the refined delicacy of the epicurean, and to the artificial, but necessary support of the cultivator of the soil. The ardent devotion evinced of late years in the prosecution of this branch of animated economy in the city of New-York, may be regarded as an indubitable sign of our progressive advancement in the career of polished study. As an evidence of the advantages to be derived from the attention paid to this art, we may cite the beneficial results of the impulse given to the cultivation of forest trees in England by the publication of Evelyn's Flora. "The patriotic feelings of the English," says the eloquent discourse of Dr. Francis, which is now before us, "have induced that people to consider Evelyn as one of the most efficient founders of their navy." In New-York, the establishment of the society, before which Dr. Francis delivered his address, has already been attended by the happiest effects. The aspect of our markets has been much improved, the labours of our horticulturists have been better rewarded, and a taste for gardening has been diffused throughout the city by the personal example of the members of the horticultural society, which promises to be productive of the most delightful results. Dr. Francis has taken a rapid, but interesting survey of the history of gardening, and brought it down to our time and country, and accompanied it with some very pertinent reflections and suggestions. In the prosecution of his task he has evinced no inconsiderable research, giving proof of his zeal in promoting the success of the objects which he has so ably advocated.

New Papers.—We have of late received several dozen first numbers of new publications, undertaken in indifferent parts of the country, and should be happy to allow to each of them such passing notice as their own merit or laudable spirit amply require. But they multiply so rapidly on our desk, and a great portion of them afford so insufficient a specimen of their latent ability in a single number, that it were injustice to their editors, as well as injurious to our own candour, to speak in terms that would be gratifying to both parties. We regret the inability the more, because several of them, like their more aged contemporaries, have indulged in liberal and high-toned expressions of praise of our own labours, for which we feel exceedingly grateful. It is to be feared that the too rapid increase of papers is calculated to prove destructive of the general benefit which might accrue from a more limited, but requisite supply. Jealousy or envy can scarcely be suspected to influence our opinion on this subject. The price too, of many of the new publications is so exceedingly low, that the prediction of their certain ruin would be only confirmed by the increased extent of their subscription lists.

Oratorio at St. Paul's.—That unobtrusive body of musical amateurs, designated the "New-York Sacred Music Society," gave their fourth annual oratorio at St. Paul's church, on the twenty-fifth ultimo, and in our opinion, as well as that of more competent judges, acquitted themselves in a style which would have reflected credit on societies of loftier pretensions. There are few, indeed, who combine so much merit and modesty as this, and perhaps if there were a little less of the latter, the former would be more generally known. As Sir Toby says, "this is no world to hide virtues in." The average merit of the present oratorio was fully equal to any of the preceding ones. True, Horn and Mrs. Austin were missing this year; and that lady's splendid execution of "Let the bright Seraphim," with Norton's chaste and spirit-stirring accompaniments on the trumpet were still fresh in the memories of many of the audience; yet the instrumental performers were more numerous and effective, and the choristers better disciplined, and in more complete subjection to the wand of the correct and skilful "timist," Dyer, than on any former occasion. The opening chorus, "We praise thee, O God," by Handel, was very finely given, particularly the passage, "All the earth doth worship thee, the Father everlasting." Though we have always been accustomed to hear, and prefer a manly tenor in that noble opening of the Messiah—"Comfort ye, my people," yet Miss E. Gillingham's execution of it, considering the difficulties she had necessarily to encounter, was highly creditable. Her sister, Miss L. Gillingham, had a more suitable selection allotted her from Jephtha—"Ye sacred priests," and succeeded admirably in portraying the melancholy tenderness and solemn regret of the leader of the hosts of Israel's daughter, when taking a last farewell of the haunts of her childhood before the sacrifice. There were twice or thrice we thought some slight additions thrown in by the fair vocalist, but they were so judiciously and delicately interwoven with the whole, as not to mar that faultless piece of sacred composition. The duet of Winter, by the two sisters, did not afford so much gratification. It is a different and tamer style of music, and not exactly suited to their voices. It was amply compensated, however, by the recitative and air from the Creation of Hadyr by Miss L. Gillingham. There are many persons who connect the idea of sacred music with the formidable nasal psalmody still so much in vogue towards the eastward; such persons ought to have been present while this was sung, and their bristling prejudices would have been at once and for ever overthrown. Nay, could one of the genuine Plymouth puritans have been resuscitated, and placed within the church, even with the horrible prospect of an organ and other profane and carnal wind and scraping instruments before him, his soul must have been touched by the superlative beauty of the music, and the manner in which it was sung. Hadyr had less sublimity and less pathos than Handel, but he had perhaps more variety and fancy and higher imaginative powers. The most finished and delightful effort of the evening, however, was undoubtedly the recitative and air of "Sweet bird," by Miss E. Gillingham. It was in truth "most musical, most melancholy," and we are glad it was the last solo; any other after it must have sounded harsh and grating. Mr. U. C. Hill the leader of the orchestra, did himself infinite credit by his accompaniments on the violin. The only drawbacks on the pleasure of the performance, were the Trio—"Disdainful of Danger," and the Duett, "The Lord is a man of war;" these if not positively bad, were at least comparatively so. There has been much said of the increase of musical taste in this city; it looked rather suspicious, however, in the present instance, to observe the gathering together of garments and manifest eagerness to depart, before the conclusion of the final grand Hallelujah chorus. People without music in their souls may counterfeited an exuberance of admiration at a single song or overture, but their physiognomies invariably betray them before the end of an oratorio.

Engraving on wood.—We have lately seen some specimens of this elegant art. They are the productions of Mr. A. I. Mason, an artist who has lately arrived in this city from London, bringing with him unquestionable and flattering testimonials of his practical skill and scientific acquirements from Brougham, the venerable Northcote, Chrystie the secretary to the mechanics' institute, &c. Mr. Mason's specimens are highly finished, and have repeatedly elicited complimentary resolutions of thanks from the institutions for whose benefit his ingenuity and talents have been successfully exerted. Among these is the society for the diffusion of useful knowledge, for several of whose invaluable treatises he furnished the appropriate and deservedly praised wood-cuts. He delivered lectures on the history of his favourite art, which were well spoken of, and which, it is presumed, will be repeated here.

Peizotto's Gregory.—Dr. Peizotto, of this city, has lately issued a new edition of the highly esteemed text work of Dr. George Gregory of London, on the practice of physic. It comes recommended to the public by the important facts that it is a faithful and accurate transcript from the original copy. It is accompanied by a correct version of the celebrated propositions of Broussais, the eminent physician who has given a new tone and character to the medical profession in France. To these are added original and compiled notes by the editor, the result of his own personal experience and research.

The late Mr. Carter.—We learn from the Boston Galaxy, that one of the latest emanations from the pen of Mr. Carter was a tragedy, which he presented as a competitor for the prize offered last year by Mr. Forrest. The poetry of this drama is spoken of by sensible men as exceedingly chaste and beautiful. Mr. Forrest will probably produce it on the stage at his earliest leisure.

The Dowager Countess of Glengall.—A delightful clever creature she is. I remember her, says a correspondent of the Monthly Magazine, in my boyhood; the most brilliant and fearless dasher of her circle; handsome as a houri, gay as a lark, light as gossamer, and fantastic as a French marquise. I have seen her in the course of a day drive a currier and four for one wager, and horsewhip a posse of aid-de-camps for another, put a mob to flight, and throw a review into disorder; out-look, out-talk, out-smile, and out-shine every belle at the castle in the evening; break down the master of the ceremonies in a waltz; extinguish the official wit of the secretary at supper; send the chancellor home with every lamp double in his eyes; and finish the night by playing queen at a masquerade till eight in the morning.

A new name for a marriage license.—A few weeks ago, a Mr. L. who was about "committing matrimony" with the daughter of a respectable farmer, near Uttoxeter, waited upon the curate of the parish and requested him to let him have some "sticking plaster." The reverend gentleman was at first disposed to be indignant, but on ascertaining the meaning of the facetious bachelor, he supplied him with the article he inquired after, in the shape of a marriage license, and laughed heartily at the joke.

Origin of Sirloin.—The sirloin of beef is said to owe its name to King Charles the second, who dining upon a loin of beef, and being particularly pleased with it, asked the name of the joint. On being told, he said, "For its merit then I will knight it, and henceforth it shall be called Sir-Loin."

Mozart's sister.—The sister of Mozart died at Salzburg a few days ago. She was eighty years of age, and is said to have died in indigence. She was considered to possess great musical knowledge.

Benjamin West.—It is said that the first effort of this celebrated artist was the painting of the bull's head, in Strawberry-alley, Philadelphia.

THE TYROLESE SONG OF FREEDOM.

ALLEGRETTO MA NON TROPPO.

Gay, gay is the heart that with li-ber-ty glow-ing, Can range o'er the moun-tains so fear-less and free; With no o-ther bound save the wide spread-ing sea, Or the rocks from whose sum-mits wild tor-rents are flow-ing. Gay, gay is the heart that with li-ber-ty glow-ing, Can range o'er the moun-tains so fear-less and free.

Ad Lib. tr. A Tempo.

SECOND VERSE.

March cheerily on, the foeman repelling,
No choice now remains to the noble and brave,
But a vict'ry to-day or a glorious grave,
Then forward, each thought of submission dispelling.
Gay, gay is the heart, &c.

THIRD VERSE.

Hark! hark, mid our highlands the trumpet is sounding,
The patriot's bosom its war-note will cheer,
And summon to glory each bold mountaineer,
Then on like the rose o'er the wild heather bounding.
Gay, gay is the heart, &c.

VARIETIES.

PENS.—An English paper states, in an article headed good news for authors, the arrival of one million three hundred thousand goose quills, by the ship Ann, from Riga. We may be allowed, in answer to this, to mention some bad news to quill merchants—namely, the fact that the consumption of quills is daily diminishing, owing to steel pens coming into general use, as their superior durability, fineness, and elasticity, render them preferable instruments wherever much and expeditious writing is required—namely, in mercantile counting-houses, government and law offices, and the like. The circumstance of steel pens never requiring repair, alone renders them more eligible than goose or even swan quills. Their cheapness also recommends them. But the saving of time which they effect ought especially to endear them to literary men, the smallest particle of whose time is too valuable to be lost in the mechanical drudgery of mending pens, in the pursuit of which they not only lose their time, but most frequently also their patience, and, in consequence thereof, the thread of their most valuable ideas! The late Sir Joseph Banks (no mean authority) used, for the last twenty years of his life, none but steel pens; and even the devil himself—a name so much abhorred by ears polite—at least the devil in Lewis's novel of "The Monk," is represented as registering the recruits of the infernal regions with an iron pen. In all the shops in London the sale of iron pens or steel pens has lately much increased, and that of those perishable, expensive, good-for-nothing articles, goose and swan quills, diminished accordingly.

POLYTECHNIC SCHOOL AT PARIS.—The French papers contain a notice of the recent examinations into this establishment, which has long been celebrated for the useful nature of its course, and the ability of most of its professors.

Its object is not classical but scientific instruction; in particular, civil and military engineering. Being a finishing academy, and involving an expense to government, there is great competition for admission into it; the number of candidates this season was four hundred and sixty-four, of whom only one hundred and five could be received. The candidates have seldom been more numerous; in the year 1812, they amounted to four hundred and seventy-seven; but the sway of France being, at that time, much more extensive, examinations for admission took place in very distant parts, viz. in Holland, Switzerland, and Italy; for the rule is not to confine the examinations to Paris. The provincial towns of France are visited by inspectors or members of the university of Paris, who examine candidates on the spot, and register, according to prescribed rules, their respective degrees of proficiency in mathematics, drawing, and other requisite branches.

STANDARD OF THE JANISSARIES.—Odd as it may seem, a soup-kettle is the standard of the janissaries, an emblem rather more appropriate for a court of aldermen. Dr. Walsh says that he saw in the streets of Constantinople, an extraordinary greasy-looking fellow, dressed in a leathern jacket, covered over with ornaments of tin, bearing in his hand a lash of several thongs; he was followed by two men, also fantastically dressed, supporting a pole on their shoulders, from which hung a large copper kettle. They walked through the main streets, with an air of great authority, and all the people hastily got out of the way. This he found, on inquiry, was the soup-kettle of a corps of janissaries, and always held in high respect; indeed, so characteristic of this body is their soup, that their colonel is called tchorbadge, or the distributor of soup. Their kettle, therefore, is in fact their standard, and whenever this is brought forward, it is the signal of some desperate enterprise, and in a short time twenty thousand men have been known to rally round their old insignia of war. Apropos, have they not something to do with kettle-drums?

FORENSIC WIT—SCARLETT'S LAST.—Brougham, who is not very attentive to the decorations of his outward man, (and would have driven poor Beau Brummel stark mad, had he been condemned to pass the long vacation with him,) entered the court the other morning, with his wig most whimsically awry, and "in most admired disorder;" so much so, that even on the bench "mirth was at odds with gravity," and a general titter was heard. At last Brougham addressed a young barrister, behind him, with "What's the matter, H—n, eh? Why this titter? What the deuce is it that relaxes the rigid muscles on the judgment-seat?" "Your wig, sir," cried the smirking junior. "My wig! my wig!" cried the man not longed for the rolls and couldn't get 'em, and turning to the attorney-general, "Eh, Scarlett, do you see any thing ridiculous in my wig?" "Humph—no," said Scarlett, "I see nothing ridiculous in it—except the head."

CURE FOR DRINKING SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.—Take two ounces of the flour of consideration. Dissolve it in a pint of the spirit of self-denial; then add one quart of the juice of resolution to it. Shake it well together—then put it into the golden bowl—if the golden bowl (memory) be not broken—then sweeten it with the sugar of high reputation. A dram of these bitters may be taken as often as the appetite craves strong drink. A larger portion of juice may be added, if necessary; and if one bowl-full should not perfect a cure, it must be filled up again with the same kind. The longer one takes these bitters, the less bitter will they taste.

THE STUDENT'S JOYS.

It is, in thought, with reverend bards to thread
The fields of classic lore, fair Tempé's vale,
Where bright Penæus through the muses' bowers
Rolls his immortal tide—to climb the steep
Where springs Castalia's song-inspiring fount,
Or hushed within Attalian groves to list
The voice of Plato or the Stagirite.
It is to fathom nature's hidden depths;
To search the primal principles of things,
At darkness looking with a lightning power
Which brooks no barrier to its piercing glance.
It is to fly from sloth's torpedo-touch,
And purblind ignorance that prisons up
The deep and latent energies of man,
And with a high and holy reverence seek
Kind nature's teachings at her inmost shrine;
Explore her boundless amplitude of means,
Her countless laboratories where are wrought
The untold wonders of her passing skill.
It is the cause from its effect to trace,
Untired by slow analyses of things,
And link when found the ever kindred pair.
It is to strike the lyre with cunning hand,
And sweetly from its willing chords awake
Melodious numbers, such as gently soothed
The troubled spirit of Judea's king,
When o'er his harp bent Jesse's royal son;
And singing on, untrapt, unbribed of fame,
With kindred charms stern virtue's ear arrest,
Till pleased she owns the unpolluted strain,
And to all time the living echo gives.
It is to have with free yet chastened taste,
Companionship with beauty, and behold
Her emanations in all visible things,
By art or nature fabricricked in their skill—
The pencil's or the chisel's pride, the dome,
The pillared palace, and the city's pomp,
The soft and stilly depths of summer skies,
Where sleep the island clouds in their blue sea,
The undulations of the emerald hills,
The lift of mountains and the bend of waves,
And, fairer still than all, the eloquent form
Of woman in her purity and prime.
It is with Shakespeare or with Locke to plunge
Into the deep unfathomable of mind—
To force the bars of mystery that guard
The unbounded scope of thought, and then to stand
Sublime as on some empyrean height,
And o'er the soul's proud panorama gaze,
With fancies thronged, and glorious images
Of high imaginations and conceits
That crowd the wondrous vision's amplest range.
It is in humble confidence to bend
Before the living oracles of God,
And, girding up the spirit for deep thought,
Seek their vast import and obedience learn,
And then with child-like artlessness receive
Their mystery and miracle of love.
These are the joys the student seeks, and these
His glad reward. What though the vulgar mock
His generous toils and mien contemplative,
And shun his walks where oft he musing strays
To talk with nature or his own rich soul?
He hears or heeds them not; but on he sweeps,
On and still upward, like the eagle sweeps,
Darting his eye undazzled toward the blaze
Of truth's all glorious, all pervading sun! PROTEUS.

SONG.

Farewell—lovely scenes of my earliest pleasures,
Where life was a morning unclouded and bright;
My memory shall hoard you among her best treasures,
And charm my sad soul with your glorious light.
How calmly in valleys your shadows are sleeping,
Where gaily my young feet so often have pressed,
How solemnly now your tall willows are weeping
O'er the blue swelling waves in golden beams dressed.
The breezes of evening their last breath are sighing,
As day's fading glory yet gleams on the sky,
And the lone bird of night already is flying
With shrill voice to welcome the darkness so nigh.
When over the dark waste our swift bark is gliding,
And the yellow moon shines on the trembling foam;
While lonely at midnight her pathway I'm gliding,
I'll send forth a song of my own native home.
Farewell—cherished things, I depart, though in sorrow,
I leave you to slumber unfeeling for me;
To music and gladness will wake you the morrow—
To foaming of waters shall my waking be. LABA.

STANZAS.

Me nec tam patiens Lacedæmon,
Nec tam Larissæ percussit campus opimæ,
Quam domus Alibonæ reynantis
Et præcepe Anio, et Tiburni lucus, et uda Mobilibus pomaria rivis.—Hor. Car. lib. 1. 7.

Mid the waves of the west there's an island of green,
Her sons are undaunted, her daughters are fair;
'Tis the land where the steps of my boyhood have been,
And oft in my dream-hours I think I am there.
I climb the wild headland that stoops o'er the wave,
To see the white sweep of its avalanche burst,
Or to gather the flowers, for I fancied they gave
The most delicate fragrance which danger had nursed.
I follow the silver of waters that shone
In the musical stream that directed my track,
Till the sun from the brow of the mountain had gone,
And the finger of evening beckoned me back.
Or I sit for one holiday hour mid the hearts
That mingled as fondly as brother with brother,
And robbed the full quiver of wit of its darts,
And wreathed them with flowers to fling at each other.
But the sun through the casement breaks in on my dream,
And the gems of remembrance that shone in my mind
Pass away—pass away like the dew on the beam,
But unlike them they leave not their freshness behind.
And a languor comes down on my heart when I view
Those pyramid-mountains where freedom hath thrown
Her proud recollections, nor fading nor few,
For they seem not as sacred or proud as my own.
And the water that glideth beneath is as calm
As the sacred Cashmirian valleys may be,
And the breezes that fan it are laden with balm
As those of the isle in the Indian sea.
And of birds there's a numerous choir on each bough,
And blossoms are budding on many a tree;
Yet I cannot imagine the why or the how,
But they speak not the magic of nature to me.
I'm a stranger to all metaphysical lore,
And cannot detect the strong feelings that rise,
And tempest-like hurry me onward before
Their breath to my own native valleys and skies.
But be it my pleasure to think on the scene
Where my heart and my thoughts were as light as the air,
And the friends whom I loved in that island of green,
May I still, e'en in fancy, revisit them there. ALPHA.

ORIGINAL TALES.

RAMON, THE ROVER OF CUBA.

MR. MORRIS—Having read in a newspaper, not long since, a notice of a book called "Ramon, the Rover of Cuba," I immediately went to a bookstore and bought a copy of it, feeling a more than ordinary interest in its contents, inasmuch as the hero of the narrative (who, by the way, is as famous in Cuba as Paul Jones is here,) was an old acquaintance of my own. If you and your readers will have a little patience while I tell the story in my own way, you shall hear all about it.

I was passenger in the schooner John, Captain Marks, of Rhode Island, from Matanzas bound to Charleston, in the winter of 1825. The schooner was loaded with molasses; and there was also a quantity of fruit on board, which, to tell the truth, was my own adventure. The oranges were in barrels on deck; the plantains and bananas stowed in bulk directly under the main hatch, where there was a break in the tier of molasses hogsheds; and the pine apples were hung up in bunches in the cabin. A nicer lot of fruit was never shipped from Cuba, and if we had arrived in Charleston in four days, as the captain calculated, I should have made a pretty speck of it. But that is from the subject. I was going to tell you about Don Ramon.

Captain Marks was a clever man. I had been a passenger with him before. He was rather tallish and slimmish, that is, not very stout. He used to wear a lightish coloured pea-jacket, and a drab felt hat, and had a stoop forward in his gait. He was a powerful strong man. When three or four lubberly sailors were pulling away without being able to start the top-gallant-yard, I have seen him lay hold of the rope above their hands, and jerk the yard up with perfect ease.

The schooner John was a long-legged craft, sparred out of all reason, so that in a fresh breeze it was apt to be damp walking on deck. I never rode out a gale of wind in her; but Captain Marks told me, that in a stiff northeaster "she beat all natur for cutting dirt." I have no reason to doubt it.

When we had left Punto Mayo six hours, with a light breeze from the southward, it being then about ten o'clock in the morning, we saw a sail in shore on our weather-bow, standing to the eastward. We took no particular notice. Half an hour afterwards, she appeared to have slackened sail and we were gaining on her. Captain Marks took the glass and made her out, as he said, to be "an infernal long-sided, black, saucy-looking son of a gun of a schooner, with raking masts and powerful heavy spars."

In five minutes after he had concluded his description of her, she was bearing down upon us under a press of sail. Here was a pretty piece of business. Being chased by a pirate was what the captain had not calculated upon. We had a couple of six pounders and a few muskets and sabres; but what were these against a well armed rover, which no doubt the enemy was?

But, for all that, Captain Marks was as cool as a peach. He ordered every rag of canvass set, for running away; and all the arms in order for fighting. Then, says he to me, "Mr. Smith, you had better go below and make your will, for I calculate that is a pirate, and if a fresh breeze don't spring up, she will be alongside of us in two hours."

I told Captain Marks I was much obliged to him for his advice, but I had rather stay on deck and see the upshot of the matter. However, a fresh breeze did spring up, and the John gained upon her fast for three hours and a half, when it fell a dead calm. The sea was as smooth as a mill-pond. The pirates got out their sweeps, sent their boats a-head with towlines, and were coming up with us very rapidly.

"Captain Marks," said the mate, "what shall we do? It's of no use to fight."

"Mister Mudge," replied the captain, "we will fight. It's of no use to surrender."

"We shall all be shot if we fight," said the mate.

"We shall all have our throats cut, if we strike," said the captain.

"Then I guess we may as well fight," said the mate.

"I calculate we may," said the captain. "Are those guns primed, Mister Mudge?" said the captain.

"Yes sir," replied the mate.

"Put a handful of spikes and some musket balls into each of them. I don't think it's of any use to mince the matter," said the captain.

"I guess you mean to mince the pirates," replied the mate, as he was stuffing the langridge into the six pounders.

At this moment I observed a wreath of smoke issuing from the bow part of the pirate, and instantly a cannon ball struck one of my barrels on our quarter deck, near where we were standing, and made a very liberal distribution of the oranges among us.

"He bites before he barks," said the mate.

"I guess there will be some loss on that there fruit, Mr. Smith," said the captain.

"Schooner ahoy!" growled a voice through a speaking trumpet from the enemy.

"He first fires and then hails, that is like knocking a man down, and telling him to stand. I wonder where the fellow learnt his manners," said the captain, and then putting his own speaking trumpet to his mouth, growled back upon his adversary, "Halloo!"

"Strike your colours and send your boat on board," said the pirate.

"Not as you knows on," replied Captain Marks.

The boats which had been a-head of the pirate towing, now slackened their towlines and pulled alongside their own vessel, which was nearing us fast enough with four sweeps. Our sails hung flapping against the masts, and the schooner was rolling considerably. The people who seemed to have made up their minds to sell their lives as Yankees do other commodities, for the most they would fetch, were all intent upon their preparations for the fight. Each man wore his sabre, and all were provided with muskets except those who were to manage the guns. I stood near the officers on the quarter deck, and, entering into the spirit of the occasion, had brought up my double-barreled gun, and a sword which my grandfather, John Smith, wore at the taking of Cape Breton.

The pirate was soon broadside to, within pistol shot. Their sweeps were hauled in, and four guns were now fired upon us in quick succession. Two of the balls passed over us without damage; one struck the water before it reached us, and the other passed into our vessel's side and made a considerable splashing and sputtering below.

"Captain Marks," said I, "I rather calculate there will be some loss on that there molasses."

"I expect there will be some leakage, Mr. Smith," said the captain. "Tom Jenkins," continued he, "let them have a little of that there mixture on their quarter-deck."

Tom Jenkins was a regular old salt. He had served on board the Constitution last war, and knew how to take advantage of a roll in taking aim with a six pounder. He let off one of our guns so cleverly, that its miscellaneous contents caused a great deal of dancing and hard swearing on the pirate's deck. "Give him the other!" said the captain, and the second gun was fired with equal success.

So far the battle was in our favour; but a breeze springing up from the southward, and the pirate being in that direction, he bore down upon us and grappled. We flew to our vessel's side to repel them from boarding, but the horrid war cry of "Ramon y victoria!" rang in our ears. The pirates, headed by their renowned leader, poured in multitudes upon our deck.

I saw Ramon himself when he first gave the order for boarding. He was standing on his own quarter-deck, with his hat off, in his short jacket and trousers. He was taller than the rest of the officers, and seemed to look scornfully down upon them. When the second shot from us took effect among his men, he became perfectly furious. He swung his sword over his head, and pointing towards us, ordered them, in a voice of thunder, to grapple and board. While they neared us, he arranged the boarders, and placing himself at their head, was the first to step on our deck. As he did so, I took deliberate aim at his head with my fowling-piece, and let off both barrels at him; but the roll of the vessel saved the scoundrel.

Captain Marks, having discharged his piece, flew at him with a handspike, which he had providently laid on the companion-way. A dozen of the pirates threw themselves between the commanders, and three of them were prostrated by a single sweep of the handspike. Before he could raise it again, Captain Marks, was pierced with many wounds from their long knives, and fell upon the deck. This was the last I saw of the action; for, a moment afterwards, I received a heavy blow on my head, and fell senseless.

When I came to my senses, I found myself lying in a comfortable berth, the curtains of which being closed, I could not see what cabin I was in; although the light that came through the small opening of the curtains was sufficient to apprise me that the berth was not my own. I felt stiff and sore, and my head ached severely. I was neither able nor willing to move, and I lay for some time listening to the rush of the waters, as the vessel glided through the waves with an easy motion. Gradually I recovered a distinct recollection of the fight, and all its horrible circumstances; at last, I came to the comfortable conclusion that I was lodged in the pirate's cabin, and reserved for some new exhibition of cruelty and malice.

I managed to turn myself on my side towards the light, and carefully reaching out my hand, I raised the curtain, without any noise, so as to gain a peep into the cabin. It was handsomely furnished, the paneling of mahogany, and the curtains of crimson silk. A brilliant lamp hung suspended from above, over a splendid centre-table, on which were disposed a pair of silver-mounted pistols, a richly chased sword, and several books and charts. One of these last was spread out before the only person whom I observed in the cabin, and whom I instantly recognised as the Rover. I remember his looks, as if it were but yesterday. He was seated at the table, supporting his forehead with his left hand, and diligently examining the chart. His features were regular and very handsome; his eyes large, black, and full of fire; his hair long and clustering over his shoulders. He wore a blue jacket of fine broadcloth, and white vest and trousers, with a girdle-belt of morocco, in which were stuck a brace of pistols and a dirk.

When he had been poring over the chart ten or fifteen minutes, a boy entered the cabin with a dessert of sweetmeats and fruit, and a bottle of red wine, placed upon a silver salver; and soon after a man came below, whom I afterwards found to be the sailing-master. He was a coarse, malignant, sanguinary villain; and his character was written in his features. I never saw such a diabolical face; it was dark, swarthy, half covered with mustachios, and bore an ugly scar over the left eye. He had an eye like a black snake; his very smile was grim enough, but his frown beggars all description. He sat down to the dessert with his commander, and they entered into conversation; but as it was in the Spanish language, I was not able to make out much of it. Ramon drank of the wine sparingly, the other freely.

While they were finishing their dessert with a cup of coffee, some one of the crew put his head down the companion-way, and in the English language announced a sail ahead. I shuddered, and threw myself back again in the berth, while the pirate officers hurried upon deck.

For half an hour afterwards I heard only the rushing of the waters by the wooden walls of the cabin, with now and then a hoarse word of command from some one on the quarter-deck; then the growling voice through the speaking-trumpet, "Ship ahoy!" I could not hear the answer, nor could I understand the hailings which the pirate afterwards made.

When the dialogue through the speaking-trumpets was over, an order was issued to the men, and from the bustle which followed I concluded that they were clearing the decks for action. Directly the Rover came below, and began to prepare himself for the active scene in which he was to engage. He pulled off his cravat and opened his shirt-collar, tied a bandanna handkerchief round his waist, pulled off his boots, and put on a pair of light pumps. He then carefully examined the priming of his pistols, and taking his sword from the table went upon deck once more.

You can easily imagine, Mr. Editor, what sort of reflections were passing in my mind at this time. Helpless and friendless, prostrate and half dead with bruises, a prisoner to pirates, and just about to encounter the horrors of a sea-fight, without even the poor satisfaction of striking a blow in my own defence, or the prospect of deliverance in case the pirate should be conquered, and my carcass escape the dangers of the battle.

"If the pirates beat," thought I, "I shall at their first leisure be flayed alive for an honest man; if they are beaten, I shall be hanged for a pirate."

My reflections were interrupted by a broadside from the vessel I was in, which was directly answered by another from her antagonist. A ball came into the cabin, passed right over my body, and dashing the cabin lamp to pieces, left me in utter darkness. The loud shouts of the pirates now rose upon the night breeze, mingled with curses in all languages, and the groans of the wounded and dying in the one universal language of suffering and agony.

Presently a heavy shock against the side of our vessel made me aware that the combatants had grappled, and the clashing of swords and the report of pistols gave notice of the pirates having boarded their enemy. Then the tremendous voice of the Rover and the shouts of "Ramon! Ramon!" from his own men, were heard above the wild tumult of the fight.

The agony of suspense which I had suffered during the action now rose so high that my feeble strength could sustain it no longer; my brain reeled—all recollection, all sense forsook me, and I fainted.

When I recovered I was lying upon a mattress spread upon the deck of the vessel, and the first object that met my eyes was the Rover, bending over me with a look of intense interest and compassion. When he saw me open my eyes, he spoke to me in English.

"So you are better—here, taste this." And he gave me a cordial. "Come, raise yourself up a little and look about."

So saying he assisted me to lean against the companion-way, and I gazed upon the scene around me. It was a clear bright day, and by the light colour and smoothness of the water, I knew that we were sailing on the great bank of Bahama. All was tranquil and serene. The sea-birds were scaling over the waters, and the schools of flying-fish darting out into the air.

No sail was in sight; but few of the pirates were visible, and those were lounging about the deck, some smoking and others leaning idly over the gunwale, and gazing vacantly on the waters. The Rover sat by me, and watched my countenance. His truculent looking sailing-master was stretched at his length on a sea-chest, a few feet from me, and casting occasionally a malignant glance at the Rover and myself.

"Young man," said Ramon, "you wonder, I suppose, that you have not shared the fate of your companions. I saved you, because I chose to do so; it was my whim. I have a freak of that sort come into my head sometimes. I liked your looks; I took a sort of fancy to you, and said to myself—the fellow shall not be destroyed. Your safety has cost me something, and will, perhaps, cost me more. But I have said it—and a legion shall not move me from my purpose—you shall be safe."

I expressed my gratitude as well as I was able, and the pirate kept his word. But I have already made my story too long. To conclude, then—after staying a week on board the schooner, and entirely recovering my strength, I was set on shore three miles from Punto Mayo, and found my way to Matanzas, and not long after returned to the United States.

Your friend and humble servant, JACOBUS JOHN SMITH.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE DISAPPOINTED LOVER.

A FEW weeks since an advertisement appeared in the Gloucester Journal, stating that the writer was anxious for a wife, and setting forth the usual quantum of self-praise and importance, with a catalogue of "good temper," "cheerful disposition," "tolerable fortune," and other requisites on the part of a lady, so essential to produce felicity in the marriage state. Accordingly, a note was received by the would-be enamoured swain, couched in terms of maidenly and becoming modesty, and signed with the soft name of Maria, promising the advertiser all that the most fastidious husband could possibly require. An answer was immediately returned by the lover, couched in terms that could alone be expected from a youthful, enthusiastic, and enraptured lover. The correspondence became intensely interesting, continued for some time, and at last he prevailed on the beloved of his soul to name il giorno felice, when all disguise was to be thrown off, and she agreed to meet him in the lower avenue of the Old Well Wall, Cheltenham, and settle the preliminaries of a nearer and dearer correspondence on the delicate, important, and awful step, he had almost persuaded her to take. But, alas! how short-lived and deceitful are all the joys of this sub-lunary world! His fair correspondent was merely an ideal being, created by one or two waggish and laughter-loving youths of that gay town, who invited a strong muster of friends to be present, without mentioning the name of the lover, whose appearance they expected in the form of some romantic youth. No such amiable and engaging character, however, appeared, and the assembled crowd began to suspect that they had been hoaxed, instead of the lover, when their attention was directed to a respectable and elderly-looking gentleman, dressed in the very first style of fashion, with eyeglasses, jewellery, and all the external points of a man of rank, besides highly perfumed for the occasion! but his walk was rather tottering and trembling. After enjoying the confusion of the old gentleman for some time, who paced the walk with hasty strides, ever and anon looking round for his dear Maria, his tormentors approached him. After a few nods and winks, they followed him in procession, reading aloud, amidst the applause and encores of the throng, the whole of the correspondence. The amorous and disappointed sexagenarian first looked remarkably sheepish; then turned upon them with a withering frown of savage indignation and revenge, which only increased the ridicule; and finally, seeing his assailants were not to be beaten off, he fairly took to his heels, and ran away as well as the infirmities of age would permit him, quickened in his pace by the shouts of all present, who begged he would present "their best compliments to Maria!"

EFFECTS OF CHARCOAL.

The following instance of narrow escape from death proves the necessity of precaution when charcoal is used for the purpose of drying rooms. A house in Worcester had undergone some renovation, and the walls not drying so quick as was wished, a chafing-dish, containing charcoal, was made use of, and shifted from one room to the other. The female servant had been desired to clean the windows of one of the apartments, and the girl placed the burning charcoal in the room with her. In the course of the morning some persons passing the front of the house were startled at hearing groans and moaning, as if of some one in the agonies of death; they immediately stepped in, and mentioned the circumstance to those they found there, who were the workmen only, engaged in the repairs of the premises. Inquiry was now made for the servant girl, the only person missing down stairs. Some short time previous two domestics in the establishment of the earl of Surrey lost their lives from inhaling the fumes of ignited charcoal, and, most singularly, the principal workman at the house in question was at the time of that occurrence employed at that nobleman's mansion, and was the first to discover the lifeless bodies of the sufferers. Recollecting that charcoal was now being burnt on the second floor, aware also that the girl was employed in one of the upper rooms, and finding that she did not answer when called upon, the above circumstances presented themselves to his mind, and fearing a similar catastrophe, he hastened up stairs. He found the room-door locked, a breathless silence seemed to prevail within, and he could obtain no answer or notice taken of his calls and knockings for admission. His fears now greatly increased; he burst open the door, when he found, as he dreaded, his worst apprehensions were realised. The girl was stretched on the bed, to all appearance a corpse, and in the centre of the room stood the chafing-dish, still emitting its deleterious fumes, which would in a few more minutes have terminated the life of the poor girl. Happily, however, her deliverer on approaching her closely, discovered, that although in a state of perfect insensibility, there were yet some faint signs of life remaining; encouraged by which, with assistance he promptly carried her down stairs, and after the lapse of some time symptoms of returning animation exhibited themselves, and the girl recovered. She had a full recollection, upon coming to herself, of the manner in which the overpowering vapour first attacked her, although then unconscious that the sensation she had experienced proceeded from any cause. She said she had been in the room a short time only, when she felt a heaviness and torpor steal over her, which gradually increased so much as to prevent her going on with her work; thinking it a temporary ailment only, she laid herself down on the bed, supposing it would be the means of recovering her, but first took the precaution to make fast the door, as her mistress was out, and there were only men in the house. From this time until discovering herself, to her surprise, down stairs, she was entirely insensible of what was passing. Hereford Jour.

EFFECTS OF FRIGHT.

We have often remarked on the impropriety of exciting the fears of children, for the purpose of more easily managing them, but never since we appeared before the public have we heard of any thing so truly horrible as the following. The subject being too delicate to allow of the mentioning of names, we shall avoid such an exposure, but at the same time we pledge ourselves for the correctness of the narration. Some time ago, a lady in a certain considerable town in Yorkshire, went to a neighbour's house to take tea, along with her husband, and left her little family to the care of her servants. In the course of the evening she felt very uneasy, and being impressed with the idea that all was not right at home, she left her friend's house early. On arriving at her house, she found that her servants, in the exercise of high life below stairs, had collected a social party. This she passed over without observation, and, proceeding up stairs to the nursery, she was surprised by a terrific figure at the foot of the bed of the youngest child, which was twelve months old. The fact was, that the nurse-maid finding the child not very ready to get to rest, and being loath to be disturbed in her evening's enjoyment by its crying, had dressed up and placed the figure alluded to at the foot of the infant's bed, with a view of frightening it to sleep. The contrary effect, however, had been produced; the child had been horror-struck, and appeared to its mother with eyes fixed, in an idiotic stare, upon the image. Astonished and distracted, she rung the bell, and then proceeded to take up her infant; but, lo! it was a lifeless corpse. The fright occasioned by the nurse's folly had been too much for the little innocent. In the extreme of fear the pulse had ceased to beat; the vital spark had fled, and the mother was left to mourn in unutterable anguish the credulity which induced her to trust to such a servant, and the perfidy of the unprincipled nurse, in whom she had confided. To add more is needless, and to describe the subsequent sorrow of the parent is impossible. It is a melancholy story, but it is not more strange than true; and we give it with no other view than to place such parents as may read the York Herald upon their guard with respect to those to whom they may intrust the care of their innocent and helpless offspring. PREDICTION VERIFIED.

Our readers are all familiar with the anecdote of the almanac maker, whose boy inadvertently seasoned the weather with "a little snow," in June, which, by an extraordinary coincidence of circumstances, established the reputation of the almanac beyond the reach of gainsaying. The faith, so prevalent at that time in almanac-makers' predictions, respecting the weather, seems not to be extinct, even at the present day. During the prevalence of the mild weather, in the fore part of the winter, a trader in Franklin county was thus accosted by one of his customers: "Mr. Yardstick, I've brought back the almanac I bought of ye, for I don't b'lieve it's ginnywine, and I want my sixpence again, or else one of the ra'al farmers', that can be depended upon. This is all a sham." He went on to relate, that, depending on his almanac, he had made sundry arrangements for sleighing and sledding, and had been sorely disappointed. He then opened his almanac and exhibited to the shop-keeper the following words, extending through half a page, and occupying a space of two or three weeks: "look out for snow about this time." "So," said the trader, "you say, that depending on your almanac, you have been greatly disappointed." "Yes, I have been waiting for snow these three weeks; every body has been looking for it and wondering why it didn't come; the gals have lost their sleigh-ride, and neighbour Goodwill says we sha'n't never get our wood up at this rate." "I am sorry for your disappointment, but the fault is your own, and not mine nor the almanac's; if you will examine again, you will find that the almanac did not predict the coming of snow, but merely the looking for it; if it had actually come, people would not have been looking for it, as you say every body has been, even as is there foretold; and thus the prediction is verified." This logic convinced the purchaser, who went away, not only satisfied that his almanac was the "ginnywine farmers'," but confirmed in his belief in almanac predictions. Worcester Spy.

STANZAS.

How have you thought of me?

How have I thought of thee?—as flies
The dove to seek her mate,
Trembling lest some rude hand has made
Her sweet home desolate;
Thus doth my bosom seek in thine
The only heart that throbs with mine.

How have I thought of thee?—as turns
The flower to meet the sun,
E'en though, when clouds and storms arise,
It be not shone upon;
Thus, dear one, in thine eye I see
The only light that beams on me.

How have I thought of thee?—as thinks
The mariner of home,
When doomed through many a dreary waste
Of waters yet to roam;
Thus doth my spirit turn to thee,
My guiding star o'er life's wild sea.

How have I thought of thee?—as bends
The Persian at the shrine
Of his resplendent god, to watch
His earliest glories shine.
Thus doth my spirit bow to thee,
My heart's own radiant Deity.

HEREDITARY DESCENT OF MENTAL TALENT.

From a number of facts, a few of which we shall select for the purpose of illustration, it will appear remarkably striking, that such an inheritance is more generally derived from the maternal than the paternal side. In the examples to be adduced, a selection has been made with a view to the different varieties of mental superiority, and the following comprehends poets, historians, and orators.—Lord Bacon. His mother was daughter to Sir Anthony Cooke; she was skilled in many languages, and translated and wrote several works, which displayed learning, acuteness, and taste.—Hume, the historian, mentions his mother, daughter of Sir D. Falconer, president of the college of justice, as a woman of "singular merit;" and who, although in the prime of life, devoted herself entirely to his education.—R. B. Sheridan. Mrs. Frances Sheridan was a woman of considerable abilities. It was writing a pamphlet in his defence that first introduced her to Mr. Sheridan, afterwards her husband. She also wrote a novel highly praised by Johnson.—Schiller, the German poet. His mother was an amiable woman; she had a great relish for the beauties of nature, and was passionately fond of music and poetry. Schiller was her favourite child.—Goethe thus speaks of his parents: "I inherited from my father a certain sort of eloquence, calculated to enforce my doctrines to my auditors; from my mother I derived the faculty of representing all that the imagination can conceive, with energy and vivacity."—Lord Erskine's mother was a woman of superior talent and discernment; by her advice her son betook himself to the bar.—Thomson the poet. Mrs. T. was a woman of uncommon natural endowments, possessed of every social and domestic virtue, with a warmth and vivacity of imagination scarcely inferior to her son.—Boerhaave's mother acquired a knowledge of medicine not often found in females.—Sir Walter Scott. His mother, Elizabeth, daughter of D. Rutherford, W. S. was a woman of great accomplishments and virtue. She had a good taste for and wrote poetry, which appeared in print in 1789.—We might further mention the mother of Marmontel, of Bonaparte, Sir William Jones, and a host of others. But a sufficient number has been given, we think, to show that in a majority of cases eminent men have derived their talents from either parent, and that it is a remarkable circumstance, that such inheritance is most generally from the maternal side. Northern Whig.

MISTAKEN VIEWS OF RELIGION.

One cause which impedes the reception of religion, even among the well disposed, is that garment of sadness in which people delight to suppose her dressed; and that life of hard, pining abstinence, which they pretend she enjoins on her disciples. Let us try the case by a parallel, and examine it, not as affecting our virtue but our pleasure. Does religion forbid the cheerful enjoyments of life, as rigorously as avarice forbids them? does she require such sacrifices of our ease as ambition; or such renunciation of our quiet as pride? Does devotion murder sleep, like dissipation? Does she annihilate fortune, like gambling? Does she destroy health, like intemperance? Does she embitter life, like discord; or abridge it, like duelling? Does religion impose more vigilance than suspicion; or half as many mortifications as vanity? Vice has her martyrs; and the most austere and ascetic (who mistake the genius of christianity almost as her enemy) never tormented himself with such cruel and careless severity, as that with which envy lacerates her unhappy votaries. Worldly honour obliges us to be at the trouble of resenting injuries—but religion spares us that inconvenience, by commanding us to forgive them; and by this injunction consults our happiness no less than our virtue; for the torment of constantly hating any must be at least equal to the sin of it. If this estimate is fairly made, then is the balance clearly on the side of religion, even in the article of pleasure. Nat. Jour.

THE WOLF OF NOBLE RACE.

A young wolf, who in his first campaign against the leopard, had shown the white feather, and shamefully scampered off at the first appearance of danger, was, in consequence, dragged before the judgment seat of king lion and by the angry monarch sentenced to receive a dozen stripes and to lose one of his ears. "And must I suffer such indignity?" exclaimed the kneeling culprit. "I whose father once, in a dangerous emergency, sustained the throne already shaken by rebellion, and who was for his services created a nobleman of the first rank?" "You are in the right," interrupted the lion, smiling, "the son of such a father merits some distinction. Let him receive two dozen stripes, and have both his ears cut off." Nat. Gaz.

INSTINCT.

It is well known that animals in a state of nature, when, by some secret impulse, they feel their end approaching, always retire to the most hidden recess, where, as if pursued by a dreaded demon, they await the fatal moment solitary and unseen; hence it is rare to find a wild animal which has died in the open fields. A remarkable circumstance illustrative of this principle of instinctive fore-knowledge has long been familiar in Callendar policy, in the eastern half of which a number of sheep are yearly out to graze. It necessarily happens that, during the season, a few die a fair strae death. On these occasions, the doomed animal invariably forsakes its companions, and wanders from the flock towards the side of a steep hill facing the north, where, under shelter of a small plantation, it patiently lies down, without tasting the pasture on which its carcass is soon to be stretched, food for the fox and the crow. A GOOD LESSON.

Talleyrand had a confidential servant excessively devoted to his interests, but withal superlatively inquisitive. Having one day intrusted him with a letter, the prince watched his faithful valet from the window of his apartment, and with some surprise observed him coolly reading the letter en route. On the next day a similar commission was confided to the servant, and to the second letter was added a postscript, couched in the following terms: "You may send a verbal answer by the bearer; he is perfectly acquainted with the whole affair, having taken the precaution to read this previously to its delivery." Such a postscript must have been more effective than the severest reproach. Times.

RARE OCCURRENCE.

In the populous townships of Brynton and Blymen, which form one large parish, situated within a few miles of Newport, Shropshire, a male child had not been born during the last twenty-four years, until a few weeks since, and only one other within the space of twenty-four years.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT.

THIS great and distinguished man has been so long celebrated for his fearless and intrepid opposition to arbitrary power, and for his unceasing efforts towards ameliorating the condition of his fellow men, that he has received the emphatic cognomen of "the friend of the people," by the almost universal suffrages of his countrymen.

Imbued as he is with the same love of country, and the same determined spirit of resistance to the encroachments of power, when exercised against the rights and freedom of his fellow-citizens, which glowed in the breasts of the worthies who promoted, by their untiring zeal, and established the independence of these United States, we think that a short notice of this illustrious patriot cannot fail to interest American readers.

Sir Francis Burdett is descended from one of the most ancient families in Great Britain, the early founders of which, it is recorded, were celebrated for the same patriotism and love of liberty evinced by the present representative of their house. Born thus among the privileged classes of society, it is perhaps the more surprising, that he has constantly been enrolled in the service of that portion of his countrymen whose situation is so far removed from the aristocracy of the land, both by prejudices of birth and education; yet, devoted as he ever has been to the interests of "the people," his most violent opponents do not deny him the merit of being, in the fullest sense of the term, "a gentleman," and what is a far more honourable title, "an honest man."

The consistency which has characterized his political career has blunted the malice of the most determined supporters of "the divine right of kings;" and the conscientious discharge of his public duties, even to the suffering of fine and imprisonment in the performance of them, has extracted from the same characters the meed of approbation, as proceeding from a firm conviction, that his principles are the result of disinterested and pure patriotism.

Sir Francis commenced his political career in 1796, in which year he was returned to parliament for Borough-bridge, in Yorkshire. In the house of commons he soon became a warm advocate of the rights of the people, and for reform in parliament; and shortly afterwards he instituted an inquiry into the state of Cold-bath Field's prison, in London, and effected by his exertions the dismissal of the governor, and a complete reformation in the regulations of the prison.

This early display of boldness and integrity, in behalf of suffering humanity, and determination to promote that salutary reform in parliament, which all lovers of their country at the time loudly called for, rendered Sir Francis extremely popular. At the dissolution of parliament in 1802, he was called on by a large number of freeholders to represent the county of Middlesex, and after a severe contest of fifteen days, he was returned by a considerable majority. His opponent, Mr. Mainwaring, petitioned parliament against the return, and a new election took place, between Sir Francis and the younger Mr. Mainwaring, the father being incapable of again coming forward, when Mr. Mainwaring was returned by a majority of five votes. On the succeeding general election, Sir Francis again stood for Middlesex, in opposition to the ministerial candidate, Mr. Mellish, but was again defeated. It is reported, that Sir Francis expended on these several elections the sum of one hundred thousand pounds sterling.

A vacancy shortly after this occurred in the representation of the city of Westminster, and it was determined by the electors of that city to put Sir Francis into nomination to represent them in parliament, without putting him to any expense; a resolution which was carried into effect, and he was duly returned by a large majority.

One of the most magnificent processions that ever graced a "chairing" of a successful candidate, was the reward of Sir Francis's exertions, at the close of this contest. Multitudes followed in its train, and Sir Francis, seated in a triumphal car, built expressly for the purpose, received the acclamations of thousands of his grateful countrymen, who eagerly testified their approbation by loud and repeated huzzas to their favourite champion of liberty and parliamentary reform. A splendid dinner at the crown and anchor tavern, in the Strand, closed this popular display of feeling, where two thousand persons sat down with the worthy baronet, and drank "pottle deep" to his success in the elevated station to which he had been raised by the spontaneous voice of an independent people.

In 1810, Sir Francis was committed to the tower of London, for denying the right of the house of commons to im- prison any person. The cause of this assertion originated in the case of Mr. Gale Jones, who had been imprisoned in Newgate for an alleged libel on the house; and in a letter to his constituents of Westminster, Sir Francis laid himself open to this breach of privilege of the honourable body, of which he was a member.

The excitement in London, at the news of Sir Francis's indictment and intended committal, was extreme. Sir F. considered the proceedings illegal, and when the warrant was issued for his arrest, he determined to oppose its execution. Troops were stationed on Tower-hill, and the guns mounted on the ramparts. The sergeant-at-arms, accompanied by his officers, proceeded to the baronet's house, in Piccadilly, but were refused admittance. The populace had risen, en masse, to witness the struggle between their favourite and the constituted authorities; and when Sir Francis appeared at the windows, he was cheered by the multitude, and applauded for his resolution. In consequence of his resistance to the warrant, the judges were consulted, and troops were ordered into London, together with a park of artillery from the arsenal at Woolwich. On the Monday succeeding the first attempt to execute the warrant, the sergeant-at-arms again presented himself at Sir Francis's residence, and was again repulsed; he, however, effected an entrance, with his officers, at the window, and found Sir Francis in the drawing-room, surrounded with his family; the warrant was presented, and two officers seized the baronet; as force was now used, Sir Francis very prudently did not attempt resistance, and was at length safely lodged in the tower, accompanied on his way by a troop of horse-guards, where he remained until parliament was prorogued.

At the next general election, Sir Francis was again returned for Westminster, with Sir Samuel Romilly.

At the time of the celebrated proceedings at Manchester, Sir Francis published a letter to his constituents, expressing his indignation at the outrage committed on the British constitution, by those unhappy proceedings; in this letter some passages were deemed seditious and libellous, and the author was prosecuted by the attorney-general, and took his trial, on which the jury found him guilty. He was subsequently sentenced to pay a fine of one thousand pounds sterling, and to be imprisoned in the king's bench for three months. Between the time of his trial and the infliction of the sentence, Sir Francis was again returned a member in parliament for the city of Westminster, with his present colleague, Mr. Hobhouse, who is known to our readers as the friend of Lord Byron, and with whom he has continued as one of the representatives of Westminster to this period.

The above is a brief sketch of the principal incidents in the political life of this distinguished senator. The numerous measures which he has during that period advocated we must necessarily pass over with equal brevity; reform in parliament, catholic emancipation, and the repeal of the civil and religious disabilities of the dissenters from the church of England, have all received his warmest support, and to effect which his time and talents have been unceasingly devoted. To his parliamentary exertions the disgraceful practice of flogging soldiers in the British army has been discontinued, and in some cases wholly abolished. Private individuals, when suffering under harsh measures of government, have invariably received his protection, and the aid of his acknowledged eloquence in the senate, to obtain a repeal of their sentence, or an amelioration in its execution.

In person Sir Francis presents a noble commanding figure, tall and well formed; a face strongly marked with the energy and enthusiasm which mark his character, and decidedly expressive of his intellectual capacity. As an orator he is extremely popular; the bold and fearless manner with which he grapples a subject, and lays bare the covert attempts to invade the rights of the constitution, renders his eloquence peculiarly adapted to the class of individuals he principally devotes his services. In the house of commons he is listened to with attention. The consistency of his political career commands respect from that body, while his forcible eloquence frequently constrains them to support his measures.

The march of liberal principles in the cabinet of Great Britain has of late rendered the labours of Sir Francis more of a quiescent character than they were formerly. The elevation of Mr. Canning to the head of the administration was hailed by the patriotic baronet as a proud era in British politics, and he warmly seconded most of the measures that great man projected for the improvement of his country. In the late contests on the subject of catholic emancipation, and the repeal of the dissenters' disabilities, he indeed came forward with all the force and eloquence he is so justly distinguished for, and has at length witnessed the success of two of his ardently cherished objects of legislative enactments.

The enemies of Sir Francis have not failed to attack him for his connexion with the radicals of the day. Hunt, Cobbett, and others of that grade, were certainly once admitted to his friendship; but the pure patriotism of Sir Francis could not long amalgamate with these fierce and lawless spirits. Their character soon developed itself, and the result was, an entire secession on his part from further intercourse with that infatuated body. Cobbett has been loudest in his vituperations against the alleged inconsistency of Sir Francis, as deserting his former associates, with what justice may be inferred from the following statement of facts, which is well authenticated.

Cobbett, previous to his last visit to the United States, had borrowed a considerable sum from Sir Francis, to be duly paid at a certain period. After he had established himself for some time in America, his restless disposition induced him to determine upon returning again to England, but being deeply involved in debt, the design was somewhat difficult of execution: to pave his way for this resolve, he addressed a friend there, stating, that considering he had been denied the full benefit of the laws of his country previous to his departure from England, he considered that he was absolved in future from any legal claim his creditors might have against him, and desiring his friend to lay the letter before Sir Francis.

The answer of the baronet did him honour. Nothing could be more cool than the scorn and sarcasm which it contained. The following is from the closing paragraph of Sir Francis's reply; he writes—

"—As to complaint or reproach, they are the offspring of weakness and folly, disdain should stifle them; but nothing can or ought to stifle the expression of disgust every honest mind must feel at the want of integrity in the principles you proclaim, and of feeling and generosity in the sentiments you express."

In the faint sketch we have given of this celebrated man, we feel we have not done adequate justice to the illustrious character he has acquired among his countrymen. His name will descend to future generations, coupled with the Sidneys and Hampdens of his own nation, and with that long line of patriotic individuals who have been foremost in advocating the rights and liberties of their fellow-creatures against the inroads of unconstitutional attacks, emanating from the undue use of delegated power.

No. VIII.

IDLE PEOPLE.

Under the greenwood tree
Who loves to lie with me,
And tune his merry note
Unto the sweet bird's throat,
Come hither, come hither, come hither!
Here shall he see
No enemy,
But winter and rough weather.—Shaks.

THERE is no class of human beings who are visited with more matter-of-course vituperation than idle people. Idleness! it is the greatest vice that civilization knows, for it is the least profitable. Men may lie, and cheat, and game, and drink, and break the ten commandments in whatsoever way they please, and they will still find apologists; but for idleness, no one lifteth up his voice to speak in its behalf. From the busy haunts of men, from the toil and turmoil of the marts of traffic, from the din and smoke of manufactories, from the high-courts of Mammon, it is for ever banished; and only on the pleasant hill side, in the waving meadow, and under the ancient forest trees, or by the babbling brook and lazy river hath it sought out an undisturbed retreat; and it is there its devotee is to be found, stretched luxuriously along the green sward, worshipping his divinity after his own calm and easy fashion. Foolish fellow! up and away unto the crowded city, for there money, "the white man's god," is to be made—spend thy days in bargaining and wrangling and over-reaching, and thy nights in scheming and calculating, until thou art worth a million! but rest not, relax not: toil and bargain and wrangle on, and thou mayest yet be worth a million and a half! and then if death some morning puts a stop unto thy profitable speculations, just when cotton was on the rise, and thou hadst five thousand bags on hand, think, for all thy care and anxiety—thy joyless days and sleepless nights—what a glorious consolation is thine! The poor idler goes to his grave not worth a groat, while thou descendant to thine everlasting rest with more money invested in the funds than any man on 'change! Who would be an idler?

"Idleness," saith the proverb, "is the mother of Mischief." How strange that such a noisy brawling urchin should spring from so inoffensive a parent! For my own part, I have a respect for idle people; and when no one suffers by their idleness, they are the most harmless and sensible people on the face of the earth—your only true philosophers. Love of ease is natural to man, and industry came into the world with original sin. Hard work occasioned the first murder. If Cain, instead of tilling the stubborn earth and earning his bread "by the sweat of his brow," had had nothing to do but lounge on the mountain-side like his brother Abel, play his pipe, watch his sheep feeding, and then feed himself, he would never have envied him, and the second great transgression would not have come to pass.

That idleness is the natural state of man cannot be doubted. Like the flowers of the field, it springeth up without care or culture; but industry is a hot-house plant, of forced and artificial growth, and apt to wither away, if it be not anxiously tended and cherished. In asserting these undeniable truths, let it not be supposed that any reproach is meant to be cast upon the industrious. No—the man that sacrifices his love of ease, and labours unremittingly that his wife may be at rest, and his little ones comfortably clothed and fed—that he may be free from duns and debts, and walk through the world fearing and beholden to no living creature—such a man is worthy of all admiration. But there are others, who have enough and to spare, but still go on—the slaves of avarice and of habit; who dignify their love of gain with the name of industry, and plume themselves mightily on "never being a single minute idle;" why what are they at best but miserable earth-worms—voluntary bondmen; the worldly wise, and yet the most egregious fools!

One thing that has undeservedly brought idleness into bad repute, is the confounding it with laziness, than which no two things can be more different. The lazy sluggard who hates motion in every shape, and lies upon the earth an inert piece of animation, is scarcely upon a par with the beasts that perish. Perhaps the finest specimen of this tribe was a very fat old gentleman of this city, a prodigious eater, who, in the summer time, used to sit by the day together smoking and steaming like a caldron. The only exercise he was ever known to take consisted in calling out, after he had sat on one seat long enough to make it uncomfortably warm, "John, bring me a cool chair!" and then moving from one chair to the other. Now idle people are the very reverse of this. In all sorts of games and sports they are first and foremost. It is they who can pitch a quoit or bowl a cricket-ball straighter and truer than any one else: the swiftest runners and most active wrestlers of the district. It is they who have roamed the country far and wide, and know where the finest fishing streams are to be found, and where the birds are most plentiful—the healthiest, hardiest, and most venturesome of heaven's creatures; who will scramble up a precipice, and risk their neck for a bird's nest, but droop and pine away under a regular routine of money-making tasks. There are, however, different varieties of this species, like every other. Some of a more contemplative turn, who seek out the pleasant nooks and shady places known but to themselves, and there muse away their hours. These are intimate acquaintances of nature, to whom she is always "at home," and who are initiated into thousands of her little secrets that others know not of; or with their Shakspeare in their hand, they read unfolded mysteries of mind and matter, that seem, and are, not the records of observation, but the outpourings of inspiration. Such a one was Jaques, though rather too cynical; and, at times, even such a one must Shakspeare have been. It appears impossible that the scenes in the forest of Arden could have been engendered any where except "under the shade of melancholy boughs." So thoroughly are they imbued with a truly pastoral spirit, so free from the noise and smoke of cities, that it is really strange, after reading "As you like it," with your mind filled with images of lonely forest walks, and their denizens the duke of Amiens and his "co-mates and brothers in exile," to walk to the window and see so many streets, houses, carriages, and fantastically dressed men and women. What a pitiable fool would he be who could afford to dream away life amid such scenes, to forsake them

"For so much dress as may be grasped thus!"

Yet idle people are looked upon as the very worst and "most good-for-nothing" people in existence. They are under the ban of society. The worldly father points them out to his son as a warning, and the prudent mother watches that her marriageable daughter's eye rests not on them; their names are stricken from invitation lists; and every graping scoundrel twitteth them and vaunts his superior pack-horse qualifications. And for what?—why, their comparative poverty and practical philosophy. Yet they are in one sense the wealthiest of men, for

Poor and content, is rich, and rich enough;
But riches, fineness, is as poor as winter
To him that ever fears he shall be poor.

Another good property of the idler is his love of children. Hour after hour he trifles away in their innocent society, and is, by universal suffrage, elected grand arbitrator of all their short-lived feuds and harmless rivalries. He is their judge, their great man, their infallible authority; quoted on all occasions, and from whose decision there is no appeal—the framer of their laws, and the maker of their playthings. His skill in joinery is made manifest in the manufactory of tiny carts and wheelbarrows; and his manner of fixing fishing-tackle, of cutting bats, and compounding balls, is allowed on all hands to be inimitable. In short, his love for these miniatures of humanity is genuine, and it is as genuinely returned.

In towns a person of this temperament is altogether out of his element. He is a connoisseur of sweet, wholesome air, and sighs to rove about in search of it. As long as the grizzly tyrant winter keeps the fair spring in chains, it matters little where he is; but when one of those glorious days that herald her approach breaks forth, and nature becomes, on the instant, all life and animation, there are few men, let them be as industrious as they may, who have not experienced his feelings. Who, on such a day, has not felt a pleasing languor steal over him, and a distaste for his ordinary pursuits and avocations rising in his breast? Who does not long to leave the hubbub of the city far behind, to stroll forth into the fields, and have the taint of the smoke blown off by the fresh April winds? and who would not do so if

Necessity, the master still of will,
How strong soo'er it is,

did not drag him back to his toils. Oh! what a clog it is on a man's spirit to feel that he is a slave—for what are they but slaves with the privilege of change, whose daily labour buys their daily bread—to long for liberty, yet feel that the pure air, the green fields, the blue sky, the very commonest gifts of nature, that are enjoyed by the brutes of the earth and the birds of the air, are denied to him? True, he may break through all restraints and go about inhaling as much fresh air as he pleases; but when the cravings of appetite hint to him that it is dinner time, from whence are to come the victuals that constitute that important item in the sum total of human happiness? Man is unfortunately a carnivorous animal, and must, once a day at least, be fed with flesh, fowl, or fish: he cannot make an unsophisticated repast off the roots and fruits of the earth, for though

"his anatomical construction
Bears vegetables in a grumbling sort of way;
Yet certainly he thinks, beyond all question,
Beef, veal, and mutton easier of digestion."

Then why are idle people who can afford to be so without wrong to any one so hardly dealt with, when all men, deserving the name, would be idle if they could? Who ever knew a creature that made use of the too common expression, "I am never easy without I am doing something," that was worth passing an hour with, or that showed the slightest symptoms of having a soul? He cannot be easy without doing something, merely because he cannot hold communion with himself; he has no treasures of thought to which he can revert, and his mind preys upon itself unless exercised in the miserable cares and petty gains and triumphs of business, which is at best but a necessary evil. I, for one, with a few exceptions, always admired the state of things that the old courtier in the Tempest proposes to introduce into the enchanted island if he were king of it—

No kind of traffic
Would I admit; no name of magistrate;
Letters should not be known; no use of service,
Of riches, or of poverty; no contracts,
Successions; bound of land, till, vineyard, none:
No use of metal, corn, or wine, or oil;
No occupation; all men idle, all;
And women too; but innocent and pure.
All things in common nature should produce
Without sweat or endeavour; treason, felony,
Sword, pike, knife, gun, or need of any engine,
Would I not have; but nature should bring forth
Of its own kind, all foison, all abundance,
To feed my innocent people.

The greatest objection to his scheme is that parts of it savour somewhat of agrarianism; though Gonzales was a well-meaning, honest man, and could have no intention when he spoke thus, of countenancing the schemes of a set of people who, too lazy to accumulate property themselves, manifest a decided predilection for that of their neighbours, and disinterestedly advise an equal division when they have nothing to give and every thing to receive.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

A MAN WITH ONE IDEA.

THE man I shall attempt to describe is very easily known—a calm, easy, quiet look pervades his countenance; an ineffable placidity of demeanour is thrown over his whole frame; an astuteness of feeling characterizes all his actions; a gravity of utterance, and a continued string of rapid and unmeaning common-place remarks form the materiel of what he dignifies with the name of conversation. To him Galt and Spurzheim, and all the endless theories of intellectual causes and effects, are but as "dead letters." The head, that capital of the human frame, is in his estimation the organ whereby he sees, hears, smells, and eats; this last qualification is the most valued, as conveying the chiefest pleasure of his existence. The obesity of his person is viewed with complacency, in regard to this masterly organ; and the charms of good living acquire a higher relish as the proofs of his rotundity increases; and he consequently honours the member, whose province it is to assist in the attainment of this desirable expansion of his "fair proportions."

The phenomena of the natural world is also a subject of little or no interest to him. The rain in summer is indeed called refreshing, when the thermometer has been ranging at ninety, and his clover field looks parched; the thoughts of his favourite pad faring somewhat the worse for the drought, has an indistinct connection with this feeling; but the necessary showers, which refresh the verdure, enrich the ground, and make nature smiling, gay, and vernal, are things which never cross his imagination, nor convey subjects for his gratulation or thanksgiving. The glorious sun, beaming in the refulgence of its rising glory, or setting with its "golden splendour," serve only to mark the periods of another coming and closing day. The "blue vault of heaven," spangled with its countless hosts of glittering stars; the "silver moon," sailing in cloudless majesty, either in full splendour, or rising, like "pale Dian's cress," are objects indicating only the progressive course of time, as it is marked in the well-thumbed almanac, which regulates his systematic evolutions.

The beauties of creation are alike unheeded by him. In vain may picturesque and fertile landscapes spread their viand charms before him, or the sublime and magnificent scenes of uncultivated nature pass before his sight; the one is viewed with reference only to the animal comforts of life, the other is considered wholly useless.

Works of art create in him no rapturous emotions, and science in vain expands her deep and wondrous pages for his perusal. He contemplates the one with frigid indifference, or understands the other only when brought to the practical improvement of some favoured object of luxury or pursuit.

In the details of every-day life the true "metal" of the man is most conspicuous; here you cannot fail to distinguish him. Business progresses with him in uniform and systematic regularity. Speculation and enterprise form no part of his commercial code; a regular dog-trot movement, like the never-varying pendulum of the old Dutch clock in his office, carries him gently along, through the whole routine of active duties; and his periodical relaxation (like the regular windings of that useful time-piece) renews his strength, and fits him again to commence the same unceasing round of monotonous and prescribed avocations.

In politics he is a "Vicar of Bray." He has adopted that patriotic axiom, "that let who will govern he must be the governed;" and he cannot understand the cause of the vociferous declamations and rancorous abuse that adverse parties lavish so liberally on each other, when some particular end is to be answered, or some favourite champion is to be supported.

If the elective franchise is in his hands, he very prudently declines its exercise, or weighs with accurate precision the benefits which may accrue to himself, before he decides upon the merits of rival candidates.

He is strictly orthodox, agreeably to the particular creed imbibed from parental dictation. No nice disquisition in that endless field for discussion, theology, disturbs his mind, others have settled that matter for him; and he feels no disposition to challenge the doctrines or forms which were adopted with his earliest perceptions.

In literary matters he is somewhat more discursive. In youth the soft numbers of the amatory poets furnished scraps; which he found useful for quoting to the fair lady who, in more advanced years, became his wife. He has always held the "daily press" in considerable esteem; its diurnal catalogue of accidents and murders formed topics for conversation; and in after years the same source was the medium through which he advertised his wares, or supposing him to be beyond the necessity of pursuing business for his support. The self-same organ told the rise and fall of stocks, and occasionally informed his fellow-citizens of the honourable stations he filled in the public bodies he was attached to.

We must further do him the justice of stating, that he at times dips into the magazines and other light periodicals of the day. The last novels also claim his attention; and a standard volume of sermons form the usual provocative for his Sunday's after-dinner nap.

It must not be supposed that the extent of knowledge thus obtained is suffered to be idle; on the contrary, no one can better tell the last written opinion on the floating trifles of the day than he can, and the last reviewer is ever his authority. He also deals plenteously in sage apothegms and indisputable truisms; these are disseminated as occasion requires, with all the gravity of profound wisdom and erudite research. They form rules for the guidance of his family, and serve as text-books for the ever ready advice he liberally furnishes to his friends.

Thus he calmly floats down the stream of time, unruffled by those adverse winds and stormy tempests which more ideal men are exposed to, and at last attains the "bourne appointed unto all men," and leaves behind a character which, if not marked with any rare virtues, is at least unstained with any great crimes.

Do you not envy this picture of calm and unintellectual character, you host of high imaginative beings? You who pass your lives in one unceasing whirl of bounding fancies and untiring pursuits, can the phantoms you pursue afford the solid and real enjoyment which the individual I have described possessed? No! It is true, that endowed as you are with the divine attributes of genius, you soar above your fellow-men, and hold "high communion" with the brighter intelligences of animate and inanimate nature; but it is this very sublimated state of existence that is your torment, and frequently your destruction.

"It drinks the life-blood from the veins."

Discard, then, the countless myriads of ideas with which your teeming brains are fraught. Sink into the dull plodding character we have attempted to delineate, and truly you shall meet the reward of approbation which ever attends the man with one idea. D.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THE managers of the Park must really put a stop to their uniformly respectable way of getting up new and amusing pieces, or there is an end at once to dramatic notices. It is impossible to go on week after week, using sugared words and complimentary phrases, touching the merits of the play and the excellence of the acting; we lack something of "good, worthy Mr. Janus's" talents in that particular. It has been the unhappy nature of man, ever since Eve ate apples, to delight in fault-finding; and this is easily to be traced to the pride and vanity with which he is impregnated. In praising any thing he tacitly acknowledges his own inferiority, and places himself in an attitude of respectful admiration; but in fault-finding he assumes a tone of conscious superiority, and fulminates his condemnatory decrees with the air of Jove himself. The public too, generally like an ill-tempered writer, and give him credit for spirit, sincerity, and a number of other fine things, when frequently all his sneering and carping merely proceeds from the acidity of his disposition: thus many a dull rogue, whose jaundiced eye and wormwood temperament will not allow him to admire merit or see good in any shape, passes for a gentleman of exquisite taste, whose perception of the beautiful is so acute as to render it impossible for him to be pleased with what pleases other people. But, though we ourselves lay claim to an exuberance of good-nature, there is a limit to human patience, and the managers must really do something they ought not to do, play some bad pieces, or good pieces badly, displace the legitimate drama and introduce camels and elephants, or any thing of that kind which will allow opportunity for a trifling display of fearless independence and an indignant spirit of outraged morality. During the last week every thing has been conducted with the most provoking propriety, and the two new pieces that have been produced are both, of their kind, more than respectable. With "Shakspeare's Early Days" we were indeed rather disappointed on the first representation; but this was owing to perhaps unreasonable expectations created by the nature of the subject, rather than any lack of merit in the piece itself. It is a neat little affair; but the characters and situations are scarcely broad and farcical enough to suit the taste of the times; the language has the merit of being correct and to the purpose, though the blank verse does occasionally "hobble in its gait." It would probably have had a stronger dramatic effect if the author had introduced a few more of Shakspeare's youthful irregularities: he has made the poet too perfect, and has even assigned a humane motive for his deer-stealing. Though we believe Shakspeare was really and truly a good man, yet in his early days he was by no means impeccable. The first scene discovers his father and mother, the former of whom rails bitterly at the manner in which his son Willy wastes his time; and the next scene shows us the poet himself, sleeping on a bank, when "coming events" are supposed to "cast their shadows before," and those glorious creations which will hallow his name through all ages, float before him in a vision. This might have been made much more effective. Then comes the affair of shooting the buck, for which he is brought before Sir Thomas Lucy, whom he rates most soundly; he is dismissed upon paying the fine, and Sir Thomas, who can neither read nor write himself, orders his retainer, Slyboots, to draw up a "thundering proclamation" against deer-stealing. Slyboots is in a similar predicament with his master, and secretly applies to Shakspeare to do it for him, who consents, but instead of a proclamation writes a copy of the verses which he himself in reality affixed to the park gate of Sir Thomas Lucy, commencing,

A parliament member, a justice of peace,
At home a scarecrow, in London an ass;

Slyboots highly elated with his supposed proclamation, returns with it to Sir Thomas, who looks it over, and unable to discover the trick played upon him, commends it highly, and orders it to be read aloud in presence of the whole village. This is one of the most laughable situations in the piece. Then we have the arrival of the youthful poet in London with his tragedy of Hamlet in his pocket, where he saves the life of Lord Southampton, and meets his fellow-townsmen, Richard Burbage, (the Garrick of his time, and the original Richard III.) He then repairs to Dr. Orthodox, an old pedant, for a warrant for the enactment of his tragedy, which is refused on the ground that it does not conform to the rules of Aristotle, and we are favoured with the sapient doctor's criticism on Hamlet. In answer to Orthodox's question at what college Shakspeare graduated, he makes this happy and spirited reply:

Creation's boundless temple was my school;
Mankind my study; 'tis a royal college,
Endowed most nobly by the King of kings!
There nature in one hour teaches more
Than in an age your Greek and Latin lore.

Nearly the whole of the dramatic persons finally meet in the court of Queen Elizabeth, who makes trial of their skill by requesting each one to express the wish nearest to his heart in rhyme, on the instant. Shakspeare of course bears away the palm, in the following neatly turned lines, which, we believe, are a translation from the Persian:

When born thou wept'st, while all around were smiling,
To see pure joy thy mother's woes beguiling:
Heaven grant that when in death thou sink'st to sleep,
Thou may'st serenely smile, though all around thee weep.

The queen places her picture round his neck, takes him into favour, there is a flourish of trumpets, and the curtain falls. The piece was very well played. Hilson, Placide, and Mrs. Hilson, made the most of three trifling parts, and Barry, as Shakspeare, gave many of the speeches with much spirit and effect; the lower tones of this gentleman's voice are uncommonly rich and mellow. It appeared mighty strange to see William Shakspeare treading the stage in the flesh; and we sincerely pitied the poor people who were unfortunate enough to live before him. Before Shakspeare! It seems now as if before his birth there must have been some huge "gap in nature," which only he could fill up. The scenery is painted from the most authentic drawings of his house at Stratford, the Falcon tavern, the Globe theatre, &c. In the latter view, which is well executed, the artist has introduced one of those silent and eloquent touches by which painters frequently heighten the illusion of the scene, namely, on the playbill attached to the walls of the Globe he has announced Shakspeare's Hamlet for representation, though in that very scene the poet produces the manuscript of that tragedy for the first time. It would, perhaps, be an improvement to substitute—"Park theatre, Saturday evening, Tom and Jerry, with a powerful cast."

The new piece of the Brigand is founded on authentic anecdotes of one of the many famous robber chieftains in the Papal States. It is a regularly constructed melo-drama, composed of the old materials, love and murder, interspersed with singing and dancing. The scenery is entirely new and very beautiful, particularly the opening view of the Brigand's retreat. It is painted by Walker, whose skill in this department is unrivalled.

It has been insinuated that musical taste is on the decline in New-York; this, however, appears to be a malicious and unfounded assertion, for the popular melody of "Coal-black Rose" continues to be received with the most flattering and gratifying marks of approbation. Seriously, we think this stuff would be more in place amid the sawdust and quadrupeds of a circus than on the boards of the Park theatre. C.

ENGLISH THEATRICALS.

COVENT-GARDEN.

A petit comedy was produced at this house last night under the title of "A Husband's Mistake; or, The Corporal's Wedding." The piece met general approbation. It is a translation from one now playing at Paris, with equal success. The outline of the plot is this: The father of Count Frederic Lousenstein, some years before the period at which the circumstances of the comedy are supposed to have occurred, had rendered essential service to the father of Henrietta, who afterwards became an inmate in the house of the Baron; an affection sprung up in the breast of Henrietta for the young Count, who subsequently went into the service of the Russians, and was absent for several years, he having fallen in love with a young lady, who subsequently is united to the Baron Saldorf, who is one of those good-natured sort of elderly gentlemen who are anxious to look at every occurrence in its most favourable light, and holds a colonel's commission in the militia. The comedy opens, when it is fixed that Fritz shall the next day be married to Henrietta, who had latterly, having been left in a state of destitution, by the kindness of the Baroness Saldorf, been placed with Madame Gigot, a dressmaker and milliner. The Baroness was subjected to much indisposition, which was not a little increased by the intelligence of the return of Count Frederic Lousenstein from the Russian army. The Baron, on the evening in question, goes to a party, leaving Henrietta to take care of his wife. Henrietta, however, finding that the latter grew better in the course of the evening, resolves on not sleeping at the Baron's house, and returns home to her own bed, leaving, whilst she ran across the street to ascertain whether the door of Madame Gigot's house was fastened, the private-door of the mansion open, and ere she had returned, the Count, who had concealed himself behind a balcony, enters for the purpose of obtaining an interview with the Baroness. The Baron, at length comes from the party, and after knocking several times is admitted. The Count is then seen endeavouring to make his escape, and all hope of retreating down stairs being cut off, he resolves to get over the balcony into the street. This he does by means of tying his sash to it, but unfortunately in his descent he places his foot on the shoulder of Fritz, who, though an upholsterer, was on guard as a corporal. Fritz gives the alarm, and the Count is secured; the Baron comes out in his robe-de-chambre, and on learning the scrape the Count has got into, desires him to hold his tongue, imagining that the visit had been paid to Henrietta, and he will manage the affair for him. The Count is set free, to the great annoyance of Fritz, who is excessively indignant that his activity should not have met with more encouragement or a reward. The Count failing in his attempt to see the Baroness, then requests Henrietta to convey a message, in answer to which he receives a note, imploring of him not to force himself into her presence until he shall have united himself to one worthy of him, and thus secure her honour as well as his own. The Count's consent to this, according to the words in the Baroness's note, is to be written and delivered to herself, she hiding her person behind a curtain in a pavilion in the gardens. In the meantime, the jealousy of Fritz has been excited by a conversation he overheard in the garden between the Count and Henrietta, in the course of which the former gives her a gold chain, as a token of his friendship; and a kiss, as a remembrance of former times. Fritz relates this to Madame Gigot, who, having a strong hankering after Fritz's money, urges him on until he declines the honour of an union with Henrietta, and consents to marry Madame. The Count is bound not to inform the Baron of his attachment to the Baroness, and Henrietta suffers the scoffs and slurs of Madame and Fritz, until the Count, who says he will prove his innocence, and offers her marriage; by doing which, he conforms to the wishes of his former love, the Baroness, and clears the character of Henrietta. Fritz, when he hears that the latter is guiltless, casts off Madame, and vows to live the life of a bachelor, in remembrance of the new Countess, and trusts that she will favour him with her commands in his line.

This comedy presents several good situations which were greatly relished by the audience. London Traveller.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE PRACTICE OF COOKERY.

THIS is the title of a small volume adapted to the business of every day life, from the press of Messrs. Munroe and Francis, of Boston. It contains a complete system of practical cookery, systematically arranged, and the instructions are conveyed in plain and intelligible language. A work of the kind, written in the familiar style of this valuable little volume, was much wanted. It is true that the Prince des Cuisiniers Ude has lately issued works which would seem to render any further knowledge of what this ingenious professor terms "the noble science of gastronomy" superfluous. Dr. Kitchiner has also left behind him a monument of his indefatigable zeal in the art of roasting, boiling, and its infinite addendas. These manuals are not, however, in very extensive circulation. The present work is well calculated to supply the vacuum which still exists in this branch of knowledge. Here, the most fastidious taste may be catered for, according to the best and most approved rules, and the moderate will find an ample number of receipts expressly for their use. The volume contains one thousand four hundred and nineteen articles, arranged under their distinct heads. Every department is preceded by useful preparatory remarks, a method which will be found particularly convenient. We cannot enter into any lengthened detail of the separate merits of the work; but we may assure the reader that every branch of the science is well and amply provided for. Soups from the imperial mulligatawny and much revered turtle, down to the latest invention of the classical Meg Merrilies, with all the innumerable intermediate host of simple and high flavoured compounds, are here ably treated, and from actual experiments may be safely relied upon. The mysteries of roasting and boiling, stewing and frying, and the almost endless variety of sauces, all receive that attention their importance demands. Pastries, confectionary, preserving, pickling, the making of wines, beer, and vinegar, (a knowledge of which is so essential in American housewifery) are all plainly and scientifically explained, that a person without further help than these pages may be enabled to prepare in the best manner the several articles specified. To the practical cook it must be an invaluable book for reference, and no lady who desires to become a cuisinière merely theoretically, should be without this useful appendage to her domestic library. The work is the production of Mrs. Dalgairns, who is said to be a niece of Sir Isaac Coffin; and it is reported that she has been assisted in her labours by the celebrated Captain Basil Hall, no mean authority in these matters, as may be inferred by his eloquent description of his first breakfast on landing in America, together with the numerous hints scattered throughout his late travels in the United States, which proves him to be a tolerably competent judge in the gastronomic art, however deficient he may be in the science of correct observation of men and manners. ARTS AND SCIENCES.

Dew.—The interesting phenomenon of dew was not at all understood until lately, since the laws of radiant heat have been investigated. At sun-rise, in particular states of the sky, every blade of grass and leaflet is found, not wetted, as if by a shower, but studded with a row of distinct globules most transparent and beautiful, bending it down by their weight, and falling like pearls when the blade is shaken. These are formed in the course of the night by a gradual deposition on bodies rendered by radiation colder than the air around them, of the moisture which rises invisibly from water surfaces into the air during the heat of the day. In a clear night the objects on the surface of the earth radiate heat upwards through the air, which impedes not, while there is nothing nearer than the stars to return the radiation; they consequently soon become colder, and if the air around has its usual load of moisture, part of this will be deposited on them, exactly as the invisible moisture in the air of a room is deposited on a cold bottle of wine when first brought from the cellar. Air itself seems not to lose heat by radiation. A thermometer placed upon the earth any time after sun-set until sun-rise next morning, generally stands considerably lower than another suspended in the air a few feet above it; owing to the radiation of heat upwards from the earth, while the air remains nearly in the same state. During the day, while the sun shines, the earth is much warmer than the air. The reason why the dew falls, or forms so much more copiously upon the soft spongy surface of leaves and flowers, where it is wanted, than on the hard surface of stones and sand, where it would be of no use, is the difference of their radiating powers. There is no state of the atmosphere in which artificial dew may not be made to form on a body, by sufficiently cooling it, and the degree of heat at which it begins to appear is called the dew point, and is an important particular in the meteorological report of the day. In cloudy nights heat is radiated back from the clouds, and the earth below not being so much cooled, the dew is scanty or deficient. On the contrary, when uninformed persons would least expect the dew, viz. in warm very clear nights, and perhaps when the beautiful moon invites to walking, and music adds its charm, as in some of the evenings of autumn with the harvest moon and harvest occupations—then is the dew more abundant, and the danger greater to delicate persons of talking harm by walking among the grass. THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Colonel Richard Platt.—New-York has lost, during the present season, a number of her most time-honoured and patriotic sons. Henry Rutgers, John Delancey, and last, not least, the eminent veteran whose name heads this article, have paid that tribute to nature which all mortals must, be it sooner or later, render to her unalterable decrees. Colonel Platt early distinguished himself in the contest for our independence. He accompanied the brave and intrepid Montgomery to Canada, shared in the toils and privations which befell the army after the unfortunate result of the attack on Quebec, and displayed throughout every vicissitude of prosperous or adverse fortune, a magnanimity and resolution which bought for him "golden opinions from all sorts of people." On his return from Canada he was not idle, but was forthwith employed by congress and Washington in arduous and responsible stations. He served under General M'Dougal, as aid-de-camp, in the expedition to Virginia against Lord Cornwallis, was present at the siege of Yorktown, and acted as deputy-quartermaster-general on the day of the surrender of the British army to the united forces of America and France. He continued in the service of his country until the close of the war, and since that period he has borne the not unenviable character of a good man and patriotic citizen. His death has elicited the sympathetic condolence not only of his few surviving associates who participated in the glory of his early career, but of all his fellow-countrymen who respect gallantry, worth, and honourable old age. His remains were interred on Saturday, attended to the grave by a military escort, the members of the Cincinnati, and a respectable number of friends and townsmen.

"How sleep the brave, who sink to rest
By all their country's wishes blest!
When spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than fancy's feet have ever trod."

Credit.—There is no paper published in the United States of America from which original articles, both in prose and verse, are more frequently copied than the Mirror—none from which credit is so frequently withheld. Why is this? If the productions of our correspondents are worthy of being transplanted into other columns besides those in which they originally appear, they surely merit a passing acknowledgment. We are the more serious in advancing this claim, not so much on account of the injury done to ourselves, but because we deem it gross injustice to the writers. We have long forbore to mention the subject, but its repetition has become so common and constant, that silence on our part would be deservedly deemed a tame submission to imposition of the most ungenerous kind. We have now upon our table the Philadelphia Album, in which a number of the Little Genius is copied among the original articles of that miscellany: in the same impression the admirable sketch from Ianthe, entitled the Sceptic, meets with similar treatment, and in another the tale of the Banker and the King, &c. "Revolutionary Recollections," and numerous other articles have been in the same manner re-printed by more than a dozen papers now before us. Several journals have in like manner appropriated the popular morceau on Steam from the pen of C. Is this fair and honourable? We shall hereafter notice every similar infringement.

P. S. We have just opened the American Commentator, which contains the facetious Biography of Jacob Hays by C. published in our columns a few weeks since. No acknowledgment, as usual.

American Monthly Magazine.—Mr. Willis, in the last number of his magazine, asks the modest question, "What is to become of the numerous periodicals now published in this country?" For an answer he refers all but his own to Lethé. Now it requires no deep foresight into futurity to foretell the doom to which the "American Monthly" is fast devoting itself. It is "more in sorrow than in anger," that we are compelled to give utterance to an opinion too widely entertained not to have some foundation in fact, that Mr. Willis has neither the talents, taste, industry, nor tact, requisite to the skilful management of a literary periodical which shall reflect credit on the country. We have predicted better things on former occasions; but conceited egotism, flippant arrogance, mawkish sentimentality, we did not take into the account. Well had it been for thee, Mr. Willis, had these pretty perfections remained unwritten.

The United States' Navy.—Can it be possible that the facts which have been lately adduced in some of the daily papers of our city, touching this important branch of our national defence, are true? Is it indeed to be believed, that a large number of the individuals who are engaged by the recruiting officers are inveigled into the service by means the most degrading to its character and dignity, and demoralizing to themselves? Can it be that in an enlightened and moral community, intemperance shall be patronised, for the odious purpose of blinding men into situations, from which perhaps their interest and that of their helpless moments ought to divest them? Better by far let resort be had to impressment, as practised openly in England, if not by the authority, at least by the connivance of the law. Shame to the system that must thus be upheld, and greater shame to that which reduces men to the degraded condition of being at the mercy of every petty tyrant dressed in a little brief authority! We shall not pursue this subject further at present, but wait for some explanation from the competent authorities.

The term religion.—In order to understand the true meaning of many words, it is necessary to examine their etymology. With respect to the term religion we find it to be derived from re and ligo, signifying to bind anew, in other words, to reunite or tie together two things which were once connected, but are now separated. Practical religion, therefore, is a sincere and continued exertion on the part of man to become again united with that Divine Being from which he has been separated by the hereditary corruptions of his own fallen nature; to that Being who says, "If ye will turn to me, I will turn to you." This re-union is not fully effected until duty and inclination are also united and become one; that is, until duty becomes a pleasure, or until we practise virtue because we love it.

Miss Fanny Kemble.—I am told, says a writer in the Monthly Magazine, that half a hundred of our young heirs are ready to fling themselves at her feet already. That St. James's is only a sort of preserve for her; and that she may bag guardsmen, diplomats from fifteen to five-and-twenty, and lords by courtesy, like pheasants, for the mere trouble of a shot at them. She is certainly clever; and for the good of the falling or fallen stage, will, it is to be hoped, be contented to be a tragedy queen, without being in a hurry to be a tenth-rate courtesan. She has figure, voice, and features for the theatre. All imperfect still. But she has dramatic thought; palpable poetry of conception; and a strong sensibility to the grace, force, and majesty of the stage.

A lean man.—An extraordinary phenomenon, says the Boston Daily Advertiser, is now to be seen in this town. This is a person so emaciated that his bones, muscles, and tendons are to be seen through the skin. Although so wasted as scarcely to appear to be a human being, he has a good appetite, and retains the strength of an ordinary man. No satisfactory cause has been discovered for this extraordinary change. We understand he has been visited by Dr. Warren and other medical gentlemen, who have pronounced him the most remarkable specimen of a walking anatomy which has ever been witnessed in this country.

Lawrence's monument.—Could we place any reliance on the active propensities of our corporation, we should be incited to cherish the hope that the dilapidated monument of this lamented and heroic naval chieftain may be replaced by a new one, worthy of his fame, and consistent with the dignity of the city which entombs his remains.

Shameful.—It is announced in the Paris papers of the twelfth of January, that "a number of female prisoners" would stand in the pillory the next day—a spectacle which could scarcely be expected in the capital that boasts of being the most refined, gallant, and enlightened of the world.

Correction.—From an article in one of the morning papers, it appears that the Boston Galaxy was in an error respecting the authorship of the tragedy attributed to the pen of the late Mr. Carter. He wrote no such play.

Charles Matthews.—The Paris papers, on authority from London, announces the death of Charles Matthews, the celebrated comedian.

VARIETIES.

NAPOLEON took great pleasure in private theatricals; he delighted in seeing plays acted by persons whom he knew; he sometimes even paid us compliments. But as to myself, although I was as much amused by them as any of the party, I was more than once obliged to represent to Napoleon that my occupation did not leave me sufficient leisure to learn my parts; he would then assume a caressing manner, and say to me, "Come, come, Bourienne, no more of this; you have such a good memory; you know that I am amused by it; you see that these meetings enliven Malmaison, and make us all gay. Josephine is very fond of them; get up a little earlier in the morning." "In truth I have a great deal of time for sleep, have I not?" "Well, Bourienne, do it for my sake; you make me laugh so heartily; do not deprive me of this pleasure, I have not many such, as you well know." "Ah! by heavens, I am not the man to deprive you of it; I am delighted to be able to contribute to your recreation." And I again applied myself to the study of my character.

WET FEET.—We are often asked, says the Baltimore American, to speak a word of remonstrance to our ladies; who, in the present condition of the streets, "neither sea nor good dry land," are seen perambulating in prunelle shoes, in despite of the Journal of Health and the suggestions of good taste. We do not like to take the place of papa or the doctor; but we can say that this enormous sacrifice to vanity does not to the imagination by wet shoes and soiled hose, nor by seeing a fairy foot tripping it daintily in a kennel.

AN IRISH ADDRESS.—A ship letter from America was lately received at the post-office at Londonderry, addressed to "Matthew Craig's mother, Ireland," and, astonishing to tell, it reached the person for whom it was intended, although she resides about seven miles distant from that city, in the neighbourhood of Dunninmana. The contents were equally extraordinary; among other things, he stated his disappointment at remaining so long a bachelor, and assigned as the reason, "that the American women were very distant to Irishmen."

KEEPSAKE FRANÇAIS.—The Parisian publishers have put forth their annuals in imitation of the Bijou, New Year's Gift, &c.; and among others is one called the Keepsake Français, which professes to contain some unknown pieces by Lord Byron, and an unpublished drama by Sir Walter Scott, written thirty years ago.

ASTRO LAMPS.—The new mode of lighting theatres by means of the concentration of rays of light, which was first adopted in Milan, and which was unsuccessfully tried, in the first instance, at the opera house in Paris, is now perfect, and is found to answer the purpose admirably. The apparatus, which is called an astro lamp, is a sort of artificial sun, which diffuses its light equally over the stage and the audience.

ARGUMENTATIVE.—While an old farmer in Connecticut was flogging one of his graceless sons, a pumpkin-headed fellow about eighteen, an idea all of a sudden entered the head of doubling a salary.—When George Colman was manager of the theatre royal, Haymarket, one of the most useful class of actors applied to him for an engagement "to do any thing." "Can you," said the wag, "undertake to double Gobbo with Gratiano, Salario, and Salarino?" "I can double the first three," said the poor actor, "very well, if you will undertake to double Salarino."

RAPID TRAVELLING.—A traveller on a miserable lean steed, was hailed by a Yankee, who was hoeing his pumpkins by the roadside—"Hallo! friend," said the farmer, "where are you bound?" "I'm going out to settle in the western country," replied the other. "Well, get off and straddle this here pumpkin-vine, it will grow and carry you faster than that ere beast."

THE WOMAN WHO WENT ABROAD.—A lady who was in the habit of spending much of her time in the society of her neighbours, happened one day to be taken suddenly ill, and sent her husband, in great haste, for the physician. The husband ran a few rods, but soon returned, exclaiming, "My dear, where shall I find you when I get back?"

STEEL NECTAR.—The colonel of a regiment of militia was informed that one of his men had run his sword through his body. On inquiry he found that he had sold his sword to buy liquor.

THE BACHELOR.

A BACHELOR, cupiens ducere sponsum,
Et invitus querere through shame or through fear,
 Was exercised strangely quàm pararet unam,
Sed cogitans denique saw his way clear.
 Possessing abundance tum dicebat secum,
Jam, jamque aggrediar what can I do,
 I'll build me a mansion et visunt tum mecum
Qua bonæ consultæ and beautiful too.
Hæc dicens, ac sperans he raised a proud dome,
 And welcomed his friends sed, O, frustra inuulse,
Amatrices venient wishing a home,
 But this, though 'twas sad, tamen videter dulce.
Frequenter in curru he reeled through the town,
 And bowed to the fair semper incontinentis,
Sed causa timoris one called him a clown,
 By others insipiens est nominatus.
 Ah! wherefore this rite si me non possidere?
Cruenta fortuna, oft he'd exclaim;
 As the winds nunquam potest quos plaga tenere,
Inconstans, O fœmina, fickle, untame!
 Resolving etiamnum perseverare,
Hic omnia tentavit till hope had quite flown;
 Then silent sat down stimulatus jurare,
Ut propter ultionem he'd still live alone!

TO A BUTTERFLY SEEN IN BROADWAY.

"Wherefore, little fluttering thing,
 "With the rainbow-tinted wing,
 "And the right at will to rove
 "Flowery hill-slope, glen, and grove,
 "Hast thou left thy native home
 "O'er the city's walks to roam?
 "Here's no fitting place for thee,
 "Bright companion of the bee;
 "Born, like her, in light to sip
 "Nectar from the rose's lip,
 "Or with fairies gay to dwell
 "In the blossom-breathing dell.
 "Here thou'lt find no green retreat
 "From the fainting summer's heat.
 "No glad shelter from the storm
 "Meet to shield thy tinsel form,
 "Like the lily's halls of gold,
 "Or the tulip's purple fold;
 "Whilst the sordid dust that falls
 "O'er the city's tainted walls,
 "Mantling still mid glare or gloom,
 "Deep will soil thy radiant plume.
 "Haste thee hence where skies are fair—
 "Cool as spring the summer air—
 "Bright, as tears affection sheds,
 "Dews that gem the violet beds—
 "Pure as morn the perfumed breeze—
 "Sweet the woodland melodies—
 "Fresh the very noontide shade
 "In the forest and the glade—
 "And where harmony and glee,
 "Wanderer, wait to welcome thee!"
 "Hold thee now," the bright-winged cries,
 "Cease thy fancied rhapsodies,
 "Till I briefly tell thee why
 "Hither I came dancing by.
 "Glance thou up the marbled way—
 "Seest thou beauty's proud array?
 "Tinted silks, like autumn trees,
 "Waving brightly to the breeze?
 "Painted plumes of varied dyes,
 "Rich as birds' of paradise?
 "Golden brooch and diamond rare,
 "Radiant flashing to the air?
 "These are but the mimic dress
 "Of my liveried loveliness,
 "And where gaud and pomp abound
 "Should not nature's belle be found?
 "Mark again the motley throng
 "By thy side that sweep along—
 "Born of fortune's fostering rays,
 "Here the dapper coxcomb strays,
 "Here the idler idly stares
 "At the coquette's simpering airs;
 "Here the proud one bends his brow
 "For the dip of beauty's bow;
 "Here the reckless and the gay
 "Sport life's summer hour away.
 "These my 'kith and kin' are all,
 "Low and lordly, great and small;
 "And where'er my kindred be
 "Is't not fitting place for me?"

PROTEUS.

THE GIFTED.

He was a son of genius—mind
 Threw o'er his face a sparkling light,
 And soaring fancy, unconfined,
 Scattered rich gems in each new flight;
 Gems in no borrowed lustre drest,
 Pure from the unfathomed mine of thought,
 More brilliant and more rich confest,
 Than if from stores of learning brought.

He was a son of genius—life
 Was full of visionary things;
 The grovelling earth, its care and strife,
 Were not for his imaginings.
 He half disdained his fellowship
 With those who could not feel like him—
 And I have seen him curl his lip,
 And laugh as if from sudden whim.

And noting then the strange surprise,
 The cold uncomprehending look
 Contempt has spoken from his eyes,
 And few could the expression brook;
 And those who loved him grieved to see
 How few could love him, while his heart
 Rejected all the sympathy
 Which common feelings could impart.

He had no common feelings—his
 Were wild, uncertain, fitful gleams—
 He saw the world, not as it is,
 But as it seemed in fancy's dreams.
 The gifted are not happy—yet
 The thoughtless envy them those powers
 Which often in the mind are set
 To fit the heart for gloomy hours.

He could not feel as others do,
 Who take from ordinary things
 Their cast in life—and thus pursue
 In beaten tracks their wanderings;
 He sought the untrodden paths of light,
 And drew from earth and sky and sea,
 Their hidden treasures; all too bright
 For life in its reality.

He was a son of genius—hope
 To him was like the eagle's plume,
 Its highest visions were the scope
 Of all his thoughts; yet morbid gloom
 Would sometimes hover o'er his heart—
 A dark impervious ægis there—
 While joy and pleasure stood apart,
 And cast their smiles upon the air.

He was a son of genius—love
 Within his deep impassioned breast
 Was not a feeling which could rove,
 Neither in which he might be blest.
 There was but one in the whole range
 Of the vast universe, whose lot
 He would have linked with his—'twas strange;
 Alike in soul—she loved him not.

Why it was thus he never tried
 To know—enough that he had deigned
 To offer her his heart—his pride
 Persuaded not, nor yet complained.
 But he forsook the crowded halls,
 And shunned awhile the haunts of men;
 Immured within his study walls,
 He gave his feelings to his pen.

"The thoughts that breathed, the words that burned,"
 Rushed swiftly o'er the trembling lyre,
 As if in quenching love he'd learned
 To light anew bright genius' fire.
 And then he sought the voice of fame
 To drown that silent memory;
 And strained each nerve to give his name
 The shade of immortality.

He had a noble spirit—all
 That made him seem at times unkind,
 Was, that his friends appeared so small,
 In contact with his giant mind;
 And half in sorrow, half in scorn,
 He coldly, carelessly passed on—
 Grieved and yet proud that he was born
 To stand thus in the world alone.

Such was the gifted—envy not
 His strange and wayward destiny:
 There is no bliss in such a lot,
 Where none can feel in sympathy.
 Better to have a kindred mind
 With beings in a humbler sphere
 Than those deep feelings, too refined
 For mortals while they linger here.

VIEWS OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

THE ENGRAVING.

On presenting our readers with a plate exhibiting, at one view, no less than six houses of worship, all belonging to societies of similar religious persuasion, we repeat our former avowal of the strictest impartiality. "Whatever be the subject of our engravings, our motive in the selection is totally unbiassed by party or sectarian views." Generally speaking, presbyterians (English and Dutch) were the earliest settlers of this country, and any authentic tradition relating to their public edifices must, consequently, be interesting to the historian and antiquary.

In the brief sketch of the Bowling-Green, published in the twenty-ninth number of this volume, an allusion was made to a fortress, called Fort Amsterdam, erected by the first Dutch adventurers who took up their permanent residence on this island. On searching further into the history of those times, it appears that several years previous to the commencement of this fort, a small redoubt had been built on a site that overlooked the Hudson, viz. at the corner of Garden-street and Broadway. The Manhattan Indians were at first so much opposed to their new neighbours, that they refused to sell them a foot of land on the island; but, becoming more reconciled by degrees, and pleased with the profusion of beads, trinkets, blankets, and hatchets sent over for that purpose by the "Privileged Trading Company" of Amsterdam, they were at length persuaded to sell all the lower part of the island.

About the year one thousand six hundred and twenty-three, the new settlers obtained leave of the natives "to build a better fort on Manhattan Island," which they finished in the form of a regular square, with four bastions, "on a piece of land at the junction of the North and East rivers." At different periods this fort was improved and strengthened, by adding a second wall of stone outside the first, and increasing the thickness of the bastions. The Dutch director-general and the commandant, besides several other officers, had houses erected for them within the walls of this fortress: and, in 1612 or 1643, the first church ever erected in New-York was built in the south-east corner of it. This edifice was of stone, with a shingle roof, and cost twenty-five hundred guilders. It was seventy-two feet in length, fifty in breadth, and sixteen in height. In the mean time such persons as arrived from Holland to settle in the "New Netherlands," as it was then called, and who could not obtain a residence within the fort, erected houses near the walls of it, on the south-east side, and thus commenced the first street ever made in this city, now called Pearl-street.

In the year 1653, the new colony had increased to above one hundred houses, containing nearly one thousand inhabitants. They now determined, in imitation of the Chinese, to secure themselves against the aggressions of their savage neighbours, by building a "great wall" on their northern frontier. This formidable barrier, which was constructed of earth and stone, extended across the island, from river to river, between our present Wall and Pine streets. It had a gate in Broadway, called the land-gate, and another in Pearl-street, called the water-gate.

The Dutch church was, of course, the first organized in this city and state, (then colony,) and was composed of emigrants from Holland, under the name of the Reformed Dutch Church of North America. It was supplied with ministers from Amsterdam, through the agency of the directors of the Dutch West India company, under whose immediate patronage the emigrants had placed themselves. During the period which intervened between the settlement of the colony and its surrender to the English, in the year 1664, churches were planted at New-York, Flatbush, New-Eutrecht, Flatlands, Esopus, and Albany. The first one duly organized, however, was in this city, and held their meetings for worship in the edifice before mentioned, within the walls of Fort Amsterdam. The records of this church extend back as far as the year 1639. Their first minister was the Rev. Gerardus Bo-gardus; but the Rev. Samuel Megapolensis, a doctor of physic, held that station when the British forces took possession of the colony in 1664. In the following year the English governor, Nichols, gave permission to the Lutherans to send for and settle a minister of their persuasion in the city; and in February, 1669, Jacobus Fabricius arrived for that purpose. In the year 1771, the Rev. Samuel Driscus, a Dutch minister, applied to the governor and council to have two years' arrears of salary paid up; but as he had been sick one year they refused, and only paid him one hundred pounds sterling, recommending the elders and deacons to help him further.

The second place for worship, built by the Dutch, was a chapel, erected by Governor Stuyvesant on his bowery or farm, at what date we are not informed. But on the eighth day of December, 1691, a piece of ground was granted for the purpose of erecting a church in Garden-street, now Exchange-place, "for one hundred and eighty current pieces of eight, at six shillings per piece, to be paid upon sealing the patents; the city selling only their right and property; the said lot not to be appropriated to any other use or assigned to any other person." This grant was accepted by Aldermen Johannis Kip and Brandt Schuyler, in behalf of the Dutch church; the size of the lot being "one hundred and seventy-five feet on the north, and one hundred and eighty feet on the south, English measure." The first church erected on this spot was completed in 1693; although the project, from first to last, was strenuously opposed by the "down-town members," on account of the location being "so far out of the city." In 1766 the building was enlarged and improved; and, in 1807, gave place to the present handsome and commodious edifice, with a view of which our present number is embellished, and which is called the

SOUTH DUTCH CHURCH.

This building, more generally known by the name of "Garden-street church," is a plain neat substantial house of stone, eighty-six feet in length and sixty-six in breadth. It contains one hundred and twenty-two pews on the first floor and fifty-four in the gallery, together with a large and fine-toned organ. There is an open balcony on the tower, in which is the same bell that belonged to the primitive edifice, and which was originally brought from Holland, and was used to convene all public meetings of the civil authorities and citizens. The Rev. James M. Mathews is the present officiating clergyman.

MIDDLE DUTCH CHURCH.

This ancient and spacious edifice, which fronts on Cedar, Liberty, and Nassau streets, was erected in the year 1729. It is constructed of plain stone, with a lofty hip roof, and an antiquated tower, lighted by loop holes. Its size is one hundred feet in length by seventy-five in breadth, containing one hundred and eighty pews on the first floor, and eighty in the gallery. Its organ is said to be excellent. The tower, which is on the north-east front, in Liberty-street, is divided into four stories, the highest of which contains a well-regulated clock. Above this is an open balcony, with a bell, the whole surmounted by a cupola, gilt-ball, and weathercock, traversing above the four cardinal points of the compass. The latter is a correct representation of "bright chanticleer," in the ancient Dutch taste. In front of the tower, at its base, is a neat portico, leading into the main building, and on each side is a semicircular apartment for the use of the consistory, &c. On the south-west front, in Cedar-street, is a neat portico, or colonnade, surmounted by a plain balcony. Here is the principal entrance, and as the area in front is no longer defaced by graves and tombstones, but has recently been converted into a verdant promenade, it has a very pleasing effect. The whole is enclosed by a handsome new iron railing. During the revolutionary war, while this city was in the possession of the enemy's forces, the Middle Dutch church was converted into a riding-school, to instruct the British cavalry in the art of horsemanship; and the large stone sugar-house, which stands near it in Liberty-street, was used as a prison for the incarceration of prisoners of war.

NORTH DUTCH CHURCH.

This elegant structure, which fronts on William-street, between Fulton and Ann streets, was founded in 1768. It is built of plain stone, and is one hundred feet in length and seventy-five in breadth. A square tower ascends two stories above the roof, from which springs a handsome spire to the height of about two hundred feet from the ground. This spire, which was not added until the year 1823, is considered a very elegant specimen of architecture, and contains a gallery that commands a fine and extensive view. The churchyard is enclosed by a neat substantial iron railing, and the tout ensemble is highly ornamental to the city. The congregation of this church and that of the Middle Dutch (described above) are under one organization, and form a collegiate charge, now under the pastoral care of the Rev. Drs. Kuypers, Knox, Brownlee, and Dewitt.

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The First Presbyterian Church, in Wall-street, between Broadway and Nassau street, was founded in the year 1719, and enlarged about thirty years afterwards. The present edifice, which was erected in 1810, is ninety-seven feet in length and sixty-eight in width. It is built of brown freestone, and the front is ornamented with pillars of the same, in demi-relief, with corinthian capitals. The spire is ornamented with pillars to correspond, and is finished with a low cupola and gilt vane. The yard is small, but neat, and is enclosed with an iron railing. The congregation of this church is under the pastoral charge of the Rev. Mr. Phillips.

SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

This well-known edifice, generally distinguished by the appellation of the Brick Meeting, was erected in the year 1767. It is constructed of brick, and has a lofty spire, which has been recently repaired and newly painted. The main building is eighty-three feet in length by sixty-five in breadth. It appears by the city records, that in 1766 the presbyterians petitioned, in a long and eloquent appeal, "for the angular lot, lately called the vineyard, stating the great increase of that persuasion; the land asked for was unanimously granted to them, at a rate of forty pounds per annum." The grant was made to John Rogers and Joseph Treat, ministers, and John M. Scott, Peter R. Livingston, and others, as trustees. Its dimensions were thus defined: "one hundred and fifty-two feet on the southwest, two hundred and fourteen on the north-west, sixty-two feet on the north-east, and two hundred on the south-east side." The Rev. Gardiner Spring has the pastoral charge of this society.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The Murray-street Church was erected in 1812. It is built of freestone, and is ninety-two feet in length by seventy-seven feet in breadth. The front is faced with hewn brown stone, and is ornamented with pillars of the same in bas relief. The building is surmounted with a handsome spire, rising the height of near two hundred feet, and is separated from the street by a neat iron railing. The late Dr. John Mason was the officiating clergyman for several years. The Rev. Mr. William D. Snodgrass now occupies the pulpit.

In conclusion, it affords us much pleasure to state, that since the practice of burying the dead within the populous parts of the city has been abolished, our church-yards have undergone many important and tasteful improvements, to which we have alluded on another and very different occasion, in the following homely couplets:

"Our church-yards too, where death no more invades,
Are changed to blooming sylvan promenades;
No more profaned by coffins, mounds, and bones,
Sepulchral rites and sorrow's dismal moans,
But dress'd in smiles—such smiles as Eden wore,
When man first knelt his Maker to adore."

ORIGINAL TALES.

AN OLD MAN'S STORY.

It was a glorious evening in autumn when I reached the outskirts of my native village after an absence of nearly forty years, during which time I had been roughly tossed about the rough world, and had contrived to increase my wealth and to impair my health to a considerable extent. A long sojourn in hot climates had broken my hale constitution and mended my broken fortunes, and after years of hard struggling, money and the liver-complaint came into my possession together; for the former I had long cherished a sincere regard, but to the latter I had many objections, upon which it is unnecessary here to dilate. I began to be afraid of being cut off in my prime, (sixty-three) and I disliked the idea of dying for several reasons. For many years I had been in death's way, but always avoided him as much as possible; when on the field of battle I have thought it would be better to meet him quietly and serenely on a sick-bed, and when tossing and tumbling on a sick-bed I have thought it preferable to be introduced to his notice amid the hurry and confusion of a field of battle; in fact, in whatever way he seemed likely to approach, in that way I disliked him most. In the country in which I resided, his usual mode of intruding himself into the company of people was through the medium of his rascally agent, yellow-fever, and so I determined to depart and enjoy the remainder of my days in my native land. Enjoy the remainder of my days! alas! how we misapply words. The time was, when the mere consciousness of existence was enjoyment; when a scamper over the fields, a match at cricket, or a fox-chase was superlative delight; but now age, that is, middle-age, had overtaken me, and all the artificial stimulus that riches could procure, afforded but a fleeting and transitory feeling of something that resembled enjoyment, yet fell far short of the original. But I will not moralize.

As I said, it was a glorious autumn evening when I reached my native village. The golden sun shed his parting rays upon a spot that had long been fondly treasured in memory, and which latterly had seemed so much a picture of the imagination that it almost startled me to look at last upon the reality, and find it so like my day-dream for many a year. As I strolled along and looked around, the unforgotten scenes of many a youthful frolic successively presented themselves to my recollection, and through the dim vista of sixty years, I recalled the days of my childhood.

"I will go to the spot," exclaimed I aloud, "where I used to meet Mary."

And thither I went. It was still the same: a kind of natural harbour formed by nature in the little wood that skirted the village for the accommodation of lovers who might chance to be overtaken in a shower in their evening walks. I began to feel my dormant sensibilities awakening as I stood within it; but perceiving two persons approach, I concealed myself behind some bushes until they should have passed on, as I did not feel in the humour to be accosted by any one in my present state of mind. Unluckily the pair turned directly into the harbour, talking in a melting tone of voice, which sufficiently indicated in what relation they stood to each other. I could not refrain from looking. The girl was extremely pretty, and her delicate complexion and rosy cheeks were peculiarly agreeable to my eyes after the dusky tints I had been so long accustomed to in other latitudes. The youth was a fine, handsome stripling of about nineteen or twenty, with an open, glowing, and good-tempered countenance, mixed with a dash of reckless daring that became it well, just such another as I was myself about his time of life.

"What's the matter, Mary?" tenderly inquired he.

"How can you ask after what you have told me?"

"But you know, dear Mary, I must seek fortune where she is to be found. It is of little avail to linger in this dull spot."

"But where will you go? What will you do?" murmured Mary.

"Go any where—do any thing—go for a soldier, or a sailor,"—the poor girl clung closer to his arm at the idea—"or to India, where I have a rich old uncle—any where so that I make money, and then I will return again to my dear, dear Mary."

To this very definite, feasible, and promising scheme, poor Mary could only reply by tears, which the young rogue took the liberty of kissing away very freely, but at the same time tenderly and respectfully; and after mutual vows, promises, and protestations, they took their departure.

When they were out of sight I crept from my hiding-place very much affected by the scene I had just witnessed, and not a little apprehensive of an attack of the rheumatism from lying so long concealed upon the damp grass. I repaired to the principal village inn, anointed my limbs with some patent preventive rheumatic liniment and retired to rest, determined in the morning to make known to the inhabitants the arrival of their wealthy townsman. But alas! in the morning I found I was amongst strangers. Nearly all who had known me were dead, or dragging out the remainder of their existence elsewhere. A few of my schoolmates indeed called—withered old men—who expressed their regret at my bad looks and infirmities; asked a number of impertinent questions, and then went about their business. My father I knew had long ago paid the debt of nature, and even my little brother Ned had grown up to a man, married, died, and been buried in my absence, and a handsome young fellow was presented to me as poor Ned's lineal descendant. I was not a little surprised, and a good deal pleased to find it was the same youth I had overheard the preceding evening. "Well," thought I, "this is at least some comfort, I will dry up poor Mary's tears." Ned was glad enough to find a rich uncle, and doubtless indulged in all those pleasant visions of the future which young people are so expert in creating. I bought a large house, took him home with me, and soon found there was no living without the rascal. He completely wound himself round my old heart, and no wonder. He was the merriest, hardest, heartiest fellow in creation; could do every thing—dance, sing, hunt, shoot, sail a boat, drive a gig, crack a joke, or tell a story better than any one. Then he was so good-natured, and without the slightest approach to servility, put up with my whims and ill-humour in a way that made me like him ten times more than ever, the moment they were over. The truth was, I had a most unfortunate temper, such as no one could acquire except those who have lived among slaves and under a tropical sun. I was at times a perfect hurricane—a whirlwind—a tornado.

"Ned," said I, one day after dinner while we were taking our wine together, "Ned, my boy, I think it is about time you had a wife."

"Just as you say," returned my dutiful nephew.

"Well then, Ned, I have had some experience among women, and you shall have the advantage of it; I will look out for you."

"I am much obliged to you, my dear uncle, but I have already done that myself," stammered Ned.

I counterfeited a look of infinite surprise.

"And pray who is the lady—what is her name?"

"Mary Russell."

"Mary what!" I exclaimed, my feigned surprise turned to real.

"Mary Russell."

"Not old Russell the upholsterer's daughter, I hope," said I.

"The same."

"Then you shall never marry her, Ned," cried I in a frenzy, "or if you do, I'll disinherit you."

All Ned's blood rushed to his face; if it had not been for the ungenerous threat of disinheriting him, he might have inquired the reasons of my seemingly unaccountable behaviour; as it was, he scorned to do it. His eyes sparkled—he started from his chair and exclaimed,

"But I will marry her, in spite of you and all the world."

I was now in one of my East-India storms of passion. I knew not what I said, except that I uttered a torrent of opprobrious epithets. Ned eyed me fiercely at first, but checking his passion he waited quietly until I had exhausted myself, and then advancing towards me said—

"Sir, do not think I mean in the slightest degree to deprecate your anger or shrink from what I have said"—he paused a moment, then seized me by the hand and exclaimed—"you have been kind—very kind to me, and I thank you for it, but henceforth we are strangers. I wish you, sir, long life, good health, a better temper, and a more submissive dependant," and he left the room.

I raved like a madman. But I must first give some explanation of my very extraordinary conduct. The case stood thus. When a stripling of twenty, I loved or fancied I loved, Miss Mary Jenkins, and Miss Mary Jenkins loved or fancied she loved me. At a ball one evening, she gave it as her opinion, that Mr. John Russell, a person for whom I had a great contempt, executed a pigeon-wing in a manner superior to any one in the room. Now I piqued myself excessively on my dancing, and taking this as a personal insult, I insinuated that Miss Jenkins knew nothing of the matter. Miss Jenkins replied that I was a puppy, I retorted that she was a flirt; both were probably right, but that went for nothing. She commanded me never to speak to her again, and I took her at her word. In about a week, however, I began to show symptoms of repentance, and made overtures for a reconciliation; but judge of my surprise when I was given to understand she was about to be married to another, and that the gentleman was no other than the identical Mr. John Russell. We met in the street—quarrelled—I sent him a challenge,—it got wind, and we were both held to bail to keep the peace towards each other, and I left the place determined to have my revenge one day or other. With a person of another temperament this would soon have been forgotten; but I was of an unforgiving disposition, and I nursed my wrath for years, until it exploded in the above discreditable manner.

After Ned was gone, I felt thoroughly ashamed of myself. I halloed to him, but he would not turn, so I put my dignity in my pocket, my hat on my head, and ran after him. He was going straight towards old Russell's dwelling. I strove to overtake him before he reached it, and in my hurry struck my foot against a stone, and my pericranium came in contact with the pavement in a way that must have knocked my brains out if I had had any; but my conduct has doubtless already shown that there was no danger of such an event.

When I recovered I found myself in a comfortable bed, the room half darkened, and my head bandaged. The door opened and two persons approached the bed side. I counterfeited sleep, and found it was Mary Russell and my nephew. It appeared I had been five days in a delirious fever, and Ned, poor boy, was expressing the utmost solicitude for my recovery, and at the same time cautioning Mary never to let me know that he had been there. I could contain myself no longer. "Ned," cried I, "you shall marry the girl," both started, and this, the first sensible thing I had said or done, was taken for a fresh proof of insanity. But I soon convinced them I was sane—"Ned," I repeated, "you shall marry the girl—you shall have half my fortune now, and the rest when your old uncle dies." In short all was reconciled. My old flame and her husband came up stairs; I found she had left off flirting, and he had quitted pigeon-wings and puppyism—taken to politics and porter, and instead of a consummate coxcomb, and Mary were married, and it made me feel quite young again to look at the fair and blooming bride, dressed in virgin white, and blushing "celestial rosy red—love's proper hue!" And then the bridesmaids skipping about like young fawns; and smirking, giggling, and laughing if a male creature did but so much as look at them. I kissed them all around, and was pronounced the most gallant old gentleman ever seen in those parts, walked a minuet with the bride's mother, told long incomprehensible stories, and was conveyed to bed in a high state of excitement; my head ached in the morning, but got better as the day advanced. I leave the moral of this tale to the ingenuity of the reader.

ZACHARIAH HOWARD.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

SINCE our last two young gentlemen have exposed themselves before the public in a way calculated to draw forth the commiseration of their friends and acquaintances. We had hoped that the forcible eloquence of thin houses would have put a stop to those first appearances; but the nuisance continues unabated, and no kind of discouragement seems able to extinguish the tragic fires of the "young gentlemen of this city." If these immodest aspirants, in consequence of an imperfect education, or keeping bad company, have been visited with an histrionic malady, why do they not go and work it off in some barn or spouting-club, and not disgrace the boards of a metropolitan theatre with their crude conceptions, awkward gestures, and distressing elocution? Do such people really imagine that their efforts will afford instruction or gratification to the spectators? Men of eagle genius—Kean, and Cooke, and Kemble—had to undergo years of preliminary drilling before they were thought worthy to appear upon the boards of a decent theatre; then by what spell—"what conjuration, or what mighty magic," do those misguided and ill-informed young men hope at once to attain perfection, and successfully personate the highest characters of the drama on the boards of the first theatre in the Union? Yet within a few months, no less than six persons, answering this description, have made their debut as Octavian, the best of whom, to speak in moderate language, was most execrable. We never remember to have seen the tragic more completely burlesqued than on one of these occasions, after listening to one of Florant's glowing descriptions of the godlike form and features of her lover, to behold one of nature's most insignificant productions come waddling across the stage, who looked more like an unfortunate cobbler that had seen better days, than the proud and lofty Spanish grandee; and whose voice, when he spake of love, sounded like a man's that had been brought up in a swamp—or like an old fisherman's, a strange combination of fog and brandy! In the present case the gentleman that attempted Othello failed in the very easiest part of it, namely, in colouring or discolouring his countenance; instead of a genuine blackamoor, he merely looked like a white man with a dirty face. Of his personation of the "wrong'd Othello" we say nothing, excepting that Othello was never so "wrong'd" before. And then, it is also exceedingly disagreeable to see the females of the theatre hauled about in the clumsy embraces of all sorts of people that choose to make themselves ridiculous; such things are very easy in private, but it requires tact and practice to embrace a lady with decency in public. What we wonder most at is, how the manager reconciles it to his conscience to allow of these proceedings. We are informed that the other night the worthy treasurer really felt as if he was doing an act of injustice to receive the money that was proffered him for admission; and, moreover, that on a stranger inquiring the price of tickets, and being answered one dollar, Mr. Barnes, who happened to be in the box-office, made a precipitate retreat—his cheeks suffused with blushes! The manner in which the audience applaud every three words that happen to be plainly spoken, is one of those unaccountable mysteries which it is vain to endeavour to solve. C.

THE FINE ARTS.

INMAN'S PORTRAIT OF VAN BUREN.

It has been insinuated, at divers times, that our worthy corporation were not over and above economical in their expenditure of the city funds, and that the appropriations for suppers, Sing-sing excursions, turtles and wines, were uncommonly liberal. We have always maintained that these were only the pleasant and indispensable perquisites of office, and that upon proper occasions the corporation would be found as pinching and parsimonious as they were at other times rect. The manner in which they have haggled and bargained about the price of Mr. Inman's portrait of Van Buren conclusively shows, that however bounteous and unsparing they may be when choice viands and cookery are concerned, yet in such a mere mechanical art as painting they are determined to save as many dollars as possible. We do not know whether there is any truth in the report afloat, that one of the fathers of the city, noted for acuteness, compared—that is measured—the picture with others in the room, and found that it lacked three-quarters of an inch in length, and half an inch in breadth, and that upon this being reported to the whole body, they unanimously agreed that a deduction ought to be made in consequence of there not being the full quantity of canvass contracted for. This is probably the ground on which the corporation make a stand, as the picture is universally allowed, by the best judges, to be a capital likeness, and an admirable work of art; but this, of course, all goes for nothing, if it is not full-sized; and we presume that no one will dispute the axiom laid down by the corporation—that there ought invariably to be more paid for a large picture than a small one. Seriously, the late discussion was disgraceful to the city. We are always making a noise about the encouragement of painting in this country, and contending that its advancement does not depend upon aristocratic patronage. Perhaps this is true—but painters must have patronage of some kind, and if in these United States there is neither aristocratic, nor federal, nor democratic patronage, it follows that United States' artists must be very badly patronised; and it is this that drives all that rise above mediocrity to seek fitting remuneration in Europe. Hundreds of New-York merchants are richer than Italian princes; but where is there one amongst them that takes a young man by the hand, and smooths his path to fame and fortune? Mr. Inman bids fair to be the first portrait painter this country has produced; but we presume in a little time he also will take his departure for England to return no more. Genius cannot be measured by the square foot, or paid according to the ordinary computations of time and trouble; and no man who feels it within him will submit to the petty bargaining of those who have neither taste nor liberality.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

THE GREAT HAARLEM ORGAN.

I LEFT Leyden with regret, and pursued my journey to Haarlem. The canal between the two towns is thought very fine. The greater part of my stay in this place was spent in listening to the famous organ, the finest in the world. It seems made up of the very soul and essence of musical harmony. The variety of its tones is astonishing; and its power of imitating all instruments, whether single or combined, can neither be conceived by those who have not been in Haarlem, nor described by those who have. The warlike flourish of the trumpet, the clear note of the octave, and the mellow tone of the flute, are heard in beautiful succession, when these appear to swell into a thousand instruments, and the senses are nearly overpowered by the united effect of a most powerful and harmonious military band, which again sinks away in those more gentle and impressive sounds which an organ alone can produce. The organist, whose name is Schumann, played a very fine battle-piece, in which every imaginable sound of joy and sorrow, fear, courage, misery, and despair—were combined with the roaring of musketry, the thunderous sweep of cannon, and the loud and irresistible charge of a thousand horses; and commingled with these, during the dread intervals of comparative silence were the shouts of the victors, the lamentations of the wounded, and the groans of the dying. No painting could have presented so clear and terrible a picture of two mighty armies, advancing in battle array, mingling in the mortal conflict, and converting the face of nature into one universal scene of confusion, dismay, and death. Rarely does music produce an effect upon the mind so permanent as either poetry or painting; but, in my own case, there is, in this instance, an exception to the general rule. I have listened to the "notes angelical of many a harp," but never were my ears seized with such raptures as on the evening I passed at Haarlem. The organist afterwards took me up to the organ-loft, where I was favoured with a near inspection. I thought the appearance of the keys very diminutive, when contrasted with the sublime effect produced by them. There are about five thousand pipes belonging to this organ. The largest is thirty-eight feet long, and fifteen inches in diameter. There are many pleasant country residences near Haarlem, among which Hartkamp should be mentioned, being more particularly interesting, as having been at one time the abode of Linnæus, and the place where that famous botanist laid

PRIZE TRAGEDIES.

IN days of yore Melpomene was a proud and haughty dame, who had to be long and ardently wooed before she would vouchsafe her company to any one; she was like one of those fair, unreasonable damsels in the age of chivalry, for whose sake a man had to endure much abstinence, penance, and mortification before he was rewarded with the slightest degree of familiarity; but now she is transformed into a mere modern miss, who will flirt and keep company with all who take the trouble of asking her. And then both her and her votaries have become so mercenary. In former times it was "the divinity which stirred within them" that prompted tragic poets to the creation of those mighty works that have spread a halo around their names; now it is a mere matter of dollars and cents: ours serve for hire, and undertake to manufacture tragedies on any given subject that may be dictated to them. On one point, however, they have decidedly the advantage; if the ancients were superior to the moderns in strength, they are far inferior in productiveness; and an author now litters more literary offspring in a year, than three or four could formerly bring forth in ten. But nature still observes her usual laws, and what is produced with so little trouble and in such abundance, is sickly and short-lived; whilst the rare, but healthy, hardly offspring of the intellects of other years still continue to bloom and "flourish in immortal youth."

The great point of inferiority of the ancients to us was their ignorance of machinery, the discoveries in which we have applied admirably both to physics and literature. Our forefathers were in bodily strength immensely superior to the present slim generation, yet by the aid of engines we can do more in an hour than they could in a year. So it is with the drama. They were giants in intellect, and a tragedy was with them a tremendous mental struggle and victory; with us it is a mere mechanical affair. The matter is a trifle, the manner all in all. We take an interesting anecdote, put it into turgid blank verse, inflate it with bombast and epithets, divide and subdivide it into acts and scenes, and by the aid of machinery, scenery, dresses, and decorations, make it go off with more noise and eclat than can be produced by the most striking and wonderful delineations of human passion. The curious anatomy of the heart of man is not half so imposing as the intricacies of a "grand tramp march;" and a prolonged mock-combat and pantomimic style of giving up the ghost are superior to the very finest poetry. This is not idle complaining. It is so, and will always be so, as long as show is preferred to sense; and such things have probably been much in vogue ever since Thespis played upon a cart, though it was reserved for the present age to be exclusively devoted to them. The "good old times" is now generally allowed to be a misnomer, and it is foolish to affect to lament over them. The world has greatly improved since then; but certainly in most things connected with the drama we have retrograded lamentably. Modern comedies are poor enough; but from two-thirds of modern tragedies, there is no affectation in saying "heaven deliver us!"

The literature of these United States has been made the subject of taunt and ridicule; and it is to be wondered that such has so long been the case when the means of remedying the defect were so easy. It appears that at any time authors can be forced into existence as easily as mushrooms, and it is really curious to observe as soon as a five hundred dollar premium is offered, what a flood of inspiration deluges the whole land! The mere reading of the advertisements created hundreds of tragic poets who never before dreamt of such a thing; and a speculator in quills realized a very handsome profit by buying up all the stock within his reach on the first announcement of the business. The ploughman quitted his plough and wrote a tragedy, the drygood-clerks neglected their customers and wrote tragedies, the frequenters of nine-pin alleys, and similar elegant places of resort, stayed at home o' nights and wrote tragedies; and it is understood that some of them were the most unique things of their kind that were ever submitted to the eye of man. To say nothing of the grammar or the chirography, the violations of the simple rules of Webster's spelling book were grievous in the extreme; and towards the latter end of the fifth act

"Murders were done too terrible for the ear."

In some instances the carnage was immense. Two or three of the much-enduring committee have scarcely recovered from the shock their intellects received, and yet retain a perfectly excusable and natural antipathy for the very name of tragedy. Considering the manner in which they had to addle their brains by perusing all this perilous stuff, there ought certainly to have been a benefit for the remuneration of the sufferers—that is, the committee. This was the prevailing character of the pieces; the authors of whom had taken for their guide Othello's exclamation, "blood, blood, Iago!" and cut short the mortal career of their dramatic personæ with the most unrelenting pens. Others there were of a more lady-like and lachrymatory turn, who dealt in

"Taffeta phrases, silken terms precise,
Three-piled hyperbole, spruce affectation,"

and preferred tea to blood; but they also, in self-defence, were obliged to make away with a great number, as the depth of a tragedy now-a-days depends upon the mortality that takes place among the persons brought together; consequently there is twice as strong an infusion of the tragic in a play where ten people are killed, as there is where only five expire. Soldiers, citizens, peasants, and such parts as are enacted by supernumeraries whose names are not in the bills, are, however, not taken into account, just the same as in real life, when a great outcry is made about a dead general, while the rank and file rot quietly away without any thing being said about the matter.

But Mr. Forrest, Mr. Forrest, what excuse can be made for thee! Thou who didst profess to admire the Indian character, and venerate their great and noble qualities. Was it well done in thee to single out this persecuted race of beings from all the nations and communities of men on the face of the earth, as fit subjects to be hacked and tortured by all the poverty-stricken and unfledged poets in the country? "Call you this a backing of your friends?" Is it not enough that they have been driven from house and home, that their lands have been forcibly wrested from them, and the graves of their fathers violated, but that you must, by holding out a five hundred dollar inducement, hound on all sorts of people to dramatize the lives of their warriors, and put bad grammar and bombast into the mouths of their sachems and orators, that when living they would have blushed to utter? True you have been the means of bringing one good portrait of the Indian on the stage, and when there you did it ample justice; but think, Mr. Forrest, of the number of noble chiefs that have been resuscitated through your means, and transformed into senseless ranting braggadocios. They may not, to be sure, appear in public; but will not their several vain-glorious authors distribute the manuscripts of their unsuccessful efforts among their friends and connexions all over the country, merely to show the incapacity of the committee, thus rendering the Indian character ridiculous, and adding, as it were, insult to injury? If you want more prize tragedies, make the affair general, give the money to the best, but play all that are sent, and let us have a laugh at the whole world. Make no more invidious selections, but let there be classic victims, Grecians and Romans, of whom antiquity furnishes an inexhaustible supply. Besides, it would be a very difficult matter to make another aboriginal tragedy. Indianisms, such as "smoking the pipe of peace," and keeping the "chain of friendship bright," sound very well when judiciously and sparingly introduced; but it does not answer to compound many long speeches entirely of such figurative fragments.

We perceive Mr. Pelby also advertises for five hundred dollars worth of tragic inspiration. To this there can be no objection; he, or any other individual, possesses an undoubted right to buy as much bad blank verse as he pleases; but it is to be presumed that there are few real poets who will undertake the composition of this most arduous and difficult species of writing, requiring genius and imagination of the very first order, for the remote prospect of five hundred dollars. Were it three or four times that sum then they might try. If this were to be the case, and it is hinted that there is a probability of such an event, then the whole business ought to be managed in a way that would prevent the slightest possibility of undue influence; not that we mean to hint, in the remotest degree, that this has been the case heretofore, for we are entirely ignorant of the whole transaction; but writing a tragedy is a serious affair, and those who adventure should at least have a full assurance of fair play. The gentleman who proposes the premium ought to stand altogether aloof, and have no concern in the appointment of a committee, further than in nominating two or three literary gentlemen, with whom he is personally unacquainted, to select one. The plays ought to be handed to the committee without their knowing by whom they were written, or from whence they come; for how many, unknown even to themselves, are insensibly biassed by a name; and after that was done, we might say, in the expressive language of the London pugilists, "may the best man win." PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED CHARACTERS.

ROSSINI.

THERE are few circumstances, perhaps, which more forcibly indicate the progressive improvement of a country, than to perceive the inhabitants evincing a growing attachment to the fine arts, and affording a fostering patronage to their professors. Where music, poetry, and painting, fail to receive support and encouragement, it either argues the absence of civilized taste, or that the mass of the people are too deeply engrossed in the one absorbing pursuit, (business) as a necessary means of existence, and are thereby prevented from indulging in these embellishments of life: mere amusement as a relaxation will, under any circumstances, be eagerly sought after, but the refined pleasure and the exquisite gratification resulting from an acquaintance with the fine arts, are but coldly felt and only partially appreciated by those who are compelled to exert all their energies on the every-day concerns of life.

Assuming these propositions as correct, we may certainly claim for the city of New-York the same elevated position among the cities of the Union for her patronage of the fine arts, which she has long attained by her commercial reputation and her vast and growing resources. And in no one branch of the sister arts has this rapid improvement been more manifest than in the advancement of public taste for the best musical compositions. The days are gone by when managers could draw crowds to listen to operas shorn of their most difficult pieces, and represented only by the stock actors of their establishments. The enterprise and exertions of the caterers for public amusements have kept pace with the spirit of their patrons; Phillips and Inledon gave an impetus to the growing taste of the public, which the Garcias completely confirmed: these distinguished professors have been succeeded by a galaxy of musical talent, which has rendered the productions of the best masters familiar to the public ear, and has rendered it conversant with the science of sweet sounds. Operas have become the favourite dramatic entertainment of the day, and music the fashionable pursuit.

Among the masters of this fascinating art none have, in modern times, acquired greater celebrity than the popular composer who forms the subject of our present sketch.

Rossini has long been the worshiped idol of the European musical world, and his works are equally the favourite compositions of amateurs on this continent. An individual thus celebrated, undoubtedly possesses some degree of interest to the general reader. A natural and laudable curiosity is excited regarding those who have rendered themselves eminent in the world by their learning, their prowess, or their efforts towards ameliorating the condition of their fellow-men. The artist who, by his genius, has added to our list of refined gratifications, creates also a desire to become acquainted with his private character, and we delight to trace the rise and progress of that talent which has placed him on the pedestal of fame his established reputation has raised him to.

The object of our present notice was born in 1792, at Pesaro, a small town in the Papal States, situated on the gulf of Venice. It may be truly said of him that he was born to the profession in which he has become so deservedly celebrated, for his father was a musician, and his mother a public singer. Neither of his parents attained any great eminence in their art, being ranked among those perambulating professors who subsist in Italy by travelling from fair to fair, and occasionally accepting engagements from itinerant companies that fall in their way. This uncertain mode of life was shared by Rossini until he attained the age of twelve years, when he was placed by his parents under the care of a professor of music at Bologna, for the purpose of studying the art as a science. Under this master, Rossini was well instructed in the principles of singing, in the art of accompanying, and in the rules of counterpoint. In a few months after commencing his studies he became celebrated for his singing in churches, owing to his fine soprano voice. From the year 1806, he was capable of singing any piece of music at sight, and great hopes were entertained of his arriving at future excellence as a public singer. His handsome figure and graceful person aided these prognostics of his growing fame, and induced his parents to determine upon making a tenor of him. The naturally aspiring mind of Rossini would not submit to this direction of his talents. To be a composer was his aim; and to further his views and to enlarge his experience, he quitted Bologna in 1806, to undertake a musical tour in Romagna. He presided at the piano, as leader of the orchestra, at some of the small towns, and in 1807, entered the lyceum at Bologna, and received lessons in music from one of its most distinguished professors, father Mattei. A year subsequently he was qualified to compose a symphony and a cantata called "Il Piano d' Armenia;" this was his first production of vocal music, and is considered as exhibiting proofs of that excellence he soon attained. He was shortly afterwards elected a director of the academy of Concordi.

In 1810 he was, through the interest of a friend, sent to Venice, where he composed a little opera in one act, called "La Cambiale de Matrimonio." In the autumn of the following year he prepared for representation "L'Equivoco Stravagante;" and then, re-visiting Venice, produced for the carnival of 1812, "L'Inganno Felice." Experienced judges have detected in these early pieces the parent ideas of many of his latest works which have established his character, and are considered the chefs d'oeuvre of Rossini's compositions.

At the carnival of Venice in 1813, he produced his celebrated "Tancredi," a work which immediately created a kind of musical furor. Gondoliers and noblemen were found repeating its most favourite airs; and even in the courts of law the judges were compelled to impose silence on the persons present, who were singing the same passages. By the cognoscenti, Cimarosa was declared to have re-visited the world in the person of the young master; and all classes in that music-loving country were loud in their praises of the distinguished maestro who had furnished them so exquisite a treat in their favourite amusement.

The personal advantages of Rossini have been noticed; these circumstances, added to his extensive popularity, rendered him an immense favourite with the ladies of these southern climes. Many anecdotes of his adventures in this particular might be named, but we forbear, merely stating that he is passionately devoted to the service of the fair sex, and is as enthusiastic in his attachments of this nature, as he is devoted to the science in which he is so successful. With the fickleness frequently the characteristic of genius, he is reported to have been evanescent and changeable in his ardent attentions to his female admirers. In the autumn of 1812, he was engaged at Milan; and shortly afterwards visited his family at Bologna, to whom he was passionately attached. During his absence his mother was his only correspondent; the letters he addressed to her were strikingly indicative of the high estimation in which Rossini holds his talents; they were directed, "To the most honoured Signora Rossini, mother of the celebrated composer in Bologna."

The extraordinary popularity that Rossini so rapidly attained did not exempt him from the severity of criticism; he was charged with transgressing the rules of composition. He agreed with them, and excused himself by saying that he never read his manuscripts twice over. "I have scarcely six weeks to compose an opera in," said he. "During the first month I amuse myself; the last fortnight comes; every morning I write a duet or an air, which is rehearsed in the evening. How is it possible that I can perceive an error in the accompaniments?"

From Bologna, Rossini was engaged to visit all the towns in Italy where there was a theatre. He composed five or six operas in a year, which were received with greater or less success; for no mediocrity is observable in these cases in Italy, where a rapturous and almost exclusive admiration of music exists.

About the year 1814 the fame of Rossini caused him to be engaged at Naples, to produce for the Neapolitan theatres two operas a year, for several years; a task he performed with ease, much to the surprise and annoyance of the inhabitants, who were astonished that there should be so great a composer in the world who was not a Neapolitan. At Naples he composed his brilliant "Elizabetta regina d'Inghilterra," and there also became acquainted with Mademoiselle Colbrand, who subsequently became Madame Rossini. To this lady has been traced many of the deviations from true dramatic expression which are perceptible through Rossini's late productions. Mademoiselle Colbrand had been for some years the prima donna of the theatre at Naples; but age had laid his iron hand upon her powers, and Rossini, enamoured with the lady, gave way to her repeated solicitations to give her such music as she was yet capable of executing with effect.

After the success of "Elizabetta," Rossini went to Rome, and at the carnival in 1816, produced "Torvoldo e Dorliska," and his master-piece the "Barbiere de Seville." He then returned to Naples and produced "La Gazetta," and afterwards "Otello," from thence to Rome for "Cenerentola," and to Milan for "La Gazza Ladra." On his return to Naples he produced "L'Armide," and afterwards "Moise." In 1824 his astonishing popularity induced the proprietor of the King's theatre, in London, to engage him to superintend the orchestra at the performance of his most celebrated productions; it was also announced that he would produce a new opera during his temporary stay, a promise, however, which was not fulfilled. He has since been appointed to the direction of the Academie Musique at Paris, where he has composed many of his generally approved works, some of which have been criticised as being only expansions of his former productions, embellished and altered to suit the taste of the nation which has thus appropriated his labours to itself. His last production, "Guillaume Tell," has called forth all the enthusiasm of that impassioned people. After its first representation the singers and musicians of the grand opera assembled before his residence and serenaded him with the choicest pieces from this work, as a testimonial of their admiration of his talents. An assembled crowd witnessed the performance, and assisted in the enthusiasm excited by the scene.

Rossini is reported to compose with wonderful rapidity; his celebrated "Di tanti palpiti," is said to have been the work of only a few minutes, and bears in Italy the title of the "Rice air," from having been composed while waiting for a plate of rice he had ordered his servant to prepare on returning home one day to dinner—the piece was finished before the dish was brought to him.

We have noticed the high opinion Rossini holds of his talents; intoxicated with praise from his earliest youth he is conscious of his own glory, and has been heard frequently to assert, that "he does not see why Rossini should not hold the same rank as a general of division or a minister of state. The latter has drawn a great prize in the lottery of ambition, Rossini has drawn a great prize in the lottery of nature."

During his short residence in England, many anecdotes were circulated illustrative of his vanity; it was reported among others that he had even carried it to the height of offending the sovereign by its display during the performance of some of his pieces at Carlton palace, at which he presided. One anecdote we shall repeat as being generally understood to be a fact, and with it will close our sketch of this celebrated man. At a musical party, given by one of the nobility during Rossini's stay in London, he was invited to attend; the assemblage was brilliant in the extreme, and the great maestro was the universal point of attraction. The duke of Wellington was also present, and during a temporary cessation of the music, was promenading the rooms with a distinguished peeress, noted for her musical taste. Rossini, elated by the flattering distinction awarded to him so liberally during the evening, stepped up to the lady, and taking her vacant arm exclaimed, "Now, my lady, you are between the two greatest men of the age." The duke, perhaps overpowered by the compliment, turned away without noticing the flattering allusion to his greatness, and the peeress enjoyed a hearty laugh at the whimsical union of talent, which the celebrated composer had so modestly made.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

RATIONAL POETS.

"Ours are the days of fact, not fable."

NOTWITHSTANDING the trite lamentation which so often falls from the lips of age, accompanied with a lackadaisical elevation of the eye-brows, and a melancholy shake of the head, "ah, it was not so in my times," I am inclined to think no times were ever superior to the present. Have we not steam-boats and rail-roads?—(the advantages of which have been too cleverly exhibited by the inimitable pen of C. to require one syllable here)—and more wonderful still, have we not rational poets? Sane lunatics or wise fools would not have conveyed a more incongruous idea to the minds of our forefathers; for in their days the proximity of genius to folly was never doubted, and any parent of common sense, whose child manifested symptoms of poetry, considered the evil more to be deprecated than a defect of vision or speech, being more certainly incurable than either. Every movement of the lisper in numbers was watched. At table turkeys and dishes were carefully moved out of his reach, lest he might mistake either for the bread-basket, and plunge his hand into their smoking contents; and many a cautious two-and-two-maker character, who happened to be seated next him, trembled whenever he seized his cup at the possibility that his face might receive its dregs instead of the slop-bowl. If he walked out to enjoy the freshness of the breeze, and pursue his fancies undisturbed, were there not innumerable chances against his ever returning? Might he not step off the dock in the belief that he was stepping into his own door? Or should he enter a vessel for the purpose of examining its construction, he would probably be borne away to whatever port it was destined, without his cognoscence!

That mental aberration, called absence, which had ever been the attendant of genius would, of course, lead to similar extravagances; and a dirty, slovenly booby, ungartered and unbonneted, stood before their imaginations as the future representative of a respectable name and vast possessions. And was not poverty, the poet's handmaid, nay his very spouse, united to him by a tie indissoluble, save by death? Was not the child of their affections doomed to spend his nights a homeless wanderer, like Johnson and Savage—or like Otway, perish for a crust of bread? Blessed, immeasurably blessed, are parents of the present day unvisited by such distressing forebodings. Thanks to the matter-of-fact atmosphere which surrounds us, a person may wear good comfortable, nay, even fashionable clothing, without losing his reputation as a man of genius. In order to establish a character for originality, it is no longer necessary to resort to eccentricity; and the exclamation shall soon be forgotten, which in by-gone days invariably marked the appearance of any one exceedingly outre and ungainly, "What a queer looking fellow; he must be a genius!" In this spirit was a remark made a few days since by a friend, while walking with me in Broadway, on being informed whom the person we were meeting (wrapped in the immensity of a patrician cloak, whose texture and tassels bespoke a solicitude in the wearer for style as well as comfort) was—"That she never expected to see so costly a covering on a poet's shoulders." But she is one of those obsoletes, who know more of past ages than of the present. Her books are her chosen companions, and in the inconsiderable space of a few feet, bounded by four walls, does she study human nature, instead of pursuing the present peripatetic mode of seeking knowledge in the variety and bustle of a crowded street. In a dejected tone she added, "Do you know what a dandy H. is becoming?" and greatly surprised was my antiquated friend, at hearing the uniform neatness of the poet attributed to "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind." "Oh," said I, to fill up the measure of her astonishment, "had you seen how gracefully he danced at the ball the other evening, and how much he appeared to enjoy this recreation, you would seek some other criterion whereby to judge of a man's intellects than either rags or melancholy." To reconcile facts with long cherished opinions, she gravely remarked, that "So sweet and caustic and sparkling a poet, so prompt and undeviating a man of business, so trim and decided a fashionable, and so amiable a companion must be considered an anomaly." But we of the nineteenth century know better.

Nor is this state of rationality confined to one sex. Blueism, which destroyed the domestic comfort of many an unfortunate fellow in the last century, extinguishing every gleam of sprightliness and conviviality from the social hearth, where is it now? For my part, I never knew but one bas-bleu; and to this complexion was she brought by the injudicious treatment of foolish parents. A slight deformity, and an unprepossessing physiognomy, first induced the supposition that she might be imbued with that ethereal essence which raises its possessor above the tangible things of earth; for numerous were the instances of bright and lofty spirits inhabiting a form clumsy and unsymmetrical. Her extreme irritability was another favourable symptom, for who had not heard of Pope's peevishness, and Johnson's dogmatism, and Swift's asperity? And then, instead of romping with her young companions, she would sit in the chimney-corner, gazing for hours at the fire, book in hand. Although this arose from indolence, it was hailed as the presage of future greatness. To educate so studious and intellectual a being like less gifted females, would be to clip the wings of genius, and condemn her to trot through the world, instead of soaring above it. Eyes that could roll in a fine frenzy, were not made to count the stitches of a sampler, or pore over a threadbare garment; that head, surrounded with a glory, "such as Lady Morgan's novice used to wear," and from which had issued such strains as the following,

"Ye gentles all, I prithee, pray,
Come listen to my roundelay;
About a knight of high renown,
Who wither'd 'neath a lady's frown;
His eyes were as soft as the concave of blue,
And his dark raven locks were as black as my shoe;" &c.

should never be compelled to waste its energies in a round of vulgar household duties. The result was, that after jilting several worthy men, who were unable to stand a literary test, one being ignorant of the difference between the anapestic and iambic measure; another at fault respecting the architecture of the tower of Babel; and a third so gothic as to prefer "Auld Robin Gray" to "Una voce poco fa," she settled down into a conceited, petulant, disputatious, slatternly bas-bleu; the derision of both the literate and illiterate.

How different is my sweet and unpretending friend S. whose superior intellect enables her to discover more clearly the path of duty, while correct principles lead her to pursue it! Unobtrusive manners shield her from public observation, for she well knows at what a sacrifice woman frequently purchases notoriety. Few of those who admire the vivacity, gentleness, and modesty which render her family circle so interesting a place, are aware of the brilliancy of her genius; their ears are charmed with strains of touching melody, but the minstrel is unseen.

Rejoice and be exceeding glad, ye poets, that the sentence of proscription is reversed, which deprived you of fellowship with the comforts and luxuries of life. Eat, drink, and be merry, for ye are no longer outcasts from the smoking board and the festive hall; no longer are ye doomed to hunger, and thirst, and nakedness here, that ye may gain a name hereafter; neither is it necessary that the outward man should be made to appear ridiculous, in order that the inner man should receive due respect.

Nothing, I am persuaded, but this improved state of things saved my friend O. from being a fool. A lively imagination, sparkling wit, a vigorous intellect, and a distaste for the ordinary routine of business, kept him early in life vacillating, and apparently indolent; but the suggestions of friends, that poetry was fitter for a dessert than for a regular meal, and that as he could not subsist on air, it behoved him to procure by his exertions more substantial food, aided by his own good sense, has made him a respectable and useful citizen in this "bank-note world." Although he has not cut the acquaintance of his early favourites, the muses, he receives no calls during business hours, but many a delightful tele-a-tete occurs to sweeten his leisure, and render home the most enchanting spot in the wide world. A CHAPTER ON ADVERTISEMENTS.

The present age, it has been well remarked, is distinguished from all others by the rapid increase of that species of literature which has from some occult reason obtained the name of periodical. Magazines, reviews, journals which are not diurnal, as from the name one might naturally infer, but weekly, semi-weekly, monthly, quarterly, and annual—medleys, and miscellanies of every possible description have for the last twenty years sprung up like mushrooms all around us; and in nine instances out of ten, have "vanished into thin air" with a rapidity equal to that of their production; leaving behind them, in most cases, names worthy of immortality, and sundry unpaid bills for types and paper. The devil, a personage heretofore held in awful fear and dignified abhorrence, has been brought into familiar acquaintance with multitudes of respectable persons, whose grandmothers would have fainted at his very name. Capital cobblers have been converted into miserable poets; lordlings and titled dames of high degree have eschewed Almacks, and addicted themselves unto Murray and Colburn; abandoned Brighton and Hyde-park for Albemarle-street, and substituted composition for card-playing as the solace of their midnight hours. Authorship, once vulgar, has become genteel; poets live in palaces and fare sumptuously every day; the race of poor devils par excellence, is extinct; and publishers buy titles now, as well as title-pages. But there is one branch of periodical literature which far surpasses all others in extent, variety, and importance. I mean that which is generally called advertizing, which is in itself a host comprising many subdivisions. If we consider its extent, we find that no other species of writing can compare with it—"none but itself can be its parallel." Every object of human cupidity, dislike, anxiety, or interest, may be found the subject of an advertisement; each trade and profession finds itself at some time or other obliged to resort to this mode of seeking or communicating information. Pens that in general aim at nothing more than the concoction of a letter, or the perpetration of a bill, (horresco referens) must sometimes turn their energies to the writing of a "notice" in the newspaper. The different species of advertisements are innumerable. There is the endless family of puffs; those most modest and veracious compositions which in our own country have attained a height of excellence that throws completely in the back ground the rival efforts of foreign ingenuity. A small sized, but very interesting volume might be filled with judicious selections from among the glowing flowers of this description, which daily "waste their sweetness on the desert air" in the columns of our newspapers; much ingenuity also might be shown in reducing them to their various classes, beginning with the obvious and infartificial boast of unequalled excellence and incomprehensible cheapness; thence rising upwards to those ingenious specimens of the art eulogistic which begin with "Pombuccoo, the emperor Alexander, or the discovery of the longitude, and end by easy transitions in Warren's blacking or Rowland's washball, (that great labour-saving invention, whose virtues are so potent that by merely applying it to his hands, the happy purchaser's teeth are whitened, his hair brushed, and, in short, his whole person is exalted to a state of unprecedented purity;) and ending with the ne plus ultra of talent in the shape of Mr. Joseph Strickland's bull-pups and real Kimikles. Among these gems of literary excellence, might, perhaps, be ranked those amiable effusions which have existence only during those important epochs generally known as "election times;" when modest gentlemen, who by their own showing have no earthly claims, come forward to ask the suffrages of the public, something after this fashion:

To the independent republican electors of —.

GENTLEMEN—The period appointed by legislative wisdom for the election of state representatives having at length arrived, I humbly crave permission again to offer myself to your notice as a most unworthy, though zealous candidate for the representation of your powerful and independent county. Should I rest my claim upon the adequacy of my abilities to this momentous trust, I should be at once obliged to abandon every hope of success. But if in this respect I may be deemed unequal to a responsibility so awful; if on former occasions you should have sometimes found reason to complain of the imbecility of my judgment; if, conscious of that imbecility, I have always shrunk from debate and left the field to bolder orators; if in the honest easiness of my credulity I have frequently suffered myself to be drawn into the support of measures which I went determined to oppose, or to oppose such as upon all principle I ought to have supported; if for this reason I have invariably absented myself from the house during the discussion of the gravest and most critical questions let me at least enjoy the noble boast that the most gifted of my competitors cannot rival me in the purity of my intentions, the fervour of my zeal, and the soundness of my political principles. I have the honour, gentlemen, with the most profound respect and deference, to be your very obedient, very humble servant,

TIMOTHY BRAINLESS.

But perhaps the most interesting of these modest effusions, at least to a portion of the reading public, are the innumerable catalogues of "wants" which are daily exhibited to the eager gaze of all newspaper readers. From among an invaluable collection of notices of this description which I have gathered together in the course of my multifarious reading, I select the following as an illustration of the natural tendency of the human mind to undervalue its own pretensions, and to overrate those properties of others which it seeks to appropriate to its own advantage or emolument.

Matrimony—important to adventurers.

Experience having satisfactorily demonstrated to the advertiser the fact that happiness is more likely to be acquired in the married than in the single state, he is induced to resort to this method of seeking a companion, in whose person may be found united every requisite of matrimonial felicity; the advertiser will with frankness declare the extent of his wishes in order to save trouble in useless applications, he being himself an advantageous party, and perfectly serious in his propositions.

The lady must have every charm of person, the advertiser's taste being in this respect unusually fastidious; her age must not be more than twenty-one, to be proved if required by the oath of her parents or relatives. Her fortune must be handsome; the advertiser having lately been unfortunate in business, and being past the middle age, feels unwilling to begin the world anew. Not being accustomed to confinement, the advertiser must be master of his own hours, and will expect to be received with good-humour on his return, though long away; the lady will, however, find no want of amusement in his absence, the education of his five children by a former marriage having been entirely neglected, which will furnish her with abundant occupation. The advertiser being taciturn and somewhat soured in his temper, looks for unvarying vivacity and animation which may amuse him in his gloomy moments, but to be restrained when he is not in the humour for playful sallies.

Advertiser snores, but not much more than is usual in men of his age; and would expect his wife to read him to sleep, being subject to a confirmed asthma which often deprives him of rest.

Any lady whom this may suit, having all the necessary qualities, will apply in person to the advertiser at No. — Bowery, near the fork of the roads; he lodges over a barber's shop, in the third story.

P. S.—Being nice in his eating, will require his wife to attend to the cooking when he has company; on other occasions he always dines from home, not being accustomed to have a table set every day.

2nd. P. S.—If the lady should call when other gentlemen are in the room, which may readily happen, having a number of old cronies who are in the habit of calling at all hours to take a pipe with him, the advertiser will be known by his dress, which he has worn for the last fifteen years, namely, a paper cap which he uses on account of being a little bald and subject to colds in the head, iron spectacles, blue coat somewhat faded but genteel, striped seersucker vest, and duck pantaloons rather short. To prevent all mistakes, takes snuff almost constantly. N.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE GOLD-HEADED CANE.

THIS is the quaint title of a somewhat singular and not uninteresting work, of which the second edition has just issued from the London press. It purports to be the narrative of a gold-headed cane, presented to the new College of Physicians by Mrs. Baillie, and which had been successively carried by Drs. Radcliffe, Mead, Askew, Pitcairn, and (her own lamented and far-celebrated husband,) Matthew. The arms of these eminent physicians are said to be engraved on the head of the cane, and they form the vignettes of the five chapters into which this little volume is divided.

The favoured cane, when deposited in a common closet of the library, on the twenty-fourth of June, 1825, the day before the opening of the new college, heard with dismay that it was no longer to be carried about, but to be kept amongst the relics of that learned body. It thus laments the obscurity which was thenceforth to be its destined lot:

"Formerly the entrée of palaces had been open to me; I had been freely admitted into the houses of the great and the rich, but now I was doomed to darkness, and condemned to occupy the corner of a library—spacious and splendid, it must be allowed, but where I was surrounded by nothing but the musty manuscripts of defunct doctors."

We can well sympathize with the jeremiad of the thrice-honoured staff, which had, for nearly two centuries, been enclosed in the firm and familiar grasp of the pulse-feelers and purse-drainers of Charles the second, William the third and his Queen Mary, George the first, George the second, ditto the third, and ditto the fourth. To how many important secrets had it not been accessory? Of how many unsuspected but potent causes of political discord and national commotions had it not been privy? How many clues might it not give to the obscure and inexplicable portions of the history of the fast-anchored isle, the hue and whole tenor of which may have, perhaps, been connected with the coeval existence of a headache, a toothache, or some other equally important ache! Much and weighty is the import of the matter entrusted unto its memory; so heavy, indeed, is the charge, that it cannot be supported. And master gold-headed cane, like many a companion of the male sex, must, forsooth, disburthen itself in part at least of its heavy and responsible load. While it was still enfolded in the gentle pressure of the soft and delicate hand, whose science-guided tact could designate the seat of each disorder which flesh is heir to, its desire for utterance, its aspirations for literary fame, had been kept down and hushed. Now that it was laid aside, and the very fashion which had erewhile not only countenanced and authorized, but actually enforced its attendance upon the primates of the faculty, had banished it, together with the full-bottomed wig, from the very light of day, now it could no longer be silent. In its retirement it would still exert its influence, and raise its voice in eulogy of times by-gone, times redolent of its freedom, its delight, its glory! It would, in short narrate its memoirs, and to these we shall devote a short space, premising that they have relation rather to the general history than to any medical localities. Had they not prepossessed this attractive character they would not have found a passing notice in the columns of the New-York Mirror.

Of its early condition, before it was furnished with a head, or separated from the vulgar mass of wooden rods that belong alike to knave and lord, our worthy cane has, like all newly elevated grandees, no recollection whatever; "but," says he, "I shall never forget the first consultation at which I was present."

"It was in the autumn of 1689. My master, Dr. Radcliffe, had just then returned from a distant journey in the country, and was much fatigued, when an urgent message reached him at his house in Bow-street, Covent-garden. Snatching me up, he hurried into his carriage, and set off with all speed for Kensington-house. This irregular edifice, which had recently been purchased by the crown of the second earl of Nottingham, had undergone several alterations and improvements."

additions hastily put together for the immediate accommodation of the court. The edifice itself was not extensive, having rather the appearance of the genteel villa of a nobleman than that of a royal mansion; and the gardens were upon a small scale, but kept in the neatest possible order. From the town of Kensington the approach was by a double row of large elm trees, leading to the north entrance of the house, through an unenclosed field, which was at that time disfigured by a gravel-pit. Here, however, afterwards, the skill of the famous gardeners of the day, Loudon and Wise, was employed; and the cut yew and variegated holly hedges were taught to imitate the lines, angles, bastions, scarps, and counter-scarps of a regular fortification. This curious upper-garden, known by the name of the siege of Troy, was long the admiration of every lover of that kind of trim horticultural embellishment.

"We were ushered through a suite of several rooms, plainly but handsomely furnished by Simon de Brienne; and it seemed to me that the doctor assumed a more lofty air, and walked with a firmer step, and I was conscious of a gentle pressure of his hand as he stopped and gazed for a moment on the likeness of the founder of the college of physicians, Dr. Linacre, painted by Holbein, which was hanging in one of the rooms, amongst the royal portraits of the Henries, and several others of the kings and queens of England and Scotland."

"On entering the sick chamber, which was a small cabinet in the south-east angle of the building, called the writing-closet, a person of a grave and solemn aspect, apparently about forty years of age, of a slim and weak body, brown hair, and of middle stature, was seen sitting in an arm-chair, and breathing with great difficulty. The naturally serious character of the king (for it was his majesty William the third) was rendered more melancholy by the distressing symptoms of an asthma, the consequence of the dregs of the small-pox, that had fallen upon his lungs. In the absence of the fit, and at other times, his sparkling eyes, large and elevated forehead, and aquiline nose, gave a dignity to his countenance, which though usually grave and phlegmatic, was said in the day of battle to be susceptible of the most animated expression. 'Doctor,' said the king, 'Bentinck (earl of Portland) and Zulestein (earl of Rochford) have been urgent with me that I should again send for you; and though I have great confidence in my two body-physicians here, yet I have heard so much of your great skill that I desire you will consult with Bidloo and Lawrence, whether some other plan might not be adopted.'

"The king seldom spoke so long at a time, his conversation being usually dry and repulsive; and here his majesty's speech was interrupted by a deep cough, and he sank back in his chair exhausted. 'May it please your majesty,' said Dr. Radcliffe, 'I must be plain with you, sir: your case is one of danger, no doubt, but if you will adhere to my prescriptions, I will engage to do you good. The rheum is dripping on your lungs, and will be of fatal consequence to you unless it be otherwise directed.'"

The consultation was short—the remedies were changed—and the king got well.

We are next introduced to her majesty Queen Mary. Her person was majestic, and calculated to inspire respect, and her conversation (when she was not much agitated) indicated a fine and cultivated understanding. She had read much in history and divinity, but her studies were early interrupted by an obstruction to her sight. "She was ever active, and so industrious that she wrought many hours a day herself with her ladies and maids of honour working about her, while one read to them all." Such employment was well befitting a queen, and would not ill become any rational woman, titled or untitled, gifted with wealth or only enjoying a competency, fashionable or unfashionable, whether domiciliated in a palace at London, or in a three-story brick house in the city of New-York. The very tapestry which adorned the sides of her chamber was the work of the queen's own hands, as were also the coverings of the chairs. This royal model of domestic virtue fell a victim to the small pox.

That celebrated warrior, Prince Eugene, who had won such brilliant laurels in France and Hungary, is the next eminent character of which we have a slight sketch. Dr. Radcliffe invited the prince to dinner; a large party of the nobility and several topping merchants were engaged to meet him. Knowing the enmity of Eugene to every thing French, and anxious to pay extraordinary attention to his guest, he gave orders for dinner accordingly. "Let there be no ragouts," said he, "no kickshaws of France; but let us treat the prince as a soldier. He shall have a specimen of true English hospitality. I will have my table covered with barons of beef, jiggets of mutton, and legs of pork." At table the prince delighted every one by his unassuming modesty, his easy address and affable behaviour. "His aspect was erect and composed, his eye lively and thoughtful, yet rather vigilant than sparkling; but his manner was peculiarly graceful, and he descended to an easy equality with those who conversed with him; the shape of his person was remarkably erect and beautiful; still, with all his condescension, and though he was affable to every one, it was evident that he rather suffered the presence of much company." He was greatly pleased with the doctor's entertainment, and was loud in his praise of some seven years' old beer, which was then in tap.

We must not, however, forget the doctor himself, whose intercourse with exalted personages has been the means of introducing us plebeians to the honour of their acquaintance. Few physicians ever enjoyed a more splendid celebrity or ample income than Radcliffe. The anecdote is well known which imputes his success to a misapprehension on the part of a lady of very high rank, who being taken remarkably ill, and incidentally visited by him while he was labouring under the effects of a debauch, and sensible of his situation, exclaimed, "drunk, by heaven!" applied the remark to her own situation, which was appositely identical with his own, and to secure his secrecy gave him her patronage, and introduced him to court. Of this our worthy cane makes no mention. It thus examines the source of its first master's superiority:

"It was clear that his erudition had nothing to do with it; but though there was something rude in the manner in which he frequently disparaged the practice of others, yet it could not be denied that his general good sense and practical knowledge of the world distinguished him from all his competitors. He was remarkable for his apt and witty replies, and always ready in suggesting expedients."

With the following anecdote we shall close the article, intending to resume the thread of the story, as contained in the notice of Mead, Askew, Pitcairn, and Baillie.

Dr. Radcliffe was once sent for to visit a gentleman afflicted with a violent inflammation of the throat. No application, either internal or external, had been of the least service. He requested the lady to order a hasty-pudding to be made without delay, and when it was done he desired that his own servants might bring it up stairs. Having given them his private instructions, he thus addressed them as soon as it was put upon the table before the patient—"Come, Jack and Dick, eat as quickly as possible, you have had no breakfast this morning." The faithful orderlies set to with their spoons to devour the contents of the ample dish, but Dick dipped his instrument twice to Jack's once. Upon this a quarrel arose; the combatants first discharged spoonful of hot pudding at each other's faces, and finally hurled handfuls, till they emptied the platter. This scene excited so hearty a fit of laughter in the patient that the quinsy burst, and the doctor had the credit of the cure. We may truly exclaim, then, with Homer,

"A wise physician, skilled our wounds to heal,
Is more than armies to the public weal!"

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Moore's Life of Byron.—Our readers must not attribute the want of a notice of this long expected work in our number of this week to indolence or negligence, or any other improper or discreditable reason. We did intend and hope to say something of its merits; but the fact is, that upon a careful and honest perusal, we have found it a work of so much greater magnitude and importance than we had expected; so much more honourable both to its subject and its author (or rather editor) than we had hoped; so much more full of excellent and interesting, and withal new matter, than we had thought possible, that we have not dared to write of it in haste; and to write of it as it deserves, (even supposing the ability to do so to be within us, a question touching which we have some misgivings,) we have not had the necessary leisure at our command. If it were enough to say how much we are delighted with it, what intense and gratified interest it has given us in reading, and how anxiously we look for the second volume, then our duty would have been light; but "Moore's Life of Byron" deserves more than this; and to do by it as it ought to be done by, and as we desire to do by it, we must have time.

Spring.—Our tardy spring is come at last, and vegetation is bursting forth in every direction; nature has at length become sensible of the genial influence of the sun, thrown off her wintry garment, and arrayed herself in her gay and brilliant robes of green. In this capricious climate of ours it is astonishing to see the almost miraculous change produced by two or three days of mild weather in succession. But it is not on inanimate nature alone that spring is exerting its genial powers; the minds of men feel its cheering influence; new schemes are formed, old projects carried into execution, and all is once more noise and bustle. In a week or two the influx of strangers will increase the population of this city one-fifth, our streets will be crowded with new faces, places of amusements remunerated for their past losses, and business and pleasure once more go hand in hand over our good metropolis.

Union of the States.—The following are the closing remarks of Mr. Webster's second speech in the senate of the United States, in reply to Mr. Hayne, on the land question. A more eloquent appeal to the patriotic feelings and understandings of men we have never read:

"I profess, sir, in my career hitherto, to have kept steadily in view the prosperity and honour of the whole country, and the preservation of our federal union. It is to that union we owe our safety at home, and our consideration and dignity abroad. It is to that union that we are chiefly indebted for whatever makes us most proud of our country. That union we reached only by the discipline of our virtues, in the severe school of adversity. It had its origin in the necessities of disordered finance, prostrate commerce, and ruined credit. Under its benign influences these great interests immediately awoke, as from the dead, and sprang forth with newness of life. Every year of its duration has teemed with fresh proofs of its utility and its blessings; and although our territory has stretched out wider and wider, and our population spread further and farther, they have not outrun its protection or its benefits. It has been to us all a copious fountain of national, social, and personal happiness. I have not allowed myself, sir, to look beyond the union, to see what might lie hidden in the dark recess behind. I have not coolly weighed the chances of preserving liberty, when the bonds that unite us together shall be broken asunder. I have not accustomed myself to hang over the precipice of disunion, to see whether, with my short sight, I can fathom the depth of the abyss below; nor could I regard him as a safe counsellor in the affairs of this government, whose thoughts should be mainly bent on considering, not how the union should be best preserved, but how tolerable might be the condition of the people when it shall be broken up and destroyed."

"While the union lasts we have high, exciting, gratifying prospects spread out before us, for us and our children. Beyond that I seek not to penetrate the veil. God grant that in my day at least that curtain may not rise. God grant that on my vision never may be opened what lies behind. When my eyes shall be turned to behold, for the last time, the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonoured fragments of a once glorious union; on states dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood! Let their last feeble and lingering glance rather behold the gorgeous ensign of the republic, now known and honoured throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original lustre, not a stripe erased or polluted, nor a single star obscured—bearing for its motto no such miserable interrogatory as—What is all this worth?—Nor those other words of delusion and folly—Liberty first and Union afterwards—but every where, spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds, as they float over the sea and over the land, and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment, dear to every true American heart—Liberty and Union, now and for ever, one and inseparable."

Grand Gala.—Extensive preparations are making for the grand military and civic fete, which is to take place at the Park theatre, on Monday evening next. It will, beyond doubt, be one of the most select, fashionable, and brilliant entertainments ever given in this city.

Parmenier's Garden.—The season is fast approaching for furnishing our gardens with flowers and fragrance. During last summer we frequently visited the garden of Mr. Parmenier, and were highly gratified with his extensive collection of beautiful flowering shrubs and plants, and delightful and picturesque arrangements. A correct idea of its appearance can be obtained from the map.

Greece.—It appears to be definitively settled that Prince Leopold is to become sovereign ruler of this interesting country. The three great powers are said to have affixed their signatures to the necessary documents.

Palestine.—The jew, Rothschild, is in treaty with the sultan, through the medium of the English ambassador, for the cession of this portion of his territories, to be converted into a place of refuge for the scattered tribes of Israel. Merchants are indeed becoming princes.

3d—Come arise thee, arise thee, my merry Swiss girl,
To the dance on the green come away,
The new-mown hay now scents the air,

The wild rose sheds its fragrance there.
Come arise thee, arise thee, my merry Swiss girl,
To the dance on the green come away.

3d—Trip away then, away then, my merry Swiss girl,
And the queen of the dance you shall be,
Be blithe till daylight's gentle close,

Once more bring the Swiss maid repose.
Come away then, away then, my merry Swiss girl,
To the fields bright with dew lightly stray.

VARIETIES.

ANCIENT MUNICIPAL REGULATIONS.—Our city aldermen, of modern times, might learn some useful lessons by inspecting the records of their ancestors. For instance, in 1675, the streets were ordered to be cleared every Saturday, or oftener, and cartmen were obliged to carry away the dirt, or forfeit their licenses. It was also "ordered, that the land in this city, convenient to build on, if the parties who own the same do not build thereon, may be valued and sold to those who are willing to build!" In the same year it was "ordered, that a general or public slaughter-house be built for the use of the city, over the water, without the gate." "Jurymen were fined sixpence if not present at court before the ringing of the third bell." It was unlawful to sell liquor to the Indians; and if they were found intoxicated in the street, without knowing at what house they obtained the drink, the whole street was liable to a fine! In 1677, it became a question in council, "whether attorneys are thought useful to plead in courts or not? Answer, "it is thought not;" whereupon resolved and ordered, "that pleading attorneys be no longer allowed to practice in the government, excepting in the depending cases." In 1699, hawking or peddling goods about the streets was prohibited, under the penalty of twenty shillings for each offence. All scine running at large were allowed to be shot! The common council's hour of meeting was nine o'clock in the morning. In 1736, all gaming-houses were denounced by law. In 1752, Jacob Turk was ordered to buy six small speaking trumpets, for the use of the corporation. We do not, however, recommend the revival of this last ordinance, as the members of our present common council make noise enough, in all conscience, without the aid of trumpets.

PROGRESS OF IMPROVEMENT.—The first city-hall, state-house, or tavern, erected in this city, stood on the corner of Pearl-street and Coenties-slip, and was a three-story edifice, built in the year 1644. It was considered a very important establishment in those days, as all the courts and public meetings were held within its walls. In 1696, it was "ordered that a city-hall shall be built, value three thousand pounds sterling. Three years afterwards, the old city-hall at Coenties-slip was sold, "by public outcry," to John Rodman, merchant, for nine hundred and twenty pounds sterling! The site is now occupied by Brinkerhoff's buildings. The new city-hall, in Wall-street, was estimated to cost eleven hundred and fifty-one pounds eighteen shillings and three pence sterling. In 1812, the city-hall in the Park was finished, at an expense of half a million of dollars, although the original estimate already become necessary, or an enlargement of the present edifice, as there is not sufficient room for more than half the public business.

FACILITIES IN TRAVELLING.—During a controversy between the citizens of New-York and the people of New-Haven, in the year 1646, it took six days to send a message. The distance is only about ninety miles, and is now travelled in a few hours. In those days, however, the country was a wilderness; for twenty-two years afterwards, there was no wagon or carriage-road from New-York to Harlaem. The English having then possession of the city, a road was ordered to be constructed, which has continued ever since, and is called the old road to Harlaem. In 1673, "the post-rider began his trips to and from Boston, once in three weeks." In 1732, the first stage began to run between Boston and New-York, once a month, and it was never less than fourteen days on the journey! The United States' mail now goes the same distance in less than two days. In 1806, the first successful attempt at steam navigation was exhibited on the Hudson. Since that memorable era we do not travel, but fly!

FEMALES.—The following estimate and comparison of the female character is from Naval Sketches, a work lately published in New Haven:

I should say little of the Turkish females, if such encomiums had not been lavished upon them by recent travellers. That they are contented is probable; they grow up to their prospects; their thoughts do not wish to roam; their affections centre in their children, and they are satisfied with being just what they are. But this does not argue a very high state of happiness. The squaw of your forests is contented with her lot; her affections cling to her offspring, and she is satisfied with her wigwam and restless life.

The Greek ladies have more freedom, and I believe more intelligence, but generally they are extremely ignorant, and their situation is even more servile than that of the former. They are suffered to go abroad, but in most cases it is to carry water from the wells, grain to the mill, or to do the drudgery of the fields, while their husbands lounge in the bazar.

The sex rises as we come west into Italy, where they are often found to be well informed and agreeable companions. The condition of far the greater part, however, is exceedingly degraded; their life is a laborious one; they have few means of information, and those few the lives of their saints, with a jumble of absurd superstitions, are rather calculated to debase than to elevate and ennoble the affections. In industry I think they bear the palm. I have seldom seen them idle; frequently I have met them on the way with a basket of olives on their heads and spinning as they went.

difference in the sex as soon as I landed in that country. In Italy, man or woman, all are beggars. When I got lost in the streets of Rome, and asked directions, to my "thank ye," they would often reply, "is that all; have you nothing to give me?" At Toulon, in France, I wanted directions, and stopped at a little shop to ask them; the woman who kept it saw I did not know the streets, and went the distance of one of our squares to show me the house. I offered her money, but she refused, and was with difficulty prevailed upon to accept it. The French ladies excel all others in sentiment, sprightliness, and naivete. But the sentiment wants depth, and the sprightliness tires because it is not spiced sufficiently with good sense; the naivete is always agreeable. The higher classes are generally well informed; the lower ignorant; all are open and free in their manners, to a degree that would be scandalized in America. The French females are very industrious. I saw a girl between Marseilles and Toulon, following a loaded mule and knitting with all her might as she went.

GENERAL DESAIX.—At the battle of Marengo, General Desaix was struck by a ball at the first charge of his division, and died almost instantly. He had only time to say to the young Le Brun, his aide-de-camp, "Go, and tell the first consul, that my only regret in dying is, that I have done nothing for posterity." Thus modest to the last was one of the bravest and best men the French revolution has produced. The Austrians were wont to call him the brave, the indefatigable general. The Germans, over whom it was his frequent lot to exercise the rights of conquest, revered him as the good Desaix. And the ferocious Arabs, subjugated not more by his valour than by his wisdom, decreed to him the sublime title of the just sultan.

The day before the battle of Marengo, in which his race of glory was thus so early terminated, he observed, somewhat prophetically, to one of his aides-de-camp, "It is a long time since I fought in Europe. The bullets must know me again; something will happen."

When the tidings of his death was brought in the midst of the hottest of the engagement to Napoleon, by whom he was greatly beloved, he was much affected, and it was one of his earliest commands after the victory, that a splendid monument should be erected to the fallen hero, on the top of Mont St. Bernard.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

CAROLINE.

"She is not very beautiful."

I've known a fairer form than hers—a face
Of more surpassing loveliness—and eyes
Of deeper tint cerulean—and a presence,
Prouder than hers to grace a shrine for worship;
Yet when I look upon her innocent features—
Lit up by an effulgent intellect—
And trace the windings of the purple stream
Through its thin covering, eloquently speaking
In language to the heart intelligible,
The thoughts that crowd into her artless mind,
I do forget myself in the sweet theme;
And wayward fancy fashions her as one
Lovely as houri-forms that poets dream of,
Feigning their Eden songs.

She's but a child!
And yet a pleasant study for my thoughts.
I've led her by the hand through the green fields,
Jewelled with nature's own luxuriance,
When the blue sky hung o'er us like a garment,
And bright-hued flowers sprung up beneath our steps;
And with a deep, unspoken joy have watched
The expanding of her mind, when first awoke
Its young imaginings—intelligence
Floating like incense on her gentle breath;
Methought that sweet unfolding of the spirit
Was like the birth of fragrance in the flower.

There is a sweet and placid temper writ
Upon her brow, type of the soul within:
I dwell with doting fondness on her looks
That brighten on my heart, amid life's cares,
Like sun-beams on the wave-tost mariner,
Desolate on a sea of storms! And then
The bird-like melody of her low voice,
Breathing the accents of untaught affection,
Or mingling in harmonious cadences:
Blest sounds, that may be in an after year,
An unforgotten music to the heart!

But when at eve my laden brow she presses
To her pure lip, and, with most sweet endearment,
Twining her slight and delicate arms around me,
Seeks to beguile my very weariness
And cheat me of a smile—I lose all sense
Of sorrow, and my eyes are filled for joy;
It is an ecstasy that hath no words.

You'll smile and say this is a rhapsody—
In very sooth it is—I'm most content
That you should call it so. My heart is full.
Too overflowing, of delightful dreamings—
SHE IS MY DAUGHTER!

STANZAS.

"Ninfa, ya de amor solo,
Solo canta mi lira."

I saw thee in thy life's young spring,
Of sylph-like form and air,
Ere thou hadst known one venom'd sting
Of wretchedness or care;
I loved thee then, but durst not think
E'en o'er the joyous wine,
That I might ever hope to link
My destiny with thine.

I saw thee in thy summer morn,
When time had all refined
The graces of thy matchless form,
The beauties of thy mind;
And loved thee then as warm and well,
As e'er the good may be;
But had not power to break the spell,
Nor tell the tale to thee.

I saw thee oft in festive hall,
Where birth and beauty shone,
And in my loneliness of love,
I gazed on thee alone;
Nor thought to mark in that rich blaze
If brighter beauties were—
It was enough that I might gaze
On one so sweetly fair.

But time, that hath a change for all—
Darkness, or bloom, or blight—
Threw clouds upon thy sunny hopes,
And veiled thy path of light;
While me he sought in lowly cot,
Where want and scorn attend,
And raised to fortune's proudest lot—
To be misfortune's friend.

I saw thee in that wintry hour,
When spring's bright dreams were fled.

And thou hadst no kind guide, no home
To shield thine orphan head;
And loved thee with far deeper stress
Than in thy summer morn,
For thou wert then all joyousness,
I—nameless and forlorn.

I flew to thee when nobler friends,
Far from thy sighs removed;
And hid thee in my own warm breast,
My first and only loved!
And bade thy tears and ills depart,
Life's springs of gladness flow—
Nor wilt thou e'er forget the heart,
Unchanged through weal and woe.

PROTEUS.

ENIGMA.

"Solve me this riddle, if you can.

Our whole is a community of fame,
Of fourteen members—can you guess the name?
We form a city—yet, upon a pinch,
The space we occupy is scarce an inch!
And yet, within so limited a spot,
Is found an inn, a castle, and a cot;
A tent, a seat, an antiquated pile;
A sloop, a nation, continent, and isle;
A sea, an ocean—still, you'll understand,
There's neither building, water, ship, nor land!
But Spain is there, the east, and both the poles,
With planets, pilots, cattle, plaiice, and soles;
A coast and cape, a sail, a game of loo;
A sect, a saint, and one apostle too;
Lions, and cats, an insect, tea, and ice,
Toast, onions, peas, and pie, a goodly slice;
A snipe, a seal, an ant, an asp, a snail,
A pot, a pan, a plate, with cans, and ale;
Yet there is neither beast, nor bird, nor fish,
Nor food, nor drink, nor vessel, nor a dish!
True, there's a pint, a spoon, some oats, a stool,
A plane, a nail, a staple, and a tool;
Soap, pins, and paints, with caps, and coats, and lace;
But not a thing for body, head, or face!
We've pens and pencils to address a card,
An attic and a tenant—not a bard!
Coins, cents, and notes—but, ah! no cash is ours!
Plants, aloes, sloe—but neither shrubs nor flowers;
A fertile soil, with aspen, satin, pine,
Without one tree, and yet we boast of nine,
And though our place has no disease in't,
You'll find a lancet, seton, and some lint;
Though we're no soldiers, whole platoons are found,
And though no lawyers, clients still abound;
We've spite, and plots, and noise, a strong police,
A slap and contest, without breach of peace;
A sin, a pit, and pain, without a groan,
A sonnet on content, with taste and tone;
A smiling aspect, and a sprightly pace,
A lip of sweetness, and a step of grace.

All these are in our whole, with many more,
And yet we're not three-quarters of a score!
But if you analyze our various parts,
Still greater wonder must possess your hearts.
For if our ninth, and third and tenth you take,
You will a house of entertainment make,
Where oft our sixth, thirteenth, and fourteenth, join'd,
Refresh the frame, and elevate the mind;
Our fourth, fourteenth, and sixth, in order, form
The scene of many a desolating storm;
Our sixth, our fourth, and twelfth, united, show
The remedy for Cleopatra's woe;
Our first, and second, with our fifth combined,
Construct a dwelling of the humblest kind;
Our fifth, eleventh, with our seventh, make
A greater burthen than you'd choose to take.
Lastly, our eighth, fourteenth, and sixth, reveal
A wholesome beverage for your evening meal.
Solve me this riddle, ye wise-acre swains,
And you shall have sweet kisses for your pains. SOPHIA.

[A solution is requested.]

MR. EDITOR—I had the pleasure lately of receiving from a young lady the following lines, enclosing a safety-chain. Will you have the goodness to give them a place in the Mirror? B.

'Tis not a chain of slavery,
That I have dared to offer thee—
Yet would I bid it closer bind
The power of friendship on thy mind;
And thus in silken fetters hold,
What's of more value far than gold.
Such bondage thou mayst own to me,
And wear the chain and still be free!

ELIZA.

POPULAR TALES.

THE GUARD.

A merrier man
Within the limits of becoming mirth
I never spent an hour's talk withal.—Shakspeare.

"BEGONE, dull care, I prithee begone from me," sung out a deep sonorous voice behind me, as, having just exalted myself to the top of the York mail, I was busily at work composing myself in my place. "Begone, dull care, thou and I shall never agree."

I looked round and soon discovered that it emanated from our guard, as a kind of accompaniment to the exertion for pulling off his huge dreadnought coat. He not only sung heartily, but his appearance well answered the burthen of his song, for he was a good, fresh looking man, and certainly rejoiced in as happy and cheerful a countenance as a man would wish to be blessed with; he also was very smart in his manner and dress, wore a ring on his finger, tied his neck-cloth quite in style, and cocked his hat as if he thought no small trifle of himself. By-the-by, I have a prodigious fancy that the character of a man, or at least of what he thinks of himself, is to be known from merely observing the physiognomy, if I may so term it, of the cock of his hat. Be that, however, as it may, the gentleman (I am sure he thought himself as much so as any of them who travelled with him) seemed little disturbed by my observation, singing blithely on as he proceeded to adjust his dress with great care and exactness.

"That man's a character," said I to myself, not slightly amused by his operation; and considering that the sign, which his face held out, promised a certainty of good cheer and entertainment, I spread my coat on the roof of the coach, and leaning back upon it, at once commenced parliance with him.

"Good old song that of yours, guard."

"It is, sir," returned he in a good-humoured tone, "especially as I sing it." And he tuned up, "for I hold it one of the wisest things to drive dull care away."

"Umph! not far wrong," thought I. "Fond of music, I presume."

"Ye-es, sir—well enough in its way—helps one on a bit occasionally, when there's nothing better to be done; but I never studied it—quite a natural talent—ti-tiddle-to-m."

I could scarcely avoid smiling at my new friend's comfortable opinion of himself, it was so perfectly comfortable. Desirous, however, of not offending him, I diverted the impulse by inquiring how he liked his mode of life.

"I dare say, guard, it would require much to make you change it?"

"And why should I wish to change it, sir? I know of no objection to it; though to be sure, it may not sound very grand to be a mail-coach guard; but, you know, sir, it all depends upon the way of doing the thing—there is a way of doing every thing."

And he twitched up his neck-cloth, and pulled in his chin with a very superlative kind of finish, thereby giving me an opportunity of observing,

"Truly."

"But perhaps, sir," he inquired with quick eagerness, "you have never considered philosophically what a guard is, for you must know that I'm a bit of a philosopher myself."

In much-amused surprise at this specimen of the march of intellect, I mentally exclaimed,

"A mail-coach guard a philosopher! What will the world come to next?"

I briefly, however, admitted that I never had.

"Well, sir, then permit me to tell you—I maintain that my situation possesses, in a very great degree, all the charms of life. Pray, sir, what may you consider life to be valuable for?"

I answered that I really did not pretend to be a philosopher, nor was I at the instant prepared to answer so difficult a question without first well considering it. I thought each individual had a peculiar way of thinking, and what was happiness to one might be almost misery to another.

"Excuse my interrupting you, sir, but you speak of the object, I of the principle."

"Then pray," said I, smiling at his distinction, "what may be your idea of the principle of happiness?"

"Why, sir, I will tell you—I think that the whole charm of life is derived from the continued novelty, and one's self importance and consequence, or the noise one makes in the world."

I admitted that perhaps it might.

"If not, sir," he continued, "can you tell me what is the meaning of the hundreds of carriages one meets constantly whirling along the road—first up to town, then back to the country, then to some watering place, then to the Lord knows where? I tell you what, sir, it is all for the sake of novelty, and to show off their consequence."

"Very likely; but pray instruct me how your situation embraces those properties, for I think you termed them principles of happiness?"

"Most willingly, sir; as to novelty, I think I need not take much time to satisfy you of that, for my whole life is so evidently one scene of continued novelty; always changing; always interesting. And as to the noise one makes in the world, or one's self-consequence, do you see that line of coal carts on the road?"

I looked in the direction pointed out, and observed a string of at least a dozen carts, going quietly along in dull procession, with their drivers each lounging in his vehicle.

"Ti-au, ti-au!" sounded out my friend; up jumped the drivers in an instant, and immediately were all the carts turned to the left side of the road.

Another twitch of the neck-cloth as he returned the horn to its rest, prefaced his remark:

"You see, sir, one is of some little consequence in the world."

"Most indisputably," I replied, laughing heartily at his conceit; "and most excellently well exemplified too. That is, I presume a specimen of the noise one makes in the world, and of one's individual consequence."

"Certainly, sir; and then as to one's importance, only think what a various mass of property I have under my charge; think, sir, what information I convey from one half of the kingdom to the other; think how many anxieties are to be removed by my arrival; how much happiness to be communicated; think, sir, how many adoring lovers are by me exchanging their fondest vows of affection," he put me on a very pathetic look; "you certainly, sir, can never have considered all these things before."

I had not time to acknowledge my ignorance when the coachman drew up.

"What's the matter Barnes?" inquired my companion.

"I wish you'd put that off leader's curb right," was the reply.

Down was the guard in a moment, and the tackle in as brief a time adjusted.

"All right, Barnes," called out the operator, and then waiting with great apparent inattention until the coach was just passing him, with one single spring jumped into his seat.

I was far too much amused with my merry companion to wish to quit his society, although my position on the hard coach top had long ceased to be desirable, and not unwilling to gratify his vanity, I observed that I was afraid he would have been left behind.

"Noticed my neck, did you, sir? Believe I do manage it well—but there is a way of doing every thing. I began my line of life when quite a boy—first as a stable lad—then, on account of my superior manner, promoted to an office lad—set out with a parcel cart—then chief porter—and at length mail-coach guard—all for my manner and superior address; nothing, sir, but those natural abilities to get me on. I was, indeed, always a lad of uncommon parts, and had always the way of doing the thing."

"I have no doubt of it. But pray why leave the office for your present post? I should have thought your former situation much more comfortable—perhaps not so lucrative."

"Quite mistaken, sir," he gave himself an extra settlement of his neck-cloth and chin; "it was not money that changed my place—it was the mind, sir—the mind. I could not submit to such drudgery, to be chained to desks and smoke—whereas now, sir, I am unfettered—free as the air through which we fly."

"Free enough to be sure, as fast as it goes—but think of the vicissitudes of the weather—the—"

"Nothing, sir, mere nothing—if it rains I put on my coat, which has weathered many a storm—if dry, why it is but putting it off again—if cold, I muffle up—if hot, dress light—I am always hearty—never ill, for I do not, as coachees, fill my inside with combustibles—when my time comes for rest I sleep like a top. What, sir, are a few dusts and storms, or even upsets? Can you tell me what state of life is free from such? I think I have as few as any, and quite as many pleasures. Only notice the cheerful smiles that salute me as we pass along, not even the king himself could have more, and not, perhaps, half so sincere; only think how all the pretty girls, wherever we stop, are delighted with the attentions of Mr. Guard, and seek his favour. I think, sir, you cannot possibly have considered all these things before."

"Most certainly not, guard, and I am the more indebted to you for thus opening my eyes to see the advantages of your enviable condition."

"You're vastly welcome, sir, I'm sure; always glad to be of use."

My sides, however, and adjacent parts now became so sore, from my unyielding resting-place, that I was at length compelled to change my position. I did this, however, with the less regret, as we were now approaching the end of our stage; and although by my removal I could no longer converse with my philosopher, I had the better opportunity of observing his proceedings.

At almost all the cottages at the entrance of the village were some of their inhabitants waiting to see us pass by. My friend seemed to know them all, and all him. "How are you Betty?" "Better, John!" "Quite hearty, I see, Dick," passed about with the air of an old acquaintance. If he saw a pretty girl, "Ah, Polly, you rogue! if you ogle me in that ere wicked way I'll tell Thomas;" or if an ugly one, "How'do, my dear?" He had a word for every one, and every one seemed pleased with it. He seemed indeed in every thing to have a way of doing the thing; even in the meanest offices of his situation there was evidently a manner peculiar to himself.

While changing the horses he marched round the coach, examined the lynch pins, and scrutinized our new team in a most knowing and philosophical manner; and then, stretching himself out, strutted up and down the inn yard with no inconsiderable effect.

A rosy-cheeked damsel, with her milk pail, at this juncture passed by our vehicle.

"Fie, Sally!" called out my gentleman, putting his hand before his face in mock sheepishness, "to follow me in this fashion; you might at least wait until we're married."

The girl laughed, "Marry you, indeed!"

"To be sure, Sally; you pretend to be shy, do you? but never mind, we understand each other—I say, Sally," he feigned a whisper, "when's the happy day? I'm all impatience."

"Nay, nay, it's not come to that yet, however."

"I say, Tom," he continued, addressing the ostler, who stood grinning with open jaws, "now be'ant she always running arter me?"

"Ay, Mr. Charles, she be; and she'd kiss you too if she durst."

"Then, egad, I'll accommodate her," exclaimed the gentleman, as, suiting the action to the word, he seized her by the waist and gave her a hearty kiss.

The girl did not seem to take it much amiss; she vented, indeed, her pretended indignation with much seeming effect on the poor ostler, who still stood grinning, and who, no doubt, would gladly have come in for his share of the bliss. But, after well boxing him, she appeared in no hurry to get away, and still lingered to hear the guard's,

"Never mind, Sally, we'll be man and wife by this time next month."

"On my word," said I, "if this be a part of the advantages of his situation, it certainly possesses some enviable satisfactions," for the lass was so really pretty, that I could not altogether avoid envying him his better fortune myself. He might indeed have read my thoughts, for, after giving an extra strut or two, he observed to the poor ostler,

"You see, Tom, how the girls like us guards," and then smacking his lips, as much as to say, "Egad, how sweet it was," tuned up "Away with melancholy," and looked more conceited than ever.

"Hang the fellow's impudence," I mentally interjected: "but he certainly has a way of doing the thing," but at all events I can answer for his practice—such are most certainly some of the charms of life, there's no denying that however. It would seem, too, to be a natural consequence of his situation, for he took it entirely as a matter of course. I must, however, admit that it was quite a new inquiry to me, that I had never considered all these things before. English Magazine.

THE TERM MASQUERADE.

It is said that the word masquerade is derived from advice given to a very ugly woman—masque her head. If the legislature in enacting laws to prevent masquerades would introduce a clause permitting all ladies, who are not possessed of beauty, to wear masks, it would in all probability be more effectual than a penal statute.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

MR. EDITOR—If the advertiser for a wife whom N. mentions in your last Mirror, is really serious in his disinterested proposition, why is he not more explicit in declaring his abode? I have searched from one end of the Bowery to the other; gone from the bottom to the top of most of the barber's shops in it, and yet find no person answering to the glowing description of himself and his five children. Please, Mr. Editor, insert the above and what follows, in your paper, that it may meet the eye of the advertiser and induce him to give me a more particular address. With perfect impartiality I may say that I have every charm of person he can ever hope to meet with; fine health, rosy complexion, and am not yet twenty. For my fortune, I have not much to do with bank notes or specie; but I consider my mental acquirements as an entire compensation for that defect, and have no doubt advertiser, appearing a sensible man, will be of the same opinion. Advertiser's sentiments upon the liberty of disposing of his hours agree perfectly with my own, for being of a very literary turn, the more I am left to my own thoughts the more original are my ideas; besides I think that absence tends to heighten conjugal affection, and the longer he stays away, the more good-humouredly will I receive him. The amusement he offers is perfectly agreeable to me, for I am very fond of children, (dear little things) particularly when they are neglected and spoiled, for it brings a crowd of endearing recollections to my mind, my brothers and sisters having been left entirely to their own guidance; and my own sweet home will rise before me in bright perspective, whenever I see or hear any of their interesting disputations. Moreover, it suggests such poetical ideas of the primitive state of nature before order, law, or obedience was heard of; for the education,

"Oh delightful task to rear the tender thought," etc.

I am very philosophical, therefore advertiser's taciturn and sour disposition will not have the slightest effect upon me. I have a great deal of wit, which will amuse him in those eccentric times, and my mind is a never-failing resource which I can retire to when he is weary of my voice. As to his snoring, many would think it a fault, but to me it appears to be one of the highest recommendations, and indeed is one of the principal reasons which induce me to enter into the bonds of matrimony. Upon my feelings it has the same powerful, all-absorbing effect that the Æolian harp is said to have on other poets. I think those deep, regular, organ-like sounds much more conducive to elevation of style and majesty of thought, than the vibrating music of the former instrument. I excel in culinary arts, particularly in dressing a calves head and blanketting feet, and have made every part of domestic chemistry my special study. His dining from home so often pleases me greatly, for I admire the ancient Roman custom of having only two meals a day, and I dearly love to be classical. But above all advertiser's perfections, his bald head charms me most. Oh! I am enraptured; I have long been devoted to phrenology, and such an opportunity never before presented itself of pursuing my inquiries on a real living head. His iron spectacles are no obstacle, for I delight in spectacles of all descriptions. But, oh! that head, that beautiful bald head, I must and will have it; do dear, good, crusty advertiser, let me know your real place of residence. ISIDORA.

The editor of the Mirror regrets the painful necessity under which he labours, of disarranging the plans and wishes of the fair Isidora; but who can resist the decrees of fate? With that prompt attention to the interests and inclinations of his friends by which it is his desire to be always distinguished, the editor immediately on the receipt of the foregoing letter, transmitted it to Mr. N.—the original discoverer of the advertisement alluded to by Isidora—his reply was as speedily furnished as it is fatal to the aspirations of our accomplished correspondent. We subjoin his note in all its brevity.

Saturday.

M. M. M.—Very much grieved, upon my soul, for the young lady. The advertiser with whose exhibition she is so much taken, is a changed man; it is remarkable how completely he has lost every one of those charms which have pierced the gentle bosom of Isidora. He has grown fat and gouty, and keeps the house—succeeded to a fortune by the sudden death of a distant cousin; his children have all been fashionably educated, and the young men are now as deeply versed in all the mysteries of billiards, brag, and Bingham, as the girls are in those of masquerades, cantelos, and coquetry. The advertiser snores as much as ever, and rather more; but his bald head has long since been decorated with a glorious curling Brutus; but whether the growth of the vegetable cerate, or of some peruke-maker's skilful fingers, I do not know. The iron spectacles have faded from the world of substantial things, and the advertiser having grown young again, wears none at all, having so much honesty in him as to confess that he is not near-sighted.

Touching the dinners, my old gentleman's present fashion would not suit the sighing Isidora, for he dines every day at home with a small but select party of gourmands, whose only rule of conduct is to allow no woman to partake or witness their good cheer.

Isidora might have rambled through the Bowery until doomsday seeking for her mate; his advertisement was given to the public some eight or nine years since, and from the time when the fortune fell to him (now seven years ago) he has lived in a splendid mansion near the Battery.

I don't know what to do for Isidora unless I marry her myself. I'm sure I've no objections. Can't you find out how she would like it? I'm young, you know, and her tastes seem elderly; but n'importe. Come, speculate for me, M., like a good fellow—you know I'm dying to be wived, even though I should blow my brains out after it, which by the way is not unlikely. Yours, N.

THE CANDOUR FAMILY.

The graphic pen of Sheridan has immortalized a female branch of this extensive family. The Mrs. Candour of his brilliant comedy, "The School for Scandal," conveys a complete epitome of the leading traits in the characters of her numerous relatives, and will be acknowledged as a faithful picture of the species, as long as elegant wit and refined satire hold their influence over public taste.

The affectation of good nature and benevolence in this celebrated lady is admirably contrasted with the real malevolence and bitter malice with which she anxiously propagates every idle tale, intended to blast the reputation of her best friends; and her repeated assertions, that she does not believe the ungenerous reports it is her chief business to circulate, is a happy illustration of the meanness and duplicity of her particular branch of the family stock, who may be designated as the scandalous Candours.

The designing Candours are another numerous body, extending from the great family tree. They are more insidious than the class first mentioned; they have studied human nature well, know its weaknesses and its foibles, weigh causes and effects with mathematical precision, and can tell to a hair's breadth that exact portion of their quality necessary for exhibition on all fitting occasions. Worldly interest is their ruling object, and they find the assumption of candour and veracity powerful engines in effecting the completion of their designs. In business this class are great sticklers for fair and open dealing: they will tell you the exact cost price of an article, (agreeably to a tariff of their own,) and declare they are content with the smallest possible profits. I always doubt this class of dealers, who keep open stores for the benefit of the public. Again—they profess to recommend such articles only as are of superior workmanship and durability; look to such commodities well; they are certainly, in the technical phrase, "old shop-keepers."

In the daily intercourse of life these designing Candours will be found as the hangers on of rich relations, impelled, as they declare, by involuntary admiration of the many excellent qualities perceptible in these favoured ones of the blind goddess, when, by judicious praise of any real qualification and delicate flattery bestowed on some favourite passion or pursuit, they completely ingratiate themselves into the good opinion of their victims. We might enter more into detail with this class, but we proceed to

The backbiting Candours—a malignant set, who combine all the worst characteristics of the whole family. Scandalous, designing, and egotistical, they are each by turns and as occasion serves. No action of their friends, however simple, can escape their censure; nor can any character, be it pure as unsunned snow, preserve itself from their malevolent designs. And they affect withal a purity of thought and action, which elevates them above the rest of their fellow-creatures. The end and design of all their foul-mouthed aspersions on their fellow beings, is to impress others with the abhorrence they have to the foibles and faults of frail mortality. These are the assassins who stab men in the dark—who murder reputations with the hardihood of professed bravoës, doing their business with secrecy and despatch. They cannot disguise such and such an one's faults, not they! "It is pitiable to see Mr. So-and-so's extravagance—can he honestly obtain means to support it? Really people should beware of such characters." These and similar expressions are constantly on their tongues —used towards individuals with whom perhaps they are on terms of the most apparent intimacy,—for the curse of this description of characters is, that they are invariably hypocrites, and when face to face, lavish praises without measure on the very persons they most traduce when absent. Would that our feeble pen could lash the reptiles until every particle of this abhorred vice was extracted by the salutary castigation we might inflict—enough of them.

The blunt Candours are more annoying than malicious. Shakspeare with one stroke of his master pencil, has admirably sketched their character—

"Who having been praised for bluntness, do affect
A saucy roughness, and constrains the garb
Quite from their nature."

This class value themselves upon their strict adherence to truth, and thus actuated consider themselves warranted in addressing rude speeches and impertinent remarks indiscriminately to all who come within their influence. Their friends of course possess the largest portions of their care. The worst features of these honest people are, that they too frequently are only guided by caprice and inexperience of the world, added to an extreme itching for notoriety and singularity—which their insignificance prevents them from attaining by any other means than those they have adopted. They are very candid in their own failings also, but it is only to extort admiration for that candour. Washington Irving, has made this foible one of the distinguishing marks of real John Bullism, and not without some degree of truth. Honest Bull will readily give himself credit for every bad quality, but he expects to be lauded for his magnanimous concession, and would eagerly resent another tongue than his own attaching such vices to his share.

The egotistical Candours are constantly depreciating every good attribute they may possess, and under-rating the advantages they may enjoy—to extort the praises or admiration of their friends. They pass their lives in a constant employment at "angling," and no lover of the piscatory art, not excepting old "Isaack Walton" himself, ever enjoyed a "nibble or a bite" with more heartfelt pleasure than they do, when their bait is taken, and the poor victim of their art is hooked into a faint praise, or into a warm eulogy of the very things they are affecting to undervalue. We close with this branch of the widely spreading Candours, and have no doubt our readers will detect the originals of the likenesses we have attempted to sketch scattered plentifully among the varieties of the human family who come under their inspection. MISCELLANY.

BONAPARTE.—The prefect of a distant department in France, among many fine compliments to Bonaparte, assured him that the inhabitants of his department wished of all things to erect a monument to his memory.

BLUNDERS.—In the reign of Queen Anne an act was passed to prevent the further growth of popery in Ireland, which, by a typographical error, was published under an act to prevent the further growth of poetry.

HOUSE ON FIRE.—A man was sitting in his study reading, when one of his neighbours came running to tell him that the back part of his house must be on fire as it smoked excessively. "Oh!" answered the man, "be so good as to tell my wife, for I do not concern myself at all with the house keeping."

PRICE OF PLAYS.—It appears, that Jacob Jonson got Otway's Venice Preserved for the small sum of about seventy dollars. What would such a tragedy now produce? Murray, the celebrated London bookseller, gave Maturin three hundred guineas for the copy-right of Bertram; and another spirited London publisher gave Barry Cornwall (Mr. Proctor) a similar sum for the proprietary of Mirandola; this, too, with the chance of its failure at the theatre.

LEGAL CRITICISM.—Not long ago an eminent special pleader was at Drury-lane theatre, seeing the play of Macbeth. In the scene where Macbeth questions the witches in the cavern, "What is't you do?" they answer, "a deed without a name." This phrase struck the sagacious lawyer, and he immediately remarked to a friend, "a deed without a name? why 'tis void."

MR. SHERIDAN.—Lord Derby once applied in the green-room to Mr. Sheridan, with much dignity, for the arrears of Lady Derby's salary, and vowed he would not stir from the room till it was paid. "My dear lord," said Mr. Sheridan, "this is too bad; you have taken from us the brightest jewel in the world, and you now quarrel with us for the little dust she has left behind her."

LITERARY NOTICES.

DOMESTIC LITERATURE.

HOOPER'S MEDICAL DICTIONARY.—The unwearied zeal and ardour of our enterprising friends the Harpers, know no bounds to their exertions in the cause of diffusing knowledge. Not to the lighter branches of literature alone is their ceaseless press devoted. Science enjoys its full share of favour, and works calculated to advance the interests of learning are constantly furnished at the lowest prices, and in the most handsome form, to the trade. Among the last productions of their fertile typographical laboratory, is the valuable volume whose title precedes this notice. Its long continued popularity with the medical profession is ample evidence of its value. To the original text have been added most copious notes by the American editor, Dr. Akerly. These relate principally to the natural sciences, as botany, zoology, mineralogy and geology, and must therefore recommend this work to the general reader no less than to the medical student. Indeed every one desirous of possessing a key to the signification of scientific terms, an abundance of which has been introduced into almost every printed work by the prevailing taste of the day, will derive both profit and satisfaction from the possession of this dictionary. It is of very large size, but sold at a remarkably low price.

TRAVELS IN GREECE.—We have looked over a few pages from a volume under this title, which is shortly to issue from the press of Messrs. Sleight and Robinson of this city. It is from the pen of Mr. Post, who was one of the laudable few that, urged by a true Philhellenic ardour, visited the fair clime of Greece, to minister relief to its suffering inhabitants. We anticipate from a more extended perusal much intellectual gratification.

SKETCHES OF A TRAVELLER.—Messrs. Carter and Hendee, of Boston, have collected and published, in a neat duodecimo volume, a number of interesting letters, which originally appeared in the New-England Galaxy and Boston Courier. They treat of a variety of curious, humorous, and instructive subjects, and are written with considerable spirit.

FOREIGN LITERATURE.

Among the new works in the London press are the following: Life of Giovanni Finatti, who, under the name of Mahomet, made the campaign against the Wahabees, for the recovery of Mecca and Medina.

Conversations with lord Byron on Religion, held in Cephalonia, a short time previous to his death, by the late Dr. James Kennedy, of H. B. M. Medical staff.

Life of the Earl of Peterborough, by Sir Walter Scott.

The Spanish Novelists, by Thomas Roscoe.

The Life of Sir Joseph Banks, by a member of the royal society.

The Life of John Hampden, by Lord Nugent.

The Life of Titian, by James Northcote.

Notes on Haiti, by Charles Mackensie, F. R. S., late his Britannic majesty's consul general at Haiti.

East and West, by one of the authors of the Rejected Addresses.

New novels by the author of Flirtation—Tales of the O'Hara family—Sayings and Doings—Brambletye House—Highways and Byways.

Tales of the Colonies, by Wm. Howison, Esq. author of Sketches in Canada, &c.

Private History of the French Cabinet, during the periods of the directory, the consulate, and the reign of Napoleon, by M. Bourrienne, private secretary to the emperor.

Lawrie Todd, or the Settlers in the woods. By John Galt, Esq. (author of the Annals of the Parish, &c.) Report speaks highly of this work as a faithful and interesting narrative, and as abounding with that mingled pathos and humour, keen observation and simplicity, which Mr. Galt is quite singular in depicting.

Horace Smith is preparing to publish a new work, which he entitles "Walter Colyton." It is a tale of the court of James II. Among the characters, Mr. Smith has introduced the king himself, and his two daughters; afterwards Queen Mary and Queen Anne, Lord and Lady Sunderland, the Dutchess of Portsmouth, Sir Charles Sedley, and his daughter the Countess of Dorchester, Count Grammont, the Prince of Orange, Dryden, Shadwell, and Algernon Sydney.

The veteran author of "Caleb Williams" is, we understand, again coming into the field with a work of fiction and fancy, called "Clouesley." This novel is said to be written with all the freshness, vigour, and originality, which produced so much sensation when Caleb Williams first appeared.

OYSTERS.

MAN has been styled a speaking animal, a laughing animal, a bargaining animal, and a drunken animal, in contradistinction to all other animals who neither speak, nor laugh, nor bargain nor get drunk; but a cooking animal seems after all to be his most characteristic and distinguishing appellation. In the important art of cooking virtuals he shines pre-eminent; it is here he taxes all his faculties, racks his invention, and gives unbounded range to his imagination. Nature has given to every other animal a peculiar taste, and furnished three or four kinds of food to suit that taste, but this sense in man accommodates itself to an innumerable quantity of materials. He has made copious selections from all things that dwell upon the face of the globe—from the birds of the air, from the fish of the sea, from the inhabitants of lake and river, yea, from the bowels of the earth has he extracted substances to minister to his palate, and the whole mineral and vegetable world has been ransacked with indefatigable industry for its gratification. Thousands of his species pass their lives in dreary mines to send forth the simple but indispensable salt with which he seasons his viands; while others fit out frail vessels, and amid storm and tempest, traverse the wilderness of waters for certain spices that add piquancy to a favourite dish! But after he has collected all the products of the world together, that is only the commencement—the preliminary mustering of his forces. What are all these materials collectively to the innumerable, the inconceivable quantity of dishes he manufactures from them by skillful combinations or incongruous mixtures? Twelve figures can be set down in thousands of different ways and no two alike; then out of those millions of primitive substances, what countless quintillions of dishes can he not compound! whilst every day new secrets are brought to light and added to the limitless list of gastronomic discoveries.

The ancients knew something as regarded these matters; but still they seemed to have studied expense and vanity more than real gratification. There are few that have not heard of the extravagances of an Heliogabalus, his brains of flamingos, his tongues of nightingales, and his heads of ostriches, six hundred of which were served up in a single dish, and for which single dish the deserts of Arabia must have been scoured and desolated—but there is no ingenuity in this, nothing remarkable save its monstrous folly. At a later period the art took a more complex form. In 1577 the abstemious cardinal, Ascanius Colonna, gave an entertainment to the prince of Nassau, when the following unique olla podrida was produced, which was looked upon as one of the greatest achievements of the times, and was so admired and lauded by all who partook of it, that a certain holy father present at the feast, composed a Latin ode upon it, and handed the receipt down to an ungrateful posterity, who refuse to avail themselves of this chef d'œuvre in the annals of cookery. The ingredients were "ten pounds of beef, three pounds of a pig, six wood pigeons, one pound of truffles, six thrushes, one capon, three pounds of turnips, six handfuls of green fennel seed, two pounds of sausages composed of curious materials, one pound of pepper, six onions, twelve larks, three lobsters, seven lamprays, four choice cardons, (a vegetable resembling celery) two heads of Bologna cabbage, three pounds of tallow, spices, salt, sugar, and other seasonings." How stomachs were constructed in those days is not stated.
